PRESIDENT, PROF. S. F. B. MORSE,
SECRETARY, WM. McMURRAY,
TREASURER, LORING ANDREWS,

OFFICE OF THE SOCIETY,
No. 13 PARK ROW, NEW-YORK
C. MASON, COR. SEC'Y.,
To whom all communications may be addressed.

Resolved, That it be recommended to all citizens in the various cities, counties, and villages of this and other States, who approve of the objects expressed in this Constitution, that they organize auxiliary societies, and open communication with the New-York Society.

ORGANIZATION OF THE SOCIETY

FOR THE

DIFFUSION OF POLITICAL KNOWLEDGE.

On the 6th of February a number of gentlemen met at Delmonico's, to consult on the best means of diffusing correct political knowledge.

On the 13th of February the same gentlemen, with others, reassembled at the same place, to complete the organization of THE SOCIETY FOR THE DIFFUSION OF POLITICAL KNOWLEDGE—the comprehensive objects of which are set forth in the Constitution adopted.

Prof. S. F. B. Morse, who had been chosen President of the Society at a former meeting, took the chair. Upon calling the meeting to order, he spoke briefly as follows:

Speech of Professor Morse.

GENTLEMEN: I can not take the chair this evening, to which you have been pleased in your kindness to call me, without a few words of definition of my position in relation to the movement which we have inaugurated.

Nothing in these days of our country's trial has so saddened the hearts of patriots, and caused such universal misgiving touching the stability and even the existence of our cherished Government, as the constantly recurring evidences of a deep and wide-spread demoralization, pervading the public mind, to which the rostrum, the press, and, I am sorry to add, the pulpit, in a lamentable degree, lend their powerful influence to strengthen and perpetuate. Fanaticism rules the hour. The fanatic is on the throne. I use the term fanatic in no loose sense. Fanaticism is a frenzy, a madness. It is not, as it pretends to be, a zeal springing from enlightened reason, founded on the rock of God's word, but a spirit of the pit, clothing itself in our day in the garb of an angel of light, the better to deceive the minds of the unthinking and the simple. Fanaticism has been well defined, "enthusiasm inflamed by hatred," and the truth of the portrait of the foul fiend is exhibited before us every day.

History, ever repeating itself, as time completes its cycles, has not yet closed its sad volume of disastrous hallucinations. It is preparing its pages and reddening its pen to record the story of the foulest tragedy of earth—the most frightful that is yet to deform the annals of the past.

Can patriotic men, persuaded of such an issue, be silent, be idle? There may be those who fold their arms and shut their eyes, and lull their apprehensions with baseless dreams of a future "visionary, impossible Union," a Union begotten of force and fear, not a Union begotten of peace and love; a Union to be created when the South shall be wiped out of existence, and its soil prepared for Northern colonization; when the Southern earth shall be "without form and void," and has become the desolate habitation for the advent of the new Northern man. But there are others who have awakened to the realities of the times. They can not but read the portentous signs of a coming destruction. If the poisonous seeds sown for long years by a proud, God-defying infidelity in France, have shown their natural fruits in the bloody dramas of the Reign of Terror, how can we believe that the same seeds, exotic though we hope them to be, yet now flowering in an artificial atmosphere and in a hot-bed made congenial to their rank growth by American infidelity in church and state—how can we believe, I say, that we shall pluck grapes from these thorns, or figs from these thistles?

But what can we do to root out these noxious weeds? We must put machinery in motion adapted to that end. The heresies of the Church must be grappled with by the untainted theologians of the land, for there are thousands of these who have not bowed the knee to the abolition Baal. The heresies of the state can be and must be reached in a constitutional way by the intellects of the country. If I have read the provisions of the Constitution aright, this meeting in its object and its mode of reaching that object, is wholly and completely constitutional. We have, however, been assailed by those whose record and antecedents should not make either the act or the manner of the act surprising to us. We are instructed, however, that charity "rejoiceth not in iniquity," and the injunction in this case is salutary, for the temptation is certainly strong to rejoice, rather than to feel indignation at the gross indecency our opponents have thought proper to perpetrate. It is not, indeed, the iniquity of which these libelers have been guilty, and which has drawn down upon them one universal cry of shame from all decent men, that tempts our rejoicing; it is their having given to the public such an unmistakable manifestation of that reckless, unprincipled spirit which is so rife in the ranks of fanaticism, and which it is our own purpose, if possible, to exorcise. True, it is a matter of surprise that the simple, unostentatious, unannounced assemblage of a few gentlemen in a parlor to concert a plan for diffusing knowledge should have been the potent spear of Ithuriel, at once to reveal in proper shape and character, the presence in the community of the demon of fanaticism.

> Touched lightly; for no falsehood can endure > Touch of celestial temper, but returns
> Of force to its own likeness. Up he starts,
> Abashed, the devil stood."

Now we are told from the best authority that the devil is "the father of lies." If falsehoods, therefore, are evidence of his presence or his agency, surely the spawning of forty-three, at one incubation, entitles the prolific reporter to preëminent distinction in the ranks of the prince of evils.

We have been charged with disloyalty. Men use words very loosely in these times of excitement. What is disloyalty? It is unfaithfulness to the sovereign. Where is our sovereign? Will it be said that it resides in the powers that be, and these we are commanded not to resist? If there are any associated with us who propose to resist the powers that be, I have not been acquainted with them. There is one of the powers that be, and that too the very chief of these powers, which seems to be strangely left out of view in our political discussions in these eventful times. There are some, I understand, who believe the sovereign power to exist in the President; others that it rests in the national, executive, legislative, and judicial bodies collectively, and others, in the States; and many, if not most, have very indefinite and confused ideas of these powers that be. Each of these is a power, and there are many others, each of which, in the legitimate exercise in its proper order of its own delegated duties, is not to be resisted without blame. But it seems to be forgotten that there is a power in the State sovereign to each and all these powers, one to which all of them are subject. Can we overlook the great truth that the very foundation of our governmental system is based on the sovereignty of the people? Do I mistake or exaggerate when I say that presidents, and governors, and all the departments, whether of State or federal machinery, are all subordinate to the people? Justice Story, in his work on the Constitution, in his concluding remarks, says:

"It (the Constitution) is the language of the people. The people have established it, and spoken their will; and their will, thus promulgated, is to be obeyed as the supreme law of the land. Every citizen has a right to contest the validity of its construction before the proper tribunals, and bring it to the test of the Constitution. And if the case is not capable of judicial redress, still the people may, through the acknowledged means of new elections, etc., check any usurpation of authority, and thus relieve themselves from any grievances of a political nature."

The order, then, of classification of these powers is, first the people, then the State Government, and then the Federal Government. The people in their sovereign capacity and right have absolute power over and above all other powers. The Declaration of Independence, in its mixture of truths, qualified truths, and fallacious maxims, has (so far as our Government is concerned) announced one truth which they who make that document their political bible will not gainsay. "It is the right of the people to alter or abolish (any form of government) and to institute new government, laying its foundation on such principles, and organizing its powers in such form as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness." Can any political power be conceived more absolute than this? It is supreme over all the other powers. To make the case more plain, if it is necessary, reverse the case, and suppose it to read: "It is the right of the President, or the Federal Government, or any of the States to alter or abolish the Government, etc." There is no such power but in the people. And now to whom are we appealing in forming this Society? To the supreme power. We have nothing to do with any of the other powers, but to use them, so far as we may in their several subordinate stations, as means of reaching the sovereign; and we intend reaching his throne with our petition only through the well-known constitutional channels of access. We mean to use our rights of free discussion, and look for the answer to our appeal of the ballot-box.

Is this treason? Is this conspiracy? Is this resisting the powers that be? Is it disloyalty to appeal to the sovereign, or to exercise that portion of the sovereign power which of right belongs to us as part of the people?

Hon. George T. Curtis, in reporting a draft of a constitution from the committee to which the subject had been referred, spoke as follows:

Speech of Hon. Geo. T. Curtis.

Mr. President and Gentlemen: Since we last met in this place we have been subjected to a gross, wanton, and unprovoked insult. Nevertheless, sir, I presume that we shall go on in the discharge of our rights and duties as free citizens of this free country, and, according to the advice which Hamlet gave to the courtier, that we shall use our assailants not according to their deserts, but according to our own honor and dignity. The committee, sir, who were instructed to prepare and report a constitution for the permanent organization of this Society, have directed me to present the instrument which I hold in my hand. Before reading it, however, I desire to be indulged in a few remarks which it is due to the character of those who were here at the first preliminary meeting, and who are again now here, I should make with all calmness, but at the same time with firmness and frankness. When respectable men, who are to be presumed to be as pure and patriotic as their neighbors, are assailed as traitors and conspirators, it concerns the public good that their objects and purposes should immediately be made known, in order that no excuses may be left for the indulgence of a foolish credulity, stimulated by falsehood and malignity, and therefore, sir, we have requested the attendance here of a person who exercises the honorable employment of a reporter for the public press in an honorable and upright manner, and respects his own calling, and who will doubtless give a faithful and true account of all that may transpire here that it concerns the public to know.

Mr. President, the immediate causes for the formation of this Association are the prevalence of doctrines subversive of the fundamental principles of civil liberty and tending directly to the overthrow of the Constitution of the United States, and a wide-spread popular ignorance of the true nature and character of the institutions under which we live. Under these circumstances, sir, what are good men to do who love their country and value its institutions, and who are not willing that these doctrines should go on to produce their bad work in the entire disorganization of society? For, sir, but one of two things can occur, either these doctrines must be met by discussion and refutation and by the peaceful operations of the ballot-box, or they must go on until they have completed their mischief, and property, government, social order, and all things else sink into confusion, to be followed by such peace and security as an absolute despotism can bring. Sir, I do not propose on this occasion to enter into any argument respecting any of the questions which have come into such alarming significance within the last eighteen or twenty-four months, or into any extended discussion of the theories which prevail respecting the various powers of the different departments of the government. But I do propose very briefly to indicate the nature of some of these questions and the character and tendencies of some of those theories, in order that those who may be induced to reflect on the condition of our country may see whither we are drifting. You all know that there are annexed to the Constitution of the United States certain amendments, which embody, in the form of fundamental laws, superior and paramount to all executive or legislative or judicial power, the fundamental, inalienable, and indestructible rights of the citizen; and you also know that the generation of men who made that Constitution and transmitted it to us were not willing to have it go into operation without annexing to it those limitations on the powers of the government. Now, sir, it is not necessary to repeat, to recite what these limitations are. But you are aware that it is now claimed that in time of war, and because the country is at war, it is legitimately in the power of the President to disregard all those restrictions and limitations, and practically to set aside and annul all these rights of the citizen. That I do not exaggerate or in any degree mistake the nature and extent of this claim, permit me to read a single sentence from a pamphlet, written, published, and largely circulated in the year 1862, by an American lawyer:

"No citizen, whether loyal or rebel, is deprived of any right guaranteed to him in the Constitution by reason of his subjection to martial law, because martial law when in force is constitutional law."

Now, sir, you are aware that the whole of this position, so far as it could affect the American people, is founded on the assumption that there is wrapped up in that phrase which designates the military capacity of the President as that of commander-in-chief of the army and navy, power to declare martial law by proclamation all over the country, when the country is in a state of war and the President has armies in the field. Having seen the form in which this doctrine is promulgated now in our American age and in this country, let me ask you to go back for an instant to the year 1628 in England, and see how the same doctrine was then stated by an English lawyer upholding the side of arbitrary power upon the same description of reasoning, and the coincidence is astonishing. At a conference between the two houses of Parliament concerning the liberty of the subject, holden April 17, 1628, Mr. Sergeant Ashley, a noted lawyer of that day, held the following language in the presence of the two houses:

when recourse can be had to the king's courts, yet in time of invasion, or other times of hostility, when the royal army is in the field, and offenses are committed which require speedy resolution and can not expect the solemnities of legal trials, then such imprisonment, execution, or other justice done by the law martial is warrantable, for it is then the law of the land, and is jus gentium."

I will make no comments, but will simply call to your recollection the fact that the phrase or the thing "martial law" is utterly unknown to the Constitution of the United States; that even Congress — the whole legislative power, the Senate, and the House of Representatives — and the President, acting together, can not make any special mode of arrest or trial applicable to any but persons in the army and the navy, and that as to all other men the Constitution absolutely forbids arrests without due process of law or trials otherwise than by a jury of the vicinage. And yet, sir, we are told that the President of the United States may declare martial law by proclamation, and may subject every citizen to seizure and incarceration by provost-marshal.

Then, sir, there is that other kindred heresy by which the same kind of result is arrived at, but by a somewhat different process. We have all heard a great deal about the doctrine of self-defense on the part of the Government. The right of self-defense — as if Government were a natural person, having all the inherent rights of self-defense which a natural person has; and mixed up with this strangely in men's minds is the idea that the members of the executive government may transcend the law of the land in the exercise of this great inherent right of the government to defend itself, and having transcended the law of the land, and committed an injury upon some citizens, may go to Congress and ask for an indemnity, and so the whole wrong is cured by such indemnity by act of Congress. It is the most singular thing in this world that the American people have not hitherto seen that this idea of resorting to the practice of the British Constitution, and borrowing from it what is called the bill of indemnity, to protect the officers of the government from the reclamations and complaints of the citizen, urged in courts of justice, is utterly inapplicable to our Constitution and our institutions, and that the attempt must repeal it—must pull down the Constitution and destroy those institutions. What is the reason, sir, that in England the executive government can in moments of great emergency and in seasons of great public peril, overstep for the moment the positive law of the land, and then, consistently with the principles of that government, receive what is called an indemnity from Parliament — that is, protection and pardon for the act, and thus the remedy of the citizen be cut off? It is solely and simply because it has always been a received principle of that government, that Parliament — the three branches of the Legislature acting together — make and unmake the constitution at their pleasure, and the fundamental reason is that they have no written constitution, but their constitution is an unwritten one. So that when any officer of the government has overstepped the law of the land from right public motives, and in a season of great emergency and peril, it is according to the practice and according to the legitimate theory of their constitution that an indemnity may be granted, for whatever Parliament solemnly enacts in the form of law is constitution. They may set aside the constitution in any particular by act of Parliament—so much so that they may change the descent of the crown, or make the heir apparent a beggar at any moment. But no such thing as that can be done in this country, for the simple reason that we have a written Constitution, which is paramount to all legislative authority and all legislative power — over which Congress has no more control, and in respect to which, where it guarantees rights to the citizen, Congress can no more act to take away the remedy than it can undertake to legislate respecting the condition of things in the provinces of the British empire. If it were not so, it would be in the power of Congress at any time to set aside first one provision of the Consti tution and then another, and so to go on until they had frittered away or overturned the whole of it.

Then there is that great mischievous heresy with respect to the power of the President to annul the writ of habeas corpus. It will always remain a serious discredit to the administration of Mr. Lincoln, that having to establish the first precedent on that subject since the establishment of the Constitution, they should have made that precedent in the wrong way, and thus have introduced a train of mischiefs in this country which are incalculable in extent, and of which no man can see the result. Why, sir, look at it for a moment. When these questions first rose in the path of the administration, nothing could have been more simple for them to do, nothing more necessary than to go to Congress, not only to ask for proper authority to suspend the writ, but to define that suspension and regulate it, to determine just how far the writ should run, just when and where the judge should stay his hand in prosecuting an inquiry, and on what certificate, and on what facts he should close the inquiry. And, sir, it is within my personal knowledge that some of the members of the administration at the extra session of Congress in 1861—at least the highest law-officer of the Government was implored to take that course, and had they taken it there is no amount of assistance from the best legal minds in the country which they could not have had at the asking, to have framed the proper law for that subject. I appeal to you, Mr. Tilden—I believe you are the only one of my brethren I see in the room—I appeal to you to confirm my statement when I say that no judge in the land can now receive judicial information on which he can act, that the writ of habeas corpus is suspended. What is the present state of things? The writ issues—some body comes into court, some military officer, and instead of making a return and bringing up the petitioner, undertakes to inform the judge that the President says that the writ is suspended. What does suspension mean under those circumstances? What are its limitations? What is its operation? Suppose the petitioner asks to be brought up, saying: "The Constitution guarantees to me, if I am accused of crime, a speedy and impartial trial in the State and district wherein the crime is said to have been committed. I have been incarcerated for eighteen months in a loathsome dungeon, and refused all redress." Is the writ suspended to close that inquiry? And yet that is the necessary consequence of this doctrine of executive suspension of the writ. Those are the reasons, sir, why it is one of the most lamentable, one of the greatest calamities that has ever befallen this country that Mr. Lincoln's administration should have set this precedent in the wrong direction.

Mr. Samuel Tilden said: My friend will excuse me for a moment. I will state that happening to be in Washington just about the period when this question rose, and being spoken with upon the subject by a member of the administration, I advised him that he would have no protection of law in acting upon the assumption that the writ of habeas corpus was or could be suspended in this mode, that he had better have just as little to do with it as possible, because when the momentary excitement was over, even if acts of this character were necessary, if arrests and detentions were necessary, he would find it wholly impracticable for him to set up any ground of offense against the several forms of redress that might be sought on the part of the person imprisoned. The suspension if validly made could operate, not to annul the other clauses of the Constitution to which Mr. Curtis has referred, or to suspend them, but simply to enable persons to be arrested and detained—that it did not touch the mode of trial and of punishment. Now, in my own judgment, it was absolutely necessary, as well for the safety of the citizen as for the convenience and fair action of the government, that the whole thing should have been defined by legislative action. It was a mistake of the most extraordinary character, resulting, I presume, from the entire want of acquaintance on the part of the law officer of the government with the subject of constitutional law, and the fact that the acts had been already committed, and were to be justified when his opinion was asked, and not any future action to be determined.

Mr. Curtis continued: I had no doubt as to what view must be taken by the gentleman, although I never exchanged a word with him on the subject in my life. I have said that this is a very unfortunate occurrence. It has interrupted the chain of that steady, safe, constitutional, and only regular and legitimate line of precedents that had come down to us from our British ancestors for many generations. In five reigns in England, if I remember rightly, the writ of habeas corpus has been suspended seven times, always by act of Parliament, always by a statute regulating it, defining it, and determining with the utmost precision what is the duty of the judge under such circumstances.

Then there is that other great heresy which may be called the war measure heresy, as if the Constitution were a thing made of India-rubber, to be stretched in one direction in time of peace and in another direction in time of war, or as if we had one Constitution for a state of peace and another Constitution for a state of war. And so we constantly hear it said, no matter what your complaints are about constitutional provisions—no matter what you may question, or what you may suggest or say, "Oh! that is of no consequence — this is a war measure," and thus it is justified. So one might go on through half of the entire night, respecting these extraordinary ideas which have crept into the minds of educated men, and which they have instilled into the popular mind. There is one especially extraordinary, and, in my judgment, equally dangerous idea—and that is, that the rights of the States will take care of themselves, when the war is over, and things will all fall back to their normal condition. Let us look at that for a moment. Here is the militia — the relations to which of the general government and of the States are defined with the utmost precision by the Constitution—and where there was any room for doubt as to the respective practical duties and rights of either government, all that has been, since the war of 1812, settled by judicial decision of the Supreme Court. Suppose, as is perhaps not unlikely, that the bill shall pass Congress, putting the whole control — constitutional provision or no constitutional provision — of the militia of the several States into the hands of the General Government, or, as I have heard it expressed, putting the sword effectually into the hands of the President. You go on in that state of things throughout this war, you go on to a termination of it, whatever that termination may be. Where is the militia then? What precedent has then been established, and what construction by reason of such a precedent acquiesced in—if it has been acquiesced in by the States and people — has the Constitution received at the hands of all the branches of Government and of the States? Why, a construction which does place and leave the whole "sword" of the whole country in the hands of the President of the United States. "The rights of the States will take care of themselves," we are told, and it is very idle, foolish, and somewhat treasonable talk to think any thing about the rights of the States or say any thing about them. Well, there is actually pending in Congress a bill which proposes to annihilate the jurisdiction of the State courts over personal actions for wrongs and injuries upon the suggestion only by the defendant, when he comes into court, that what he has done and what is complained of was done by order of the President of the United States. Actually, it is proposed that if any man sues another citizen of the same State for a personal wrong or injury in a court of the State—nay, sir, it extends to criminal proceedings also as well as civil — the cause shall instantaneously be transferred into the Federal courts on the suggestion only by the defendant that what he did was done by order of the President. Suppose that takes effect. Suppose that is acquiesced in. What construction have the powers of the General Government then received at the hands of all the departments of Govern ment and at the hands of the people in reference to that? That the entire jurisdiction of the State courts over personal wrongs as between citizen and citizen is stricken out of existence, when it is set up in defense, that the President ordered the act to be done. These theories have exerted and are exerting a most mischievous effect on the power of the Administration to cope with the public enemy; and I need not say how they have divided the public sentiment and the feeling of the North. I need not say how necessary they have made it that these things should undergo discussion, should be brought to the issue of the ballot-box. There is a vulgar error prevalent among a certain class of second-rate statesmen, that violence is strength. It is a lamentable mistake, and in constitutional countries and in countries which are under the control of constitutional principles, it is the falsest suggestion upon which men could possibly act. No government in any constitutional country is strong, powerful, able to discharge its duty to the utmost, able to call forth all the resources of the people for the accomplishment of any great public object, that does not faithfully and strictly pursue the fundamental law of the land. Bear with me, sir, one moment longer, while I endeavor to say why it is that I feel every infraction of the Constitution as if it were a wound inflicted upon my own body or a wrong done to my own soul. It is not, sir, I assure you, because I have endeavored in some humble and imperfect way to explore the foundations of our liberties and to explain them to my countrymen. It is because I feel in every fiber of my existence that this is the last written Constitution we shall ever have. It is because I feel an innate and undying conviction that if you suffer that instrument to be overborne — that if you acquiesce in serious and great infractions of its provisions—you will throw every thing into a state of entire confusion, and there will be an end of this experiment of self-government founded on and residing in the text of a written Constitution, explained, illustrated, and enforced by the peaceful operation of a supreme judiciary. I do not forget, sir, that the Southern Confederacy, so called, have framed for themselves a written Constitution founded on that of the United States as a model, and with some amendments which may be of more or less theoretical or practical value; but, sir, it does seem to me that no one can look at their condition and prospects without seeing that, although in point of form they may, if they succeed in obtaining their independence and can maintain their position, go on ostensibly under a written constitution, that their government must necessarily and will inevitably be a military government and be conducted by force. God forbid, sir, that we should follow that example. Let us take care how we acquiesce in any infractions of the Constitution.

Let us take care how we fail to do our utmost to instruct and enlighten the people, and to cause them to reverence and to cling to it as the great salvation rock. (Applause.)

With these remarks, sir, I beg leave to read the Constitution for this Society, which the Committee have instructed me to report.

Mr. Curtis then read the following draft of a Constitution, which was unanimously adopted as the Constitution of the Society:

CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE I.

ARTICLE II.

The objects of the Society shall be to disseminate a knowledge of the principles of American constitutional liberty; to inculcate correct views of the Constitution of the United States, of the powers and rights of the Federal Government, and of the powers and rights reserved to the States and the people; and generally to promote a sound political education of the public mind; to the end that usurpations may be prevented, that arbitrary and unconstitutional measures may be checked, that the Constitution may be preserved, that the Union may be restored, and that the blessings of free institutions and public order may be kept by ourselves, and be transmitted to our posterity.

ARTICLE III.

The officers of the Society shall consist of a President, a Treasurer, a Secretary, and three Standing Committees, who shall be chosen annually. The Standing Committees shall be a Committee on Publications, to consist of seven members, and a Committee of Finance, to consist of ten members; and these two committees shall constitute the Executive Committee of the Society, of which the President, the Treasurer, and the Secretary shall be members ex officiis. Each committee may fill vacancies in its own body.

ARTICLE IV.

The Executive Committee shall have the general direction of the operations and measures of the Society in the promotion of its objects; but no pamphlet, book, or other publication shall be circulated or issued in the name or under the auspices of the Society without being first approved by the Committee on Publications; and no person shall deliver a lecture or other public address in the name or under the auspices of the Society without first receiving a written appointment therefor from the Chairman of the said Committee on Publications.

ARTICLE V.

The Committee on Finance shall collect funds for the use of the Society, and pay them over to the Treasurer, whose duty it shall be to pay therefrom, under the direction of the Executive Committee, all expenses that may be incurred by the Society in the prosecution of its objects.

ARTICLE VI.

Regular meetings of the Society shall be held on the first Saturday in April, October, and January, in each year, and special meetings may be held at any time, under the direction of the President.

ARTICLE VII.

The Secretary shall record all the proceedings of the Society; he shall also act as Secretary of the several committees, and shall notify all meetings of the Society, or its committees.

ARTICLE VIII.

Other citizens of the United States, of full age, and of good moral character, may be admitted as members of this Society, on the nomination of two members, at any regular or special meeting of the Society, by a vote of two thirds of the members present.

ARTICLE IX.

No amendment of this Constitution shall be made without the vote of three fourths of the members present at a regular meeting, and notice thereof shall be given at the preceding regular meeting.

ARTICLE X.

The several committees shall report their doings at each regular meeting, and the Secretary shall record the same in the records of the Society.

SAMUEL F. B. MORSE, President.

MANTON MARBLE, WM. MCMURRAY, } Secretaries.

There being no further business before the Society, an adjournment was effected. The movement thus inaugurated will be a great power in the community and country.

Resolved, That it be recommended to all citizens in the various cities, counties and villages of this and other States, who approve of the objects expressed in this Constitution, that they organize auxiliary societies, and open communication with the New-York Society.

Letter from Mr. Tilden

IN REPLY TO THE EVENING POST.

To the Editors of the Evening Post:

In the Evening Post of this afternoon appears a pretended report of remarks made by me at a private meeting of gentlemen held at Delmonico's, last evening, which, I think, your senior editor would not be likely to credit, even though he saw it in a journal that derives its largest claim to public confidence from the authority his name gives to whatever it contains.

I should not deem this publication, however it might misrepresent me, of sufficient importance to require a public notice, except for one single consideration.

It is a studied attempt to give to the meeting the aspect of a revolutionary intrigue, and imputes to me expressions or implications countenancing in some degree, a resort to revolutionary means to effect a change in the policy of the present Federal Administration.

At an ordinary time, I should treat such an imputation with silent contempt. But the time is not ordinary, very far from it. There is a danger yet unrevealed in our future, transcending the calamities we are now experiencing. The premonitions of it are in the wild ideas, which, discarding the maxims and the habits of constitutional government, for the expediency of the moment, grasp at revolutionary power as an instrument of every successive illusion in our national policy.

It illustrates how contagious this bad example is, when set by these who administer the government during a period of public danger, that we daily hear from their partisans, and sometimes from their antagonists, propositions subversive of all constitutional government and of our private rights and personal safety. There are few journals in this city in whose columns, during the present civil war, can not be found invocations to violence against dissentients from their opinions. Among those failing to use their influence to restrain, but often giving countenance to this dangerous tendency, I lament to recall one whose early renown was earned by its advocacy of free discussion, personal rights, and local self-government. We were fast degenerating into a condition in which violence, exercised under the false pretense of lawful authority, or by mobs, was becoming the ordinary weapon of political discussion and partisan warfare, when the elections last fall reminded the party in power that it is not wholly irresponsible, and did something towards restoring that balance between masses representing different opinions, without which popular government is impracticable.

In a generation which finds itself, as ours now does, in a situation wholly novel; which is inexperienced in the larger politics; all of whose leading minds are the growth of a period of peaceful prosperity, and of liberal self-esteem, I fear to see the public mind gradually becoming familiar with the dangerous instruments and methods of revolutionary action. The temptation to use them in aid of the theory, passion, interest, or partisanship of the hour, is immediate and urgent; the evil consequences are remote, contingent, and dimly seen, without the light of experience. That we have hitherto abstained from them is due mainly to the traditions and habits we inherited from our ancestors, wise through much costly experience. I do not think these traditions and habits can be safely broken up. Never once, on any occasion, at any time, in any place, have I failed to lift my voice against any tendency of this kind, from whatever source it proceeded. I may, perhaps, have carried my solicitude upon this subject too far. That is not my opinion. Often, when honest, patriotic men, writhing under a sense of public danger, intensified by a future into which no eye can penetrate, have appealed to me to say what we could do to save the country, I have had occasion to counsel patience with errors which were drifting us as well as their authors to swift destruction, to revive the sense that the men who at present administer the government are our constitutional and legal agents, and that, though they claim from us our full share of the burdens and sacrifices which their policy imposes, without the slightest deference to our convictions in respect to the public interests and public safety, we must still loyally accept disappointment and national disaster, if they should come before the organism of the government can be reclaimed to a better policy in the due course of the elections.

It was some observations of this precise nature, more forbearing than those I now use, made while I was responding to a similar inquiry, that your reporter, by suppression and inversion, has distorted into exactly the opposite import. I had no information of any thing that was intended to be proposed at that meeting, or who was to be present, beyond what was conveyed by the call shown to me a few hours previously. I attended, not because I deemed the occasion of much practical moment — especially as an informal and preliminary meeting — but out of deference to the solicitude of men whose character and motives I unqualifiedly respect. I heard there no suggestion which was not moderate, patriotic, and constitutional. No allusion to peace was made. Some of the gentlemen I know to be of that class called War Democrats; and one, at least, a Republican. In my opinion, the first proposition for a dishonorable peace will come—not from those who foresaw and endeavored to avert civil war, but from that class of the Republicans who were, in a peculiar degree, its authors.

But the ever-recurring question to the minds of those who think the policy of the Administration has been unwise, and generally inadequate and "too late"—and often totally impracticable, yet remains —what can those who think so do? Is there any remedy, or any relief? Can we influence, in any degree, the Administration that represents us in its calamities, if not in its counsels? Will it listen to any suggestion we can offer—will it heed any warning we can give?

Slowly and sorrowfully, after eighteen months of anxious effort, beginning in November, 1860, I yielded to the conviction that we must experience and expiate each calamity, before we can make it visible to our brethren and friends, who at present hold unchecked an the balanced sway over the action of un Federal Government.

The controlling intellects of the Administration accept as the guide of their policy or reflect their own vagaries, through the worst element of their own adherents — blind partisans, visionary theorists, impracticable philanthropists, sensation journalists. The illusion which misled their minds before and at their advent to power is constantly reproduced in new forms and new applications, at every successive stage of their career.

It is the voyage of a ship with a false compass; particular deviations are discovered after they have been committed; but they recur in an indefinite series, because their source remains prolific as at first.

I did not say this at the meeting; but, compelled to restate my opinions, I do not hesitate to be the truth.

The substance of what I did say was, that the dissemination of documents, teaching the fundamental ideas of civil liberty and constitutional government could do no harm, and might be useful, in a time when men's minds are unsettled; that, in my judgment, party action was at present wholly unnecessary, believing, as I did, that future elections would amply take care of themselves; that great caution should be exercised as to the character of all publications authorized or issued, in respect to their practical bearing on the condition of our affairs; that, after all, if we would preserve free institutions among ourselves, or reconstruct the edifice of our Federal Union, it must be chiefly through the lessons of the great teacher, experience; that in a time of war we could not deal with our government, although disapproving its policy, without more reserve than was necessary in debating an administrative question during a period of peace; that the reason was, that if we should paralyze the arm of our own government we yet could not stay the arm of the public enemy striking at us through it; that it was this peculiarity which had sometimes caused minorities to be suppressed in the presence of public danger; and made such periods perdous to civil liberty; that the generation which embraced Washington, Jefferson, Franklin, Madison and Hamilton, and which framed the glorious fabric of American constitutional federative government, had been educated for their work by a quarter of a century of experience in civil commotions; that their intellects had been employed in studying the fundamental questions of government and society in the lights of history, while they were daily reducing its lessons to practice, until they were able to limit theory by practice, and to enlighten practice by theory; that the next generation, which embraced Jackson, Clay, Webster, Wright and their compeers, had the fresh traditions of their fathers; that within the last ten years that generation had wholly disappeared; that the present generation—not inferior in intelligence, nor, perhaps, in dormant public virtue, had neither experience nor traditions as a practical guide for their conduct; that the statesmen of the present time, had, almost without an exception, been born and educated and attained their political eminence during a period of prosperity and peace, in which the mere mechanical action of the government had surmounted every obstacle it had hitherto met, and in which the political philosophy of our wise ancestors had fallen into desuetude, and a race had grown up formed amid the discussion of the small administrative questions, and amid the competitions of professional politicians, for the petty honors and emoluments of office; that generations like individuals, do not completely understand inherited wisdom until they have reproduced it in their own experience, and, finally, that I supposed we must travel through the whole cycle in order to learn what we ought to have known from the historic past.

The only mention I made of Mr. Lincoln was in illustrating this idea; and what I said was, that a man whose whole knowledge and experience of statesmanship was derived from one term in Congress, a long service in the county conventions at Sangamon, a career at nisi prius in the interior of Illinois, and some acquaintance with the lobby at Springfield, had now to deal with the greatest questions and most complicated forces of modern history.

I had met with Mr. Lincoln before he was thought of for the Presidency, and have known much of him from his neighbors and friends. I have never been disposed to treat him so uncharitably as is often done by the factions into which his party is divided under the lead of Mr. Chase and Mr. Seward in his own Cabinet, which have scuffled over his body for power from the very day of his election, to the dissensions of which some of the vacillations of the Administration are to be ascribed; and to the occasional ascendency of the most dangerous of which not only fatal mistakes of civil polity, but most of our military disasters, can be distinctly traced.

I am quite aware how difficult is the conduct of a constitutional opposition, during a period of war; how necessary it is to guard against its degenerating into faction, and to keep its measures directed to attaining the utmost practical good for the country at every varying stage of public affairs. I know, also, that such an opposition is often the only means of preserving civil liberty, or of conducting an existing war to a successful termination. I have hitherto never failed to see the exact line between opposition and faction, or to keep within it, with an impartiality at no moment shaken by interest, passion, prejudice or association. I have not for an instant had out of mind the infinite advantages of using, if possible, those who now sway the government, and must do so, though in a less degree, for two years longer, as the instruments of the national salvation.

It was only when I saw them yielding daily more and more to fatal influences that I looked around for a counterpoise in a constitutional opposition. History affords no example of so liberal and generous—I might say prodigal—a support of an administration by the mass of those who dissent from its policy and disapprove its management. How means more vast than were ever before placed at the disposal of an administration have been employed, and with what results, I pronounce no judgment. I leave it to the testimonies daily coming to the public from those who were largely instrumental in bringing this Administration into existence. My view of duty on this subject has been purely and exclusively a matter of the judgment. As long ago as 1854, having broken all party ties, by firm resistance to the repeal of the Missouri Compromise, Mr. Preston King told me that the politicians of the South would never forgive me; and asked me if I thought my name could pass the Senate of the United States? I answered that it was of very little consequence to me whether it could or not; but that it was of great consequence to me that I should do what I thought best for the country. The termination of an intercourse, during which he had persistently sought to engage me with himself in the work of forming the Republican party, was a letter of warning, in which I said, in substance, that every thing that could be usefully or safely done to protect all the interests and rights of the North, could be even better accomplished without the use of such a dangerous agency; and that such an organization would either be a political blunder, or it would be a political crime, in creating a conflict in which the government would probably perish. This conviction, matured by long meditation in retirement and almost political isolation, governed my action ever after by a motive of patriotic duty so overwhelming that there was no room for any other motive.

When unexpected events swept us near to the fatal brink, this conviction was fully stated through the columns of the Evening Post, in October, 1860, with the reasons of it, deduced from the nature of men and of parties, in the light of history and of the principles and practices of the great men who founded free government for this continent. I feel my judgment of what was right and wise, and what is now right and wise for us to do, in this most important crisis of our national existence, assured by the accuracy with which, in that prevision, I estimated every element of the question; and, though ready to accept with candor any new lights, I see, as yet, no reason to question my conclusions. If the Evening Post, in the issue, from that time to the present, between its opinions and mine, can stand the same test, it may find some excuse for a dogmatic assault I shall not imitate, upon the opinions and motives of others, not less conscientious and patriotic than itself, and, as private citizens, less exposed than it is to the misleading influences of the turbid current of partisanship and journalism.

New-York, Saturday evening, Feb. 7, 1863.

Daniel Webster.

Mr. Webster's definition of liberty in his Richmond speech, can not be too often repeated. He said:

"Why, gentlemen, there is a good axiom extant, that the quantity of liberty we possess, is precisely equal to the quantity of restraint we put upon the government. And this is true. If the government is restrained from putting its hand in certain particulars upon you, to that extent you are free, and no more. And if individuals are restrained from putting their hands upon you, you have more freedom. All liberty, therefore, consists in putting such a restraint upon your governments, and upon individuals, that they can not touch your rights or your liberties."

Henry Clay.

Ashland, Sept. 2, 1843.

My Dear Sir: Allow me to select a subject for one of your tracts, which, treated in your popular and condensed way, I think would be attended with great and good effect. I mean Abolition.

It is manifest that the ultras of that party are extremely mischievous, and are hurrying on the country to fearful consequences. They are not to be conciliated by the Whigs. Engrossed with a single idea, they care for nothing else.

And yet they would see the administration of the Government precipitate the nation into absolute ruin, before they would lend a helping hand to arrest its career. They treat worse, denounce most, those who treat them best, who so far agree with them as to admit slavery to be an evil. Witness their conduct toward Mr. Briggs and Mr. Adams, in Massachusetts, and toward me.

I will give you an outline of the manner in which I would handle it. Show the origin of slavery; trace its introduction to the British government; show how it is disposed of by the Federal Constitution; that it is left exclusively to the States, except in regard to fugitives, direct taxes and representation. Show that the agitation of the question in the free States will first destroy all harmony, and finally lead to disunion—poverty and perpetual war—the extermination of the African race—ultimate military despotism.

But the great aim and object of your tract should be to arouse the laboring classes of the free States against Abolition! Depict the consequences to them of immediate abolition. The slaves being free, would be dispersed throughout the Union; they would enter into competition with the free laborer—with the American, the Irish, the German—reduce his wages, be confounded with him, and affect his moral and social standing. And as the ultras go both for Abolitionism and amalgamation, show that their object is to unite in marriage the laboring white man and black woman, to reduce the white laboring man to the despised and degraded condition of the black man.

I would show their opposition to colonization. Show its humane, religious, and patriotic aim. That they are those whom God has separated. Why do Abolitionists oppose colonization? To keep and amalgamate together two races in violation of God's will, and keep the blacks here, that they may interfere with, degrade, and debase the laboring whites! Show that the British government is co-operating with the Abolitionists for the purpose of dissolving the Union. I am perfectly satisfied that it will do great good. Let me hear from you on this subject. HENRY CLAY.

Five years earlier than this, (1838,) the U. S. Senate adopted the following resolutions, offered by Mr. Clay:

Resolved, That when the District of Columbia was ceded by the States of Virginia and Maryland to the United States, domestic slavery existed in both of those States, including the ceded territory, and that, as it still continues in both of them, it could not be abolished within the District, without a violation of that good faith which was implied in the cession, and in the acceptance of the territory; nor, unless compensation were made to the proprietors of slaves, without a manifest infringement of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, nor without exciting a degree of just alarm and apprehension in the States recognizing slavery, far transcending in mischievous tendency any possible benefit which could be accomplished by the abolition.

Resolved, therefore, That it is the deliberate judgment of the Senate, that the institution of domestic slavery ought not to be abolished within the District of Columbia; and it earnestly hopes that all sincere friends of the Union, and of harmony, and general tranquillity, will cease to agitate this disturbing question.

What is the Constitution?

ABOLITION AUTHORITY TWO YEARS AGO.

THE Constitution of the United States is a compact of Union adopted by the thirteen original colonies in 1787–8, and '90, and as equal parties to which twenty more States have since been admitted, all to equal rights.

It was in the beginning optional with each State whether it should adopt the Constitution or not, as is shown by the fact that Rhode Island did not ratify and was not one of the United States until the twenty-ninth of May, 1790, which was more than a year after the inauguration of our first President.

This compact derives its auth from the will of the people of the several States that ratified it, each in its sovereign capacity in Convention assembled.

Its preamble declares that it is ordained "in order to form a more perfect Union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and to our posterity;" and by a continued and strict observance of it in all its parts, we might still have enjoyed under it all those blessings.

This article is intended to vindicate the inviolability of this Constitution by which alone was formed our Union—which is in itself, "our government"—the rampart of our freedom, the rubicon of our rights, and the palladium of our liberties, by the authority of which the very men who seek to exceed its powers hold office under it, and "without which neither party nor nation, nor liberty can exist." (See N. Y. Evening Post, Aug. 22, 1861.)

WASHINGTON'S WARNING AGAINST DESTROYING THE CONSTITUTION.

It is important, likewise, that the habits of thinking, in a free country, should inspire caution in those intrusted with its administration, to confine themselves within their respective constitutional spheres, avoiding, in the exercise of the powers of one department, to encroach upon another. The spirit of encroachment tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments in one, and thus to create, whatever the form of government, a real despotism. A just estimate of that love of power, and proneness to abuse it which predominates in the human heart, is sufficient to satisfy us of this position. The necessity of reciprocal checks in the exercise of political power, by dividing and distributing it into different depositories, AND CONSTITUTING EACH THE GUARDIAN OF THE PUBLIC WEAL, AGAINST INVASION BY THE OTHERS, has been evinced by experiments, ancient and modern · some of them in our own country, and under our own eyes. To PRESERVE them must be as necessary as to INSTITUTE them. If, in the opinion of the people, the distribution or modification of the constitutional powers be, in any particular, wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment IN THE WAY WHICH THE CONSTITUTION DESIGNATES. But let there be no change by USURPATION; for though this, in one instance, may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed. The PRECEDENT must always greatly overbalance, in permanent evil, any partial or transient benefit which the use can at any time yield.—George Washington.

MADISON'S VIEWS OF CONSTITUTIONAL LIMITATIONS.

. . . To hold the union of the States as the basis of their peace and happiness; to support the Constitution, which is the cement of Union, as well in its limitations as in its authorities; to respect the rights and authorities reserved to the States and to the people, as equally incorporated with, and essential to the success of, the general system; to avoid the slightest interference with the rights of conscience, or the functions of religion, so wisely exempted from civil jurisdiction; to preserve, to their full energy, the other salutary provisions in behalf of private and personal rights, and of the freedom of the press. As far as sentiments and intentions such as these can aid the fulfillment of my duty, they will be a resource which can not fail me.—President James Madison.

THE RIGHTS OF MINORITIES.

All, too, will bear in mind this sacred principle, that, though the will of the majority is in all cases to prevail, that will, to be rightful, must be reasonable; that the minority possess her equal rights, which equal laws must protect, and to violate would be oppression.—Thomas Jefferson.

PAPERS FROM THE SOCIETY

FOR THE

Diffusion of Political Knowledge.

SPEECH OF MR. TURPIE,

DELIVERED IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, FEB. 7, 1863.

"WHEN A PARTY IN POWER VIOLATES THE CONSTITUTION AND DISREGARDS STATE-RIGHTS, PLAIN MEN WILL READ PAMPHLETS."

READ—DISCUSS—DIFFUSE.

PRESIDENT, PROF. S. F. B. MORSE,
SECRETARY, WM. McMURRAY,
TREASURER, LORING ANDREWS,

OFFICE OF THE SOCIETY,
No. 13 PARK ROW, NEW-YORK.
C. MASON, COR. SEC'Y.,
To whom all communications may be addressed.

Resolved, That it be recommended to all citizens in the various cities, counties, and villages of this and other States, who approve of the objects expressed in this Constitution, that they organize auxiliary societies, and open communication with the New-York Society, for the purpose of procuring and circulating our papers.

SPEECH OF MR. TURPIE.

MR. PRESIDENT, it would be well at first thought, it would seem, it the whole world could exist under one form of government. It would be a vast economy in the maintenance of foreign relations. It would dispense forever with the armies and navies of the globe, the eternal witnesses of national jealousy. It would settle forever the great question of the balance of power. In the community, however, it has been ordered that the interest of the whole is best promoted by the pursuit of the interest of the individual in his particular sphere. The self-interest of nations and of communities has demanded separation and different nationalities—separation not to be avoided by identity of language, by identity of religion, by geographical contiguity—not to be avoided in any event where the true and real interests of the community may dictate it.

I do not say this, sir, in justification of the crime of secession, but I say it to show how entirely imbecile and weak is the plea for national unity, founded only upon the circumstance of geographical contiguity, and the identity of race, of religion, and of language. Self-interest divides and it separates. The American Union was formed on the principle of different interests of local communities, being protected and more effectually protected by that Union than by any other means. It was formed upon the sole idea that the reserved rights of the States and the people should not be interfered with by the General Government so created.

It is useless to talk about imaginary lines not being sufficient to divide nationalities. Sir, the line which divides your own State from the Canadas is an imaginary line drawn by the compass of the surveyor. Its virtue, its power, its efficiency, are as well known to every negro-larcenous fanatic in this country as it is to that pleasant speaker of parables who darkens the Presidential mansion with his shadow and yet refuses to recognize the efficiency of a line thus drawn. If we would preserve national integrity, if we would extend and keep expanded the national domain, we shall have, above all things, to show that the interests of communities, the interests of States, the interests of Territories, the interests of the future population who are to inhabit this country, will be best subserved and protected by a national Government. The moment you abandon that doctrine, the moment the Federal Government, under any excuse, under any pretense whatever, interferes in such a way as to show that it no longer consults the reserved rights of the States and the people and the self-interest of separate communities composing it, you destroy the only tie which can bind them to our nationality.

The States made the Union; the Union did not make the States. It is a sufficient answer to the dogma that the States have no status out of the Union to say that the States existed before the Union, and must have existed out of it. The Union was formed solely upon the idea that certain rights should be reserved. What rights are they? The right of life, of liberty, of the pursuit of happiness; the right of property, its acquisition, its possession, its disposition after the death of the owner; the right of freedom of the press; the toleration of religious opinion; the right of freedom of speech; all the most sacred rights of political, domestic, and social relations are among those reserved to the States and the people, and can not be interfered with by the General Government in any manner whatever. If there had not been such a reservation the Union never could have existed; and if that reservation be destroyed, the Union will perish with its destruction.

The guardians of these rights—you may call them States, you may call them by whatever name you wish—can be nothing less than sovereign. The idea that any paramount authority may exist as to these rights destroys the reservation of the rights themselves, as it destroys the sovereignty of the community which is bound to protect and assert them. Hence, in the constitution of my State, and yours, of all the States, the crime of treason against the State is defined and punished. Treason can not be committed against less than a sovereignty; and I hold that the States themselves have enacted, and as sovereigns prescribed, the punishment for treason against the rights reserved to them and their people.

I do not wish to wrest this doctrine to my own destruction, or to the justification of any who have taken up arms against the Government. I know that the individuals, the officers of a State, may commit treason against the Federal Government. I believe that the officers of the Federal Government may commit treason against the States. The rights, the duties, and the dangers of the States and the Federal Government are mutual and reciprocal. There should be no trespass either upon the one hand or the other. The crime of treason may be committed against State government as well as against Federal authority.

There are many crimes, however, against the rights of the States and against the rights of the people which are below the grade of treason. There are misdemeanors, offenses less than treason. There are vile frauds, there are most contemptible and cowardly impositions, as fatal to State dignity and State sovereignty as treason itself. The proposition embodied in this bill is one of that character. It is worse than a crime. It is worse than a crime because it lacks the boldness of execution. It is meaner than a crime because you can not fasten it upon the person who seeks to perpetrate it, or upon the power which seeks to commit it. What is this proposition? It is a proposition to interfere with the rights of property in the State of Missouri, and to interfere in the most powerful manner—to interfere by an appeal to the basest passion of humanity, the love of money. The loyalty of Missouri, it seems, has been weighed and measured. It is worth ten millions in cash or twenty millions on credit. I will not pursue the tenor of this thought. It would be doing injustice to the people of a great State to say any thing further about it; nor will I vote the value of a penny to bribe the legislative or popular action of the State of Missouri, upon the subject of their domestic institutions, in any way whatever.

This is a direct bribe offered by the Federal Government, under the authority of the Federal Government, for legislative and popular action against the rights of property in the State of Missouri. If you can buy the property rights of Missouri, you can purchase any others. What reasons are assigned for this most extraordinary conduct? In the first place, it is said that Missouri is willing. Does that change our constitutional obligations as Senators and conservators of the Federal compact? Does that give us the right to intervene or interfere? We are told that the fidelity of Missouri to the Union is to depend upon the result of the bill now pending. I heard with regret the Senator from that State [Mr. HENDERSON] say that unless this bill passed, he would not say what the result would be, but he feared it; that he should leave the State and cast his fortunes with the Union; intimating that the State might leave the Union if this bill was not passed.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President—

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana give way?

Mr. TURPIE. With all due deference to the Senator, I will not.

Sir, I am sorry that any such appeal should be made to the Senate. I will not under such a threat, as I take it, do so great an injustice to the people of Missouri, or to those of Indiana, as to vote for a measure of this character. Nor do I believe that the triumph of the Federal cause is to be affected either in Missouri or elsewhere by the defeat or the success of this bill. The American people have undertaken a sublime task, the restoration of our nationality. Does the Senator from Missouri doubt the success of that effort? I do not. I never have. There is a God in heaven for the brave. I believe that no power short of that which arrested Saul on his journey from Jerusalem to Damascus can prevent the accomplishment of that result. I believe that no legislation as suggested by this bill can retard or accelerate the result.

The Administration, to be sure, are laboring under difficulties every day increasing. France, England, Horace Greeley, and the other great powers [laughter] are to be watched and conciliated; McClellan, the patriot without a peer, is to be crushed out and forgotten; Giddings and Garrison, and other domestic enemies of the country's peace, are to be pensioned and provided for; the Porters, by land and sea, are to be punished; the rebels are to be driven out of the State of Missouri; and the draft is yet to be enforced in Massachusetts. These are most arduous labors, and I bespeak for those who have undertaken them not only the coöperation of their friends, but the sympathy of their political opponents, and the neutrality at least of all the world and the balance of mankind. [Laughter.]

But, sir, I do not think that what the Administration has undertaken has any thing to do with the great popular task of the country. Senators are continually saying here, day after day, that unless the country is saved during this Administration, it can not be saved at all. I am of the contrary opinion. I think that, as far as the present Administration is concerned, the Executive has lost the confidence of the people of both sections of this land. He has lost the confidence of the North and the South. He is thoroughly imbued with the fanatical abolition notions of the New-England school. It would be impossible for any man, or any set of men, to operate harmoniously and effectually during the existence of this Administration for the purpose of doing the country any good, or taking any important step towards a final restoration of the political relations formerly existing between these States.

A UNION WORTH HAVING.

I know, sir, that Senators are constantly talking about the Union. I do not wish to be exceeded by any man in my devotion to the American Union. I have spoken for the Union; I have written for the Union; I have fought and acted for the Union when those who now claim to be its ardent friends were willing, under certain contingencies, to let it slide. But I ask you, sir, what do Senators mean by the Union? It is by what they mean, not what they say, that we must judge them. If it is meant by the Union to purchase the negro slaves of Missouri or elsewhere, and pay for them out of the people's money and the public Treasury, I am not for it. If you mean by the Union the support of these fugitive contrabands, these pariahs of the South who escape within our military limits, and the feeding and clothing of these creatures, to the desertion, starvation, and destitution of the soldiers of the Federal Army—if you mean that by the Union, I am not for it. If you mean by the Union the absorption by the Federal Government of the reserved rights of the States and the people I am not for it. But if you mean by the Union the restoration of the national authority upon every foot of the national soil; if you mean by the Union the preservation of the national fame and of the national flag; the flag which waved at Bunker Hill, at Saratoga, at Yorktown, at Palo Alto, at Chepultepec, at Shiloh, and at Donelson—that flag with not a stripe obliterated, and with every star undimmed; the only flag in the world which floats over a limited Government and a free people—if you mean that by the Union, I am for it now and forever.

But, sir, it is said as an additional reason why we should pass this measure, that it will aid the State of Missouri in emancipation. The object is said to be humane and philanthropic. It may be extremely charitable; but I ask you, sir, why has Congress, why has the General Government exclusively confined its charities to Africans in servitude, and to the wants of the negro race? Are there no other sufferers upon whom this money might be expended? Whole regiments now serving under the flag of your country have gone upaid for months. The wives and children of soldiers, a vast constituency at home, are begging daily for bread. I should sooner vote an appropriation of ten or twenty millions for such a purpose than for any purpose presented in this bill.

THIS MOVEMENT UNNATURAL.

What is our action, and what can be its result? Do you call this strengthening the hands of the President? Do you call it strengthening the Administration? Do you call it filling up the ranks of the Army and encouraging the Union cause? I say that this course of conduct can bring nothing but danger and dishonor upon the country. It will be seen that millions of the national treasury are squandered for abolition purposes in Missouri and elsewhere, and that the soldier in the field remains unpaid, and sometimes unfed, and unclothed. I take it, that Senators would show their devotion to the Union in passing by such measures as the one at present urged, and giving their attention solely and wholly to the condition of the country, and the wants of that large constituency of unpurchased and unpurchasable patriotism which has shown its love of country by bearing arms in the field. Talk about the loyalty of Missouri—the purchased love of the prostitute; one that has to be bought with money, and paid for with money! Would you foster and cherish that feeling, if such exists? I would not dishonor the State by saying that I believe in its existence; but would you foster and cherish that mercenary affection to the destruction of the interests of all those portions of our fellow-citizens who are demanding this money, and demanding, in fact, all the resources and support of the Government which we can possibly give them?

Why should there be an intervention and interference in the case of Missouri? Pennsylvania and New-York were formerly slave States. At the close of the Revolution a large amount of capital was invested in those States in slave property. The institution has disappeared from those States, and how? By virtue of the voluntary legislative action of the people and their representatives. I ask Senators, why should the slaveholders of Missouri be paid for their property out of the national treasury any more than the slaveholders of New-York and Pennsylvania? I ask those, particularly, differing with me in political faith; I ask those Senators who have built up political fortunes upon their pretended hatred of this institution, and their pretended opposition to Southern rights, why they now propose to tax the free people of the loyal North and South; why they propose to tax the national treasury for the special benefit of the slaveholder, the slave-breeder, and the slave-driver, of Missouri?

Sir, the State which I in part represent will yield to no State in the Confederacy in its devotion to the Union. Indiana, the gift of Virginia to the nation, loves the Union for the giver's sake. She hopes yet to see the mother of States and statesmen restored and reconciled to all her children. Although the people of Indiana, at any time before the existence of war by the act of the public enemy, at any time before the Federal flag was fired upon by the traitor-band of South-Carolina at Sumter, would have accepted the Crittenden proposition, the Border State proposition, or any of those propositions, as a settlement of the difficulties between the sections, yet when war came, she waged war; not because she desired it, but because she believed we must have war, or worse; we must either have war or a dissevered nationality; we must have either war or abandon the Government to its enemies. Indiana still follows the flag of the Union. The bones of her gallant sons, fallen in this great struggle, mingle in the soil of every battle-field from Missouri to the Rappahanock. Indiana now is not for war—she never has been; she is not for peace; she is not for either of these things, except as a means to an end—that end, the restoration of the Union and the unity of the States. If the war is not waged with that purpose, I am for peace to-day. If it is found that that purpose is impracticable or impossible, I am for a cessation of hostilities this moment.

PEACE AND UNION THE END OF THE WAR.

Sir, the people of Indiana have not gone into this contest blindfolded. They surveyed the whole field. They counted the cost. They knew what it would cost to make the effort. They knew it would cost more not to make it. They are not for separation. They are for national integrity at whatever cost, and by whatever means, whether belligerent or pacific, by which that object may be effected. If mediation is to be proposed as a settlement, the people of Indiana will ask why the mediation of New-York, of New-Jersey, of Kentucky, of Illinois; why the mediation of these sovereignties should not be received and accepted, as well as the mediation of France or England, either in regard to the termination of the war or the policy with which it may be conducted. They will ask why was Crittenden rejected as a mediator and any one else preferred? That they will ask, and they will require an answer. As dear as the Union is to Indiana, and as dear as it is to every loyal citizen, it is not of more value than the rights of the States and the people. The same treasure and the same blood that I should be willing to expend in the preservation of the one, I shall spend just as freely in the security and the protection of the other.

THIS MEASURE OUGHT TO ALARM THE STATES.

It is asked, but it is has not been answered, what power under the Constitution we have to make this appropriation. The Chief Magistrate of the country, when he introduced the resolution inaugurating this policy, and since, has declared that there is no power under the Constitution by which it can be carried out and effected. He has admitted that it is extra-constitutional, and beyond the powers specified in that instrument. Have we had any change in the Constitution? How could a change have been effected? We do not distinguish between power and authority. Will it be for a moment claimed that the present Chief Magistrate of the Union has any more authority than the one who preceded him, or the one before that? It can not be. He may have more power. How has he achieved that power? By calling into his hand the military force of the country, by largely increasing the army and navy; but it has given him no shadow of authority more than that which was possessed by his predecessors.

This appropriation is asked for under the war power. It is claimed by Senators to be necessary to crush out the rebellion, to vindicate the national law and the national authority in the State of Missouri. This war power is a most singular article. India-rubber has had some reputation heretofore for being elastic; gold and silver for being malleable and ductile; but sir, they must yield to this war power in all those qualities. Why, sir, it

"Lives through all life, extends through all extent, Spreads undivided, operates unspent."

WAR POWER A COVER FOR REVOLUTION.

The President is the first great reservoir of this war power. He is Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy. Why is he Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy? Because he is President, and not for any other reason. I take it to be a settled principle of the Government that the military is always subordinate to the civil power. I take it that the powers of the Commander-in-Chief are subordinate to the powers of the President; and that an act of the Commander-in-Chief against the Constitution and beyond the Constitution can not be justified any more than can an act of the President. The war powers of both Congress and the President are subordinate to civil authority. The President is said to be the grand receptacle of these war powers. The heads of departments have, of course, some of them. Some are claimed for Congress. We are now called upon to exercise our share of these extraordinary powers in the passage of this bill. The Governors of the States have claimed some of these powers. They have been distributed down to a multitude, whom no man can number, of provost-marshals, scattered in every village between the two oceans, except Ceredo and Oberlin, which, being inhabited wholly by white and black Africans, needed no such guardians of loyalty.

It is a most remarkable power—this war power of the Constitution—so much so, that I doubt its existence altogether. It is a myth; it is a fiction; it has no existence. The Chief Executive has laid down what this power is. He says it is the power on his part to do any thing which he may consider necessary to crush the rebellion. That is the only limit to it—his own discretion. Can he lengthen his own term of office? Most certainly he can under the war power, if he should think it necessary to crush the rebellion. Can he increase his pay? Most certainly he can, just as easily as he can issue a proclamation affecting the rights of property in any of the States. There is no limit to the power, and there can be none. I take it, sir, that when you thus place the power in the hands of one man to control the army and navy, and the purse of a great nation, without restriction and without limit, you have erected a military despotism. You call him the President. In France he is called the Emperor; in Austria, the Emperor; in Russia, the Czar. The American Czar will find no serfs west of the Alleghanies. It is not proposed to surrender the most sacred rights which were reserved at the time of the formation of the Constitution to the States and to the people; there can be no necessity for their destruction.

Why, sir, under this war power you may exercise any authority whatever. It is useless for us to say that an act does not conduce to the crushing of the rebellion; if the Executive thinks differently, that is the law. I think that the defeat of this Missouri bill will strengthen the Federal Government, not only in Missouri, but elsewhere. I hope it will be defeated; but if Congress, to whom is deputed a part of this remarkable power, thinks differently, away goes your safeguard on the Treasury, and away go all the restrictions and limits which have been thrown around the rights of property in the several States, and the Constitution, instead of being a living ordinance, becomes only a "quiet dogma of the past."

What will be the effect of this continual interference and intervention by the Federal Government with the rights of the States and the people? What has been its effect already? Do we not read it in the signs of the times? As far as one act, treason, is concerned, the officers and people of certain States have taken up arms against the Federal Government. As far as the other act is concerned, it is proposed not to take up arms, but to interfere and intervene by the power of the purse with the domestic institutions of the States. That power, that inference is no more to be justified than the other. Much has been accomplished by indirection since the commencement of the present policy, which no man could have justified or accomplished directly. We find ourselves now in the prosecution of a war where abolition is coincident with military success, simply by this same method of indirection. Forces have been called out, arms have been placed in their hands ostensibly and avowedly for the purpose of protecting the national Government against the treason of certain States, and after they have been so called out, by this same indirection, the whole force is converted from its original intention, and a crusade is undertaken and waged against the very rights which the General Government is bound to protect; for, as I said before, I believe that the rights of the States and of the General Government are mutual. The General Government guarantees to the States a republican form of Government. It guarantees the safety and protection of the rights of which I have spoken, and it can not interfere with those rights without abandoning its constitutional limitations, and without a breach of the guarantees which it gave the State at the time of her admission.

Hence there are no circumstances which would induce me to vote for the bill under consideration. I regard it as a violation of the reserved rights of the people of Missouri. I regard it as a violation of constitutional obligations upon our part; and let me say that while we are waging a war for the law, we ought to wage it under the law, and we ought not to violate the law. Without the law there is no transgression. Without law there is no rebellion. And if Congress and the General Government insist upon a breach, a serious infraction of the Constitution in regard to the rights of any of the States, we can not tell how far that breach may go, or can tell what effect it may have upon the whole character of the Government.

I say nothing, sir, now, of that new treason which we have heard whispered in high places, that the army of the Union is to be recalled, that there is to be no further effort to save the Government, but that the force is all to be exhausted for the purpose of saving the Administration. I say nothing about that except this, as far as the State which I represent is concerned, we are not disposed to abandon the Union; we are not yet disposed to accept separation as a necessity; we are not disposed to accept separation as an alternative rather than recognize the right of the Southern States to a peculiar species of property. No, sir; I charge Senators to avoid this crime against nationality. The people of the North-west, the people of the great central States have recently decided upon these very questions. In those States there was no contest as to whether the integrity of the Government should be maintained. The question in the late canvass related to whether there should be a change of its form by our own agency. Upon that question the verdict of Indiana, of Illinois, of New-Jersey, and of other States, was rendered. Determining that, while the Government should be supported, while it should receive money, while it should receive men from the States guaranteeing the vindication of the national sovereignty, there should be no interference whatever by the Federal Government with the rights of the States themselves. Let not Senators mistake this as the verdict or as the action of a party. As far as the result of the election in Indiana was concerned, it was distinctly the action of the people, not of any party, against every possible discouragement that could be thrown upon that action. Less attention was paid to party organization, less attention was paid to party drill and party instrumentalities, than in any contest we have ever had in the North-west. It was a pure, plain decision upon the question as to whether, for any purposes, the rights of the people should be violated; as to whether, for any purposes, freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom of debate and discussion could be trampled under foot by the hand of military power. That was the question raised and decided. Let us heed that warning. Let us retrace our steps. Let us say some fault has been committed. Let us heed the protest which the States have entered. The Federal Government will do well to regard it. The Government is worth more than this Administration; it is worth more than any other. It should work for perpetuity. It should work for all time to the health and safety of the nation, which I pray may exist forever as the fathers formed it.

TRICK OF THE RADICAL PARTY TO DRAW CONSERVATIVES INTO WAR.

At an early stage of the political contest of which I have spoken, great efforts were used to blind the people as to the questions really at issue. The Republican party in my State disbanded its organization; it claimed to be no party; it claimed to have no issue but a vigorous prosecution of the war; it called itself "Union;" and at a very early stage of the same canvass, a select coterie of negro maniacs, acting under semblance of law, calling themselves a Grand Jury of the United States District Court, affected to present the Democratic party and its organization as disloyal and traitorous to the country. More than that, prominent members and leaders of the party all over the State were arrested, and without cause imprisoned. I myself made a canvass during the last summer under threats, every day, of personal violence, and with my pockets filled with anonymous letters to the same effect. The presses of the party were closed, in some instances; were torn down and destroyed in others. Every effort was made even in that State, always loyal, to suppress a free, clear, plain expression of the people; but the effort failed. The people did speak, and they spoke what I have here said in the Senate.

I know that Senators have disparaged here the discussion of party questions. They have said: "A million men are now in the field, Democrats and Republicans, fighting side by side; with them there is no quarrel; with them there is no difference; why can there not be unanimity and friendship here?" I ask the same question, why? Talk about parties! How do you make parties? How are they created? You can not make them out of conventions and platforms. They are built upon issues. That is the way the present parties are formed and divided. Who are responsible for these issues? The Senators to my right [the Republicans] and their political associates. When the President of the United States issued his proclamation, calling upon the military force of the country to avenge the insult offered to the national flag at Fort Sumter, all men rallied, without distinction of party, to the support of that banner. There was literally no party. And when Congress met here in special session, in the summer immediately succeeding the proclamation, the same unanimity prevailed. Congress then said that this war should not be prosecuted in the spirit of conquest or subjugation, and it should not interfere with the rights, the dignity, or the institutions of the States. Congress adjourned; it went home and found a united constituency. What has divided us? I will tell you, sir. Do you recollect the victory of Fort Donelson? I know you do. You recollect with what rejoicing every loyal heart received the intelligence of the success of the Union arms. Two days after that victory, a special message was submitted to the American Congress. What was it? Congratulating the people on the return of Tennessee to the Union? Inviting again the States of the South to renew their love and allegiance to the General Government? No, sir. It was confined to the sole object of the "abolishment" of African slavery. Why "abolishment?" Why not say "abolition"? Because then the measure would have been christened at once with the approbium and contempt it deserved. An obsolete term, a word almost unheard hitherto in the language, must be selected and placed in this message to discriminate its doctrines from the disgraceful heresies of that school of fanaticism, which has so often met defeat with proclamation, and made victory itself almost contemptible. That was the first thing that presented these issues of which Senators complain. Other measures of a similar character rapidly followed, which have made party in this country a virtue and a necessity.

ABOLITION THE SOLE ANIMUS OF THE RADICAL PARTY.

There was an appropriation here at the last session of $1,000,000 for abolition purposes in the District of Columbia. Who presented it? Who voted for it? Who carried it against the protest of the people? The Senators to my right; those who are complaining about party discussions and party feeling in this hall. When did they do it? When did they propose to squander this vast sum to gratify the fanaticism of a section with which they are connected, and for which they claim all the loyalty? It was when a rebel army was threatening the possession of the capital itself; when, from the dome of this structure, you might have seen the rebel flag floating—when five hundred thousand men were in arms against this Government. It was at such a time that these men could not forget the flesh-pots of Chicago, but must insist upon party action and party legislation. It is that which has divided a once united people. There is no other cause whatever. If this war had been prosecuted in the spirit in which it was commenced, if it was now prosecuted with an eye single to the purpose of restoring nationality, the people of Indiana, the people of other States would require no draft to certify to a compelled loyalty; they would follow the flag of the Union in myriads more countless than those which followed Peter the Hermit to rescue the sepulcher of Christ from the infidel.

But, sir, it is because you have abandoned the original policy of the war, because you have abandoned the constitutional mode of a reconstruction of the Government, that you have divided the people of the loyal States, and that you have again sowed the seeds of party debate and discussion. I know it is asked at such a time as this will you still continue these wranglings? Let me ask of these Senators, will they postpone these abolltion measures which have already dishonored and ruined the country to so great an extent; will they postpone this thing of buying negroes and paying for them out of the public treasury; will they postpone these other enormities; will they postpone this direct infraction upon the rights of the people of Missouri? If they will postpone these things we will postpone discussion and debate, not otherwise; and I here make the offer, and I know that every person acting politically with me will accede to it, that we bury party; that we forget differences; that we cease discussion and debate, provided they will cease the presentation and urgency of these measures with which they have so often hitherto disgraced the country.

It would, indeed, sir, be a felicitous thing if we of the loyal States could look back upon the history of a once united people and say there was no blot on our escutcheon; that we had never transcended constitutional limits, never stopped to interfere with the constitutional reservation of the rights of any of the States. That brings me to the most important consideration in the passage of the bill—the one I have already alluded to—the effect of this policy of interference and intervention. From the beginning it has been disastrous. If I had the power to blot out the words most hateful to me in the history of my section, I would erase the words "Harper's Ferry." We are never done reading of Federal misfortunes which have clouded Harper's Ferry; and why? At other places we have seen the backs of the rebels; there we have shown them ours. At other places victory has perched upon our eagles; at Harper's Ferry we have had nothing but disaster, defeat, and discomfiture. It is the place where first was raised the hand of Northern fanaticism against the reserved rights and sovereignty of a great State of this Union. It is a spot consecrated to eternal shame and infamy; it is the "damned spot that will never out." Sumter shall equal it in dishonor; but Sumter followed. This may be treason; but it is truth also. If our record of the North was clear, was plain, was unclouded, with what virtue, with what force, with what renewed efficacy we might go before the world and ask its judgment in our favor in regard to the present contest. Do Senators still desire to continue to agitate this most odious doctrine of interference with the sovereignty of the States? Do they still desire to continue to agitate this dangerous and disgraceful element in the political history of the country? If they do, let them vote for the Missouri bill.

But, sir, if Senators desire to return to the constitutional landmarks; if they desire to make this war specially for the Union and for nothing else; if Senators desire to place the merits of this contest wholly and solely upon the question of national integrity, let us defeat this bill let us say to Missouri: "If slavery is an incubus and an evil, it is one for which the Federal Government is not responsible; it is one for which the people of Indiana, the people of Virginia, the people of Kentucky, the people of no State in this Union are answerable, except the people of Missouri themselves." For good or for evil they chose this institution. They have recognized, cherished, fostered and supported it; and for one, rejoiced as I would be to hear of its disappearance, I am not willing to lift a finger to tax my people or the national Treasury in aid of any such eleemosynary project. We can find other uses for the public treasure more consonant with the national honor, national unity, and national peace.

Extracts from Webster's Reply to Hayne on the Constitution.

Mr. President, the nature of sovereignty or sovereign power has been extensively discussed by gentlemen on this occasion, as it generally is when the origin of our government is debated. But I confess myself not entirely satisfied with arguments and illustrations drawn from that topic. The sovereignty of government is an idea belonging to the other side of the Atlantic. No such thing is known in North America. Our governments are all limited. In Europe, sovereignty is of feudal origin, and imports no more than the state of the sovereign. It comprises his rights, duties, exemptions, prerogatives, and powers. But with us, all power is with the people. They alone are sovereign; and they erect what governments they please, and confer on them such powers as they please. None of these governments is sovereign, in the European sense of the word, all being restrained by written constitutions. It seems to me, therefore, that we only perplex ourselves when we attempt to explain the relations existing between the general government and the several State governments, according to those ideas of sovereignty which prevail under systems essentially different from our own.

The Constitution of the United States creates direct relations between this government and individuals. This government may punish individuals for treason, and all other crimes in the code, when committed against the United States. It has power, also, to tax individuals, in any mode, and to any extent; and it possesses the further power of demanding from individuals military service. Nothing, certainly, can more clearly distinguish a government from a confederation of States than the possession of these powers. No closer relations can exist between individuals and any government.

On the other hand, the government owes high and solemn duties to every citizen of the country. It is bound to protect him in his most important rights and interests. It makes war for his protection, and no other government in the country can make war. It makes peace for his protection, and no other government can make peace. It maintains armies and navies for his defence and security, and no other government is allowed to maintain them. He goes abroad beneath its flag, and carries over all the earth a national character imparted to him by this government, and which no other government can impart. In whatever relates to war, to peace, to commerce, he knows no other government. All these, sir, are connections as dear and as sacred as can bind individuals to any government on earth. It is not, therefore, a compact between States, but a government proper, operating directly upon individuals, yielding to them protection on the one hand, and demanding from them obedience on the other.

The truth is, Mr. President and no ingenuity of argument, no subtility of distinction can evade it, that, as to certain purposes, the people of the United States are one people. They are one in making war, and one in making peace; they are one in regulating commerce, and one in laying duties of imposts. The very end and purpose of the Constitution was, to make them one people in these particulars; and it has effectually accomplished its object. All this is apparent on the face of the Constitution itself. I have already said, sir, that to obtain a power of direct legislation over the people, especially in regard to imposts, was always prominent as a reason for getting rid of the Confederation, and forming a new Constitution. Among innumerable proofs of this, before the assembling of the Convention, allow me to refer only to the report of the committee of the old Congress, July, 1785.

The people, sir, in every State, live under two governments. They owe obedience to both. These governments, though distinct, are not adverse. Each has its separate sphere, and its peculiar powers and duties. It is not a contest between two sovereigns for the same power, like the wars of the rival houses in England; nor is it a dispute between a government de facto and a government de jure. It is the case of a division of powers between two governments, made by the people, to whom both are responsible. Neither can dispense with the duty which individuals owe to the other: neither can call itself master of the other: the people are masters of both. The division of power, it is true, is in a great measure unknown in Europe. It is the peculiar system of America; and, although new and singular, it is not incomprehensible. The State constitutions are established by the people of the States. This Constitution is established by the people of all the States.

Habeas Corpus.

In order to show what great principles of human freedom have been assassinated by this bill, we have only to refer to the well-settled maxims of law. First, it strikes down the writ of habeas corpus:

CHIEF-JUSTICE BLACKSTONE SAYS.

"Next to personal security," says Mr. Justice Blackstone, "the law of England regards, asserts, and preserves the personal liberty of individuals. This personal liberty consists in the power of locomotion, of changing situation, or moving one's person to whatsoever place one's own inclinations may direct, without imprisonment or restraint, unless by due course of law.

"By the Petition of Right, 3 Car. 1st, it is enacted that no person shall be imprisoned or detained without cause shown, to which he make answer according to law. By Car. 1st, ch. 10, if any person be restrained of his liberty by order or decree of any illegal court, or by the command of the King's Majesty in person, or by warrant of the council-board, or of any of the privy council, he shall upon demand of his counsel have a writ of habeas corpus to bring his body before the Court of King's Bench or Common Pleas, who shall determine whether the cause of his commitment be just, and hereupon to do as to justice shall appertain.

"To bereave a man of life, or by violence to confiscate his estate without accusation or trial, would be so gross and notorious an act of despotism as must at once convey the alarm of tyranny throughout the whole kingdom; but confinement of the person, by secretly hurrying him to jail, where his sufferings are unknown, or forgotten, is a less public, a less striking, and therefore a more dangerous engine of arbitrary government. And yet sometimes, when the state is in real danger, even this may be a necessary measure. But the happiness of our own Constitution is, that it is not left to the executive power to determine when the danger of the state is so great as to render this measure expedient; for it is the Parliament only, or legislative power, that, whenever it sees proper, can authorize the Crown, by suspending habeas corpus act for a short and limited time, to imprison suspected persons, without giving any reason for so doing."—Commentaries on the Laws of England, vol. i. pp. 135–136.

READ—DISCUSS—DIFFUSE.

PRESIDENT, PROF. S. F. B. MORSE,
SECRETARY, WM. McMURRAY,
TREASURER, LORING ANDREWS,

OFFICE OF THE SOCIETY,
No. 13 PARK ROW, NEW-YORK.
C. MASON, COR. SEC'Y.,
To whom all communications may be addressed.

Resolved, That it be recommended to all citizens in the various cities, counties, and villages of this and other States, who approve of the objects expressed in this Constitution, that they organize auxiliary societies, and open communication with the New-York Society for the purpose of procuring and circulating our papers.

SPEECH OF THE HON. JAMES BROOKS.

THE President of the Union Democratic Association, after some appropriate remarks upon the services rendered by the Association, said, that a speaker would now address them, by whose ability and eloquence, the large audience present would be well rewarded for their attendance on so stormy an evening. He, therefore, introduced the HON. JAMES BROOKS. After the repeated and prolonged cheering that welcomed Mr. Brooks, had subsided, he said:

MR. CHAIRMAN AND GENTLEMEN: If any of you expect from me this evening, any exciting, or excited remarks, you will be disappointed. There are times so impressive, crises in public affairs so solemn, that any flourishes of rhetoric, any pompous display of periods, or sesquipedalian words, but detract from the gravity and dignity of the theme. Hence, in the crisis of a civil war like ours, where the blood of kith and kin is poured forth like water, and when the civil war is becoming complicated in fresher, and yet more fearful issues, the simplest language becomes the sublimest expression. (Applause.) The ancient heathen orators in times like these, when they were wont to address their public assemblies invoked their Dii Immortales, their Immortal gods. How much more then, should Christians, who assemble now, in the midst of Battle and Blood, invoke the immortal God to guide our deliberations. (Applause.)

THE TWO PROCLAMATIONS AND WAR ORDER OF SEPTEMBER, 1862.

When I last had the honor of addressing this Association, late in September last, there were threatening the people two PROCLAMATIONS and one War ORDER: One Proclamation threatening the people of the North, that if they discussed the other, the War Order would, through Courts Martial or Provost Martials, suspend Process, Bail, Jury Trial, Habeas Corpus, and arrest and incarcerate all engaged in such discussion. The Civil Courts were to be suspended, and Military Courts were to be substituted in their places. The very first opportunity after the promulgation of these Edicts, I ventured in this Hall to denounce them, as in violation, not only of Magna Charta, the Common Law of England and of the United States, and of the rights of man, but of the Constitution of the United States, and of our State of New-York; and you, in your responses, here in this Hall and elsewhere, so ably, so eloquently supported and cheered me, that the Edicts fell powerless before a brave and determined People. The President, indeed, who fulminated these Edicts, under the influence of our, and other elections, the offspring of what we proclaimed, we would have, namely, free discussion, recalled, nullified, abrogated his War Order, and that Proclamation Edict which threatened to subvert all Liberty in the North. The Provost-Marshals shrank back before the majesty of an indignant People, and the Judges and the Courts were reinaugurated, reinstalled by that People. (Cheers.)

But, gentlemen, there is left now another proclamation, not annulled—that, for the South and South-West—in force, or if possible, to be put in force January first, 1863 — which I propose this evening more fully to discuss. (Applause.) The President does not claim, nor do the President's friends claim, that for this Proclamation he has any warrant, in, or under the Constitution of the United States — whereby, thus, he subverts, or attempts to subvert, whole States with all the organizations of their society — their statute, their civil, their municipal, as well as their constitutional laws; nor does he claim, that under the laws of nations, he has any such prerogative or power, save what is indefinitely declared to be the laws of war, the war power, or the military necessity of war. I propose, this evening, gentlemen, to discuss all these weighty matters, and you must put up with, as a necessity of this discussion, the recitation of some of our past history, and with the reading of such documents as proof makes necessary, however heavy such reading may be in a popular assembly. (Cries of "Go on. It is what we want to hear.")

WAR FOR THE CONSTITUTION.

Gentlemen, as I said at the start, we are in the midst of a bloody civil war, the magnitude of which is unlike any thing in the record of human history, except the civil wars of Rome, that drenched the huge Roman Empire in human gore. We, who are not of the Administration, were driven into this war, reluctantly driven in, by the force of unhappy events, and by the then solemn pledge of the Administration, that it was a war, only to maintain the Government and the Constitution of the United States, with the integrity of the Union. (Applause.) We are not now, and we never pretended to be, supporters of the Administration. We drew at first, as we draw now, the constitutional distinction between supporting the Government, and a temporary Administration of that Government. (Applause.) We recognize no loyalty, nor fealty, nor allegiance due to any mere administration of the Government, to no mere man, in no one branch of it — Executive, Legislative, or Judicial — but we do recognize fealty, loyalty, love, devotion, with the whole heart and soul, as due to that great charter of human liberty known as the Constitution of the United States. (Loud and prolonged cheering.) That Constitution in my earlier days, when not as well booked up as I am now I supposed to be some impromptu inspiration of Divine Wisdom, far above all human intelligence, or human instinct — the work of men inspired, as were the Holy Apostles, who handed down to us the Holy Scriptures, and I revered and worshiped that Constitution as the Bible guide on earth to men struggling for Law and Liberty. But upon fuller and maturer reading, I discovered, that our Fathers of the Constitution were not so much inspired men, as condensers or codifiers of centuries of human wisdon, the writers up, and abridgers of human law, the common law of England — of the principles, rights, liberties, our British forefathers, after five or six centuries of struggle, wrested from the Kings and Despots of England, and affixed to great charters of Human Rights, the Magna Charta of 1215 won sword in hand by the Barons of England from King John, or the Petition of Rights, 1628, or the Habeas Corpus, 1679, or the Bill of Rights, 1689. The Constitution of the United States brought to a focus these great Lights of Liberty, Law, Human Progress and Civilization. The eyes of our fathers were then but the lenses of the Past to see their Present, and so to provide for the great Future. (Applause.)

THE IMMEDIATE CAUSE AND THE PLEDGE OF THE WAR.

Hence, when in December, now two years gone by, after the Presidential election, there assembled in South-Carolina, a Convention of the States, enacting an ordinance of secession, separating that State from the United States and from the Constitution of the United States, which had not gratified South-Carolina in that election; hence, when in the subsequent February there assembled in Montgomery, Alabama, a convention of a few other States, subverting and annulling the Constitution of the United States, and not only that, but creating a new Constitution, and changing the old Flag — both the reason and the sentiment of the country felt indignant, and uprose to express that indignation. The magazine so well prepared for explosion during twenty-five years of preparation by extreme men, both North and South, was fired at Fort Sumter, and the explosion took place, involving some thirty millions of people in its destruction. The North uprose in mass almost — not to maintain or uphold Abraham Lincoln, or the Cabinet Administration of Abraham Lincoln — but to uphold the Constitution, the three branches of the Government of the United States, its Judiciary as well as its Executive and Legislative authority. (Applause.) "The Constitution shall be maintained:" "The Flag shall be respected:" "The Union must and shall be preserved," were the universal rallying cries of the Northern People. (Applause.) The Rebel Enemy authoritatively, through one of its Cabinet officers, (Mr. Walker,) avowed its intent to march upon, and to seize, Washington;—and hence, when the President called for his 75,000 men, more than a million were earnest to volunteer to protect the Capital, to uphold the Flag, to stand by the Constitution. The war then, was solely and avowedly for the maintenance of the Constitution, and the Flag as the symbol of that Constitution.

THE PLEDGE OF THE INAUGURAL.

The President himself, in his Inaugural, March 4th, 1861, thus pledged himself against the Abolitionists in his own party, and against his Proclamation of Abolitionism:

"I have no purpose, directly or indirectly, to INTERFERE with the institution of slavery in the States where it exists. I believe I have no lawful right to do so, and I have no intention to do so."

THE PLEDGES OF THE HOUSE.

The House of Representatives, by a nearly unanimous vote, in February, 1861, passed the following resolutions:

Resolved, That neither the Federal Government nor the people or government of the non-slaveholding States have a purpose or a constitutional right to legislate upon or interfere with slavery in any of the States of the Union.

Resolved, That those persons in the North who do not subscribe to the foregoing proposition are too insignificant in numbers and influence to excite the serious attention or alarm of any portion of the people of the Republic, and that the increase of their numbers and influence does not keep pace with the increase of the aggregate population of the Union.

THE CRITTENDEN PLEDGE.

In July, 1861, was introduced into the House, and passed almost unanimously, (only two dissenting,) the well-known Crittenden Pledge or Resolution, namely:

"That the present deplorable civil war has been forced upon the country by the disunionists of the Southern States, now in arms against the constitutional government, and in arms around Capitol; that in this national emergency, Congress, banishing all feeling of mere passion and resentment, will recollect only its duty to the whole country; that this war is not waged on their part in any spirit of oppression, or for any purpose of conquest or subjugation, or purpose of overthrowing or interfering with the rights or established institutions of those States, but to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution, and to preserve the Union with all the dignity, equality and rights of the several States unimpaired; and that, as soon as these objects are accomplished, the war ought to cease."

THE SENATE PLEDGE.

In the Senate, Mr. Sherman, of Ohio, had introduced, and the Senate had passed, a like resolution. Thus, three branches of the Legislative Government—the Executive, the Senate, the House—solemnly pledged itself to the country to carry on a war, only for the SUPREMACY OF THE CONSTITUTION. The armies were created, and the soldiers were enlisted upon that solemn pledge—and, upon many a battle-field, many a life has been freely offered up to carry out, defend, protect, and promulgate that pledge. This was the war, the North entered into—the war of the Conservative men of the North—the war of the great Democratic Party. We never committed ourselves to any other war, (cheers,) and they who are for breaking these pledges, or for creating another war—or who have committed us to, or enlisted us in this war, under what now seems false pretences or false pledges—they are in honor bound to dismiss us from this war, and to carry it on, themselves. (Loud and prolonged cheering, many of the audience rising and waving their hats.)

These being the pledges of Mr. Lincoln, the President, and of the Congress assembled in Washington, now look at the reverse picture, and say, who can, that the whole purpose, the whole programme of the war have not been changed? Say, who can, that twenty millions of Northern white men are not now called upon to endure Conscription and Taxation, and to sacrifice themselves in Southern latitudes, mainly to free three or four millions of negroes. (Applause.) The President in his September 22d Proclamation says:

"On the first day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-three, all persons held as slaves within any State, or any designated part of a State, the people whereof shall then be in rebellion against the United States, shall be thenceforward, and then, forever free; and the Executive Government of the United States, including the military and naval AUTHORITY thereof, will recognize and maintain the freedom of such persons, or any of them, in ANY effort, they may make for their actual freedom."

THE PRESIDENT'S EXTRAORDINARY USE OF WORDS.

Let me first call attention here to the extraordinary words of the Proclamation. The President speaks of himself, elected but for four years, two of them now nearly expired, as the EXECUTIVE GOVERNMENT OF THE UNITED STATES? Who created Abraham Lincoln the Government of the United States? Who created, who elected him, a man made of no better flesh and blood than the rest of us, to be the GOVERNMENT of thirty millions of people in the United States?

MR. BROOKS — The people! Never! (Exciting cheers.) Never, NEVER did the people give him a majority of their suffrages. (Continued cheers.) He is a minority President, appointed by the operations of the Constitution in spite of the people of the United States. (Cheers.) A large majority of the people voted against him, and he was created President in and under that very Constitution he would overthrow by his proclamations. (Great and continued cheers.)

In this Proclamation, the President also speaks of "the Military and Naval AUTHORITY." Authority is a legal power, or a right to command, such as Prince over subject, as Parent over child. The Government has authority; or, the President acting in obedience to Law, and so the Precedents or Decisions of a Court are authority or authorities; but the AUTHORITY of the Army or Navy is more novel even than this declaration of Mr. Lincoln, that I am the Executive Government of the United States—for there is a precedent for that, in the French L'etat c'est moi, (I am the State.) The Army and Navy are the agencies of civil authority—but, under our form of Government, they are no authority of themselves. When the State is the Emperor or the King, the Army or the Navy are only his means of executing his authority—but, under our form of Government, they are no authority, only the military Agencies of the Civil Government of the United States. As names often are things, or more than things, I thus dwell in verbal criticisms upon these words. When a President sets himself up as the Executive Government of the United States, and calls the Army and Navy his authority for overriding States, and the Laws of States, and the Constitution of the United States, we can not be too watchful of mere words. Naval and military men, then, be it understood, are but Agents, only, of civil authority, to execute Civil and Constitutional Law. (That's so; cheers.) The Army and the Navy are, certainly, not "authority," under any known or recognized "Executive Government of the United States." (Cheers.)

There is another part of the Proclamation which chalks out, or seems to chalk out, a servile war, which contemplates, or seems to contemplate, the exciting of the slaves to the destruction not only of their masters, but of women and children, and to add the horrors of a servile, thus to the civil war. The words are—

I do not know that the President means to excite a servile insurrection I will not impute to him the horrible intent of converting the Southern country into a Hayti or St. Domingo, with the "Authority" of his army and navy to help, but I say, that the language is susceptible of that meaning, and such meaning has been given to it throughout the civilized world. (Applause.) When the "Executive Government" thus addresses negroes or slaves, words ought to be used that negroes or slaves can not pervert into authority to burn, slay, destroy, without regard to condition, age, or sex. (Applause.)

THE HOUSE BREAKING ITS PLEDGES.

But the President alone is not responsible for this violation of the Pledge and Principle, that enlisted the conservative men of the country in this war. The House of Representatives thus, December, 1862, reversed the Crittenden Resolution of July, 1862, the Hon. Sam. C. Fessenden, of Me., offering the following Resolution, which passed, ayes 78; noes 51.

Resolved, That the Proclamation of the President, of the date of Sept. 22d, 1862, is warranted by the Constitution; that the policy of emancipation as indicated therein is well adapted to hasten the restoration of peace, is well chosen as a war measure, and is an exercise of power with proper regard to the rights of citizens and the perpetuity of a free government.

ISSUE TAKEN ON PROCLAMATION POWER.

And now, my friends, here we take issue on that Resolution, such as we took in September, here, in this Hall, on the Proclamation, pending that reign of terror, when moral courage was needed to speak, not as now, when we can speak, and dare to speak with freedom, of all the efforts of the administration of the government to subvert the law. When I said to you in the beginning of my remarks, that the Constitution of the United States was the embodiment of the common law of England and of the wisdom of our British ancestors for 500 years, I omitted to say that there was nothing in that Constitution which forbade Executive Proclamations. There are certain things so settled in human life, that it is not necessary to stipulate against them, such as the right to eat, to breathe, to live. When our British forefathers, in their second Revolution, stipulated against almost every form of executive despotic power, they did not deem it necessary expressly to stipulate against Proclamations, or to define the limits of uttering a Proclamation — because the common law of England had long settled, that Kings could not make law by proclamation, or ordain law, or override law. When our Constitution was formed, such a practice had not been set up in England for 200 years. No monarch of England, for that long period of time, had attempted to exercise, by proclamation, such powers and prerogatives as the President of the United States sets up in his Proclamation of September 22, 1862. (Applause.)

Queen Elizabeth as long ago as 1580 began to make Law by Proclamation, then, against the Anabaptists of England, and against Irishmen straying away from home, and against seditious and schismatic books tending to prejudice the then rising Church of England. James the First prohibited by Proclamation country gentlemen from coming to London, and regulated, or attempted to regulate, the habiliments of their women and children. (Laughter.) Charles the First, unfortunately for himself, in prohibiting by Proclamation, emigration to New England, prohibited Cromwell and Hampden from emigrating there. Queen Elizabeth, however, respected her People enough to listen to, and to yield to some of the remonstrances of that People against this power of Proclamation. Charles the First went to the Block, because of the unlawful exercise of this, and similar Prerogatives and Powers. (Applause.) The Tudors and the Stuarts claimed not only the power to proclaim and to ordain Law by Proclamation, but the power to dispense with Law, and to suspend Law. What cost these dynasties their existence is that which calls itself "the Executive Government" of the United States, and is now attempting upon us, Americans. (Applause.) Abraham Lincoln suspends Law—the Habeas Corpus—dispenses not only with Law, but even with the Courts of Law, and, by Proclamation, ordains Law. (Cheering.) Our Fathers did not stipulate against these Executive or Royal Prerogatives, in the Constitution — because for 200 years in England, the exercise of such Prerogatives had scarcely been thought of. But what no King of England for two centuries dared to do—what broke down the Tudors and the Stuarts, Abraham Lincoln is doing, and his upholders are claiming that he has a right to do. (Applause.)

A PRONUNCIAMENTO, NOT A PROCLAMATION.

Now, no man doubts the right of the President to utter a Proclamation; at times, it is his duty even—but a Procla- mation is one thing, and a PRONUNCIAMENTO is another. The one is English, on English precedent; the other is Spanish, and comes to us from Spain, or, from the Revolutions of Spanish America. The Kings or Queens of England, utter Proclamations now — and there are numerous precedents for them, from the Administration of Washington, on to this era and age—but the Kings of England, now, and the previous Presidents of the United States, utter Proclamations, not to MAKE Law, or to ORDAIN Law, but to proclaim what the Law is, and to forewarn ill-disposed people against the violation of existing Common, Constitutional, or Statute Laws. The Queen of England, Queen born, has forewarned her British subjects not to violate British (neutrality) Law—but our four-years old President suspends Law, dispenses with Law, ordains Law, and overthrows both Constitutional and Statute Law. He pronounces, (in the Spanish meaning of the word,) not proclaims law. He scorns Common Law, Statute Law, Constitutional Law, Latin Magna Charta, and Habeas Corpus, and English, as well as American written Constitutions, and introduces here, not from England, the PROCLAMATION, but from Spanish America, the Pronunciamiento, that is, REVOLUTION. A Proclamation upholds Law; the Pronunciamiento overthrows Law. The President has fulminated a Spanish Pronunciamiento.

But, we are told this Pronunciamiento against whole States or upon whole States, is, as a matter of mere military policy, or necessity, a wise exercise of the War Power; and it is insinuated that when the negro is thus "pronounced" free on paper, then Sambo, and Scipio and Cæsar will embrace their Rebel masters, and bring them into the ranks of our army, and surrender them as prisoners of war to the utterer of this Paper Proclamation. (Laughter and applause.) We shall see. We shall see. But I deny that there is any wisdom in this Paper as a war measure. I deny that it is a military policy. Its first effect has been to disunite the North, and to raise up a large majority in that North, certainly in the central States of the North, in opposition to this species of Administration. (Applause.) And the next effect has been, while thus disuniting the North, to unite the whole South as one man against a government carrying on a war on such principles. (A voice — "That's so.") We, who were united, have become a divided People, and they who were divided, have become a united people;—and if this be military policy, I must say, I don't see it. Do you? (Laughter.) It is a matter of record, too, that since the utterance of this Paper, while Providence before blessed our arms, when fighting for the Constitution and the Laws; now, Providence in a good degree has ceased to smile upon us. Delaware, Maryland, Western Virginia, Kentucky and Missouri came to us under the Inaugural of the President and the Crittenden Resolutions; New-Orleans was taken; Norfolk surrendered; nearly the whole coast of North-Carolina became ours; a Union party more or less existed every where in the South; while now, vast armies are in the field against us, fighting not alone for Independence, but for life, home, family, fireside, wife, children, every thing dear to man. The military policy of the President has made popular, South, what was there but an odious conscription, and what the people were preparing to resist. A war, becoming unpopular, has there been made popular; while a war here, at the start popular, is becoming unpopular, because of the false pretenses under which men were engaged or enlisted in it. (Applause.) Hence, I deny that there is any military necessity for this Paper, or that there is any military policy in it. (Cheers.) It is costing us already seas of blood, and will cost us, if thus persisted in, the entailment of a debt upon generation after generation, so that labor, for centuries, will be subjected to capital. (Cheers.)

NEGRO PROCLAMATIONS IN THE WAR OF THE REVOLUTION.

And now, as a matter of history, gentlemen, there is no one thing upon which the American people, or the United States Government, are more committed than against this use of negro-freeing Proclamations, or the use, in any way, of negroes in war, civil or foreign. The British Generals on our own Continent, pending our own Revolution of 1776, uttered Proclamations like this of Abraham Lincoln. Sir Henry Clinton and Sir William Howe proclaimed in New-York, New-Jersey and Pennsylvania the freedom of our negroes; Lord Dunmore did the like in Virginia, and Lord Cornwallis, further South. Our Statesmen and our Generals made good points of appeal to the civilization of the world against this British employment of Indians and negroes in civil war, and they spoke of the Indian savage and negro barbarism in the same breath. The use of such means and men, by Englishmen to subdue Englishmen, was pronounced to be against the law of nations, the law of nature and the law of God. (Applause.) That great man, Edmund Burke, whom Heaven had so gifted with intellect, that he seemed able to concenter the great lights of the Past, and to spread and to reflect them all over the Future — that great man foresaw what England was driving America into, and often held up the lights of that luminous intellect to forewarn his countrymen to beware. What he, what Lord Chatham, and others, said in the British Parliament, ought now to be read and re-read by every North-American. In an address to the King of England, exhorting that King not to drive the war to extreme measures, said Burke:

"To excite, by a Proclamation issued by your Military Governors, an universal insurrection of negro slaves in any of the Colonies, is a measure full of complicated horrors, absolutely illegal, suitable neither to the practice of war nor to the time of peace."

In an address to the then British Colonies, Mr. Burke said:

"We likewise saw with shame the African slaves, who had been sold to you in public faith, and under the sanction of acts of Parliament, to be your servants and guards, employed to cut the throats of their masters."

The effect of these remonstrances from Burke, from Chatham, and other liberal Englishmen, upon Parliament, against these proclamations for the use or sudden liberation of negro slaves by the British generals, did more than any thing to destroy the popularity of the war in England and to tempt the British government and people to end so wicked a war, by the recognition of their colonies as independent States. (Applause.) Great Britain herself, as a government, confessed the Proclamation respecting the negroes to be so wrong that in the treaty of 1783, 7th article, is this solemn stipulation:

That His Britannic Majesty should, "with all convenient speed, and without causing any destruction, or carrying away of negroes, or other property of the American inhabitants, withdraw all his armies, garrisons and fleets from the United States, and from every part, and place, and harbor within the same."

When the treaty came to be executed, long controversies arose upon what definition should be given to this "carrying away of negroes, or other property." Whoever will look into the American archives will find long diplomatic papers, and then long diplomatic controversies, — and he will find, too, that not only such Southern men as Jefferson and Edmund Randolph, of Virginia, were committed against the abduction, use, or employment of negroes in war, freed by proclamation or otherwise, but such New-Yorkers as John Jay and Egbert Benson. In the end the British government acquiesced in the justice of these remonstrances, and paid for the deported negroes, thus freed or abducted. (Applause.)

A like passage of history was repeated after the war of 1812. Admiral Cochrane, upon the waters of the Chesapeake, issued a Proclamation, which, while it avoided the use of the word slave, in order to seem thus not to violate the understanding, or law of nations, that forbade the use of slaves, or the stirring them up to insurrection, nevertheless invited such persons to enter his Majesty's service, or to emigrate to British possessions in North-America. Admiral Cochrane, in short, was following in the footsteps of Clinton, Howe, Dunmore, and Cornwallis, of the Revolution. When the treaty of Ghent was made, (1815,) in the first article was inserted a stipulation resembling that in the 7th article of the Treaty of 1783, namely:

John Quincy Adams, to whose name and memory, the Republican party profess to look up with so much respect, it so happens, was Minister at the Court of St. James, charged with the negotiation of this Treaty on the part of the United States. In a letter to the Secretary of State, August 22, 1815, he reports his conversation with Lord Castlereagh upon a subject, in part, as follows:

"Had the British plenipotentiaries asked of us an explanation of our proposal to transpose the words, [of the treaty,] we should certainly have given it; we evidently had an object in making the proposal; and we thought the words themselves fully disclosed it. Our object was the restoration of all property which, by the usages of war among civilized nations, ought not to have been taken. All private property on shore was of that description; it was entitled by the laws of war to exemption from capture — slaves were private property." Further on he continues: "It was true, proclamations inviting slaves to desert from their masters had been issued by British officers; we believe them deviations from the usages of war; we believe that the British government itself would, when the hostile passions arising from the state of war should subside, consider them in the same light. . . . . Lord Liverpool manifested no dissatisfaction at these remarks, nor did he attempt to justify the proclamation to which I partially alluded."

In a letter of instructions (July 5th, 1820) to Mr. Middleton, our Minister to St. Petersburgh, where this article of Treaty of Ghent had been referred, upon difficulties arising as to construction similar to those in the Treaty of 1783, Mr. Adams enters into a sustained argument to prove that the emancipation of an enemy's slaves is not authorized by the laws of war. The following extract is sufficient to clearly exhibit his opinion:

"It has been repeatedly alleged on the part of the British Government that it could not be supposed they would have agreed to an article which would oblige them to deliver up to their masters slaves who, during the war, had taken refuge under their protection. The reply to this observation is, that if that had been an objection to their agreeing to the article, it should have been made before the signing of the article, and the engagement not to carry away slaves, at all. They had in fact numbers of slaves by these different modes of capture — one of such as had been seduced to run away from their masters by proclamations from British officers, a second of voluntary fugitives whom they received; and a third of such as had been taken in predatory excursions. You will find in Niles's Register, vol. vi. p. 242, the proclamation of Admiral Cochrane, instigating the desertion of slaves from their masters. . . . . It is not openly addressed to slaves, nor does it avow its real object. From the use of the phraseology which it adopts, the inference is conclusive that the real object was such as the Admiral did not choose to avow, and the only supposable motive for the disguise is the consciousness that it was not conformable to the established usages of war among civilized nations. The wrong was in the proclamation. Admiral Cochrane had no lawful authority to give freedom to the slaves belonging to the citizens of the United States. The recognition of them by Great Britain in the treaty as property is a complete disclaimer of the right to destroy that property by making them free. An engagement contracted with them to that effect was, in relation to the owners of the property wrongful; and, if, in relation to the slaves themselves, it was an engagement which the British Government assumed upon themselves and sanctioned, it could not divest the owners of the slaves of their property, nor release the British government from the obligation to the United States, and to the owners, to evacuate the place without carrying them away."

Mr. Adams wrote to Mr. Rush, at London, as follows:

"The only equity of the British side is that they signed the article without being aware of its full import, and that the stipulation was incompatible with their previous promises to the negroes. This is the real knot of the question between us, and its solution is, that they had no right to make any such promises to the negroes. The principle is, that the emancipation of an enemy's slaves is not among the acts of legitimate war — as relates to the owners; it is a destruction of private property, nowhere warranted by the usages of war. This principle must, I think, be peculiarly familiar to the Emperor of Russia, and may be pressed upon his attention in the case of reference with effect."

On the 18th of October, Mr. Adams again wrote to Mr. Middleton, and expressed his views in the strongest language. He said:

"In the statement of the British ground of argument upon the claim in the submission, they have broadly asserted the right of emancipating slaves — private property — as a legitimate right of war. This is utterly incomprehensible on the part of a nation whose subjects holds slaves by millions, and who, in this very treaty, recognize them as private property. No such right is acknowledged as a law of war by writers who admit any limitation. The right of putting to death all prisoners in cold blood and without special cause might as well be pretended to be a law of war, or the right to use poisoned weapons, or to assassinate. I think the Emperor will not recognize the right of emancipation a legitimate warfare, and am persuaded you will present the argument against it."

Now, gentlemen, no language can be stronger than this, which Mr. Adams here uses against what Mr. Lincoln has done, or is to do. "The Emancipation of an enemy's slaves (he says) is not among the acts of legitimate war," almost the language of Edmund Burke. "No such right is acknowledged as a law by writers, who admit of any limitation." Mr. Adams expresses his horror of such war, by classing it "with putting to death all prisoners in cold blood," or "the use of poisoned weapons," or "assassination." The Emperor of Russia decided on the words of the Treaty, that the slaves must be paid for, and they were paid for, $1,200,000 under this, the Treaty of Ghent, and the Treaty of 1783.

It is now said, that at a late period of life, Mr. Adams retreated from these positions, and excused himself for so doing, that he wrote under instructions from the then administration, and did not express his own opinions. It is true, that after Mr. Adams had been defeated for the Presidency in 1828 — as he deemed, by the South, exasperated, it may be by that defeat, he did argue, that "the War Power" could abolish slavery, but his "War Power" was not laid down to be in a Proclamation from the President of the United States, but in Congress. Congress, he said, (speech of 1842) has power (thus) to carry on the war, and not the President alone. One of the laws of war, he sets down to be:

"When a country is invaded and two hostile armies are set in martial array, the Commanders in both armies have power to emancipate slaves in the invaded territory."

But our President in the White House, with no sword buckled on his belt, even, 1000 miles or more from Texas, etc., which our armies have never invaded, fulminates from that White House, in a mere Proclamation, a law of war, liberating the slaves in a Territory he has never even seen (Applause.)

It matters not, however, what Mr. Adams said, in the heat of debate in 1842 — for then he was but Mr. Adams — whereas as Minister to England, and as Secretary of State, representing and acting for the Government of the United States, he committed this Government, and the People, in 1815 and in 1820, to principles which no honest, consistent successor in that Government can now retract. Mr. Adams in 1815 and 1820 spoke for the United States: in 1842, he spoke for Mr. Adams alone. There is our record, a record made up from 1776, on to 1818, in two Treaties of Peace, in diplomatic correspondence, and in the receipt of moneys thereon, and this record can not be got over, or put under — for it stares us in the face, on every side we turn. (Applause.) The emancipation and the use of negro slaves, as President Lincoln is using and emancipating them, is, then, in violation of every principle and every precedent of our intercourse in such matters, with foreign states. (Great cheers,)

Gentlemen, these historical recollections, I am well aware, in a popular assembly, like this, are somewhat dull — but I feel in addressing you, that through this Association I am addressing no inconsiderable portion of our Northern countrymen, and I trust, directly or indirectly, some of the conservative people of the South. (Applause.) Hence it is not declamation that is useful now, but instruction, the right reading of the right records. We must show both the North and the South, that the war waged was a war for the Constitution and the Laws, not a war to break Constitutions and Laws, and a war to be waged according to the laws of nations, as expounded by such eminent men as John Jay and John Quincy Adams, when they were addressing other nations.

THE WAR POWER.

But we are told, gentlemen — no matter what Constitution, no matter what the laws of nations, this is a war power President Lincoln is using to support the very life of the nation. He has the right to exert any, and whatsoever power he may deem best fitted to subdue the common enemy. Or, in other words, the President of the United States has but to involve the people in a war, with any body, ostensibly to maintain the Constitution, and he can then pervert that war, to subvert that Constitution, and to extinguish the life of the nation. (Applause.) What proposition more absurd? What better confutation than the mere simple statement of such an absurd proposition. (Applause.) In an abstract struggle, then, for the Republic, we must die in Despotism! To live, we must commit suicide! To restore the Union, we must make the Union not worth a restoration! Now this is not the sort of Government under which we bargained to live, or to die even. (Cries of "no, no.") We have never agreed to subvert the Constitution in order to restore the Union. We have never agreed to surrender Liberty, Property, Free Speech, Free discussion, or Freedom in the concrete or abstract to any Executive Government, or Executive Power. (Cries of Never, never.) And if ever the time comes, when under any "War Power," it may be necessary to subvert the Constitution, and thus to give up our Rights and Liberties, it is a matter of indifference to me, whether a Union thus achieved, be maintained or not; and I say here, and hesitate not to say, that the quicker we be rid of such a Union, under such a Government, the better for all concerned. (Loud, and prolonged, and reiterated applause, the audience rising and giving three cheers for Mr. Brooks.) This War Power is a new name for a very old thing. It is the new name of Despotism, and of Military Despotism, the very worst sort of despotism on earth. When the Roman Republic was changed into the Roman Empire — when the Romans lost their Consuls, their Tribunes, their Senate, all but in the name, and thus lost all their rights and liberties, their IMPERATOR, the Latin name for their Abraham Lincoln, their Commander-in-Chief, was scarcely changed by the War Power into the modern word, EMPEROR. Augustus, or Tiberius Cæsar, but became Kaiser, or Czar, that is, Cæsar. Hence, let us put down our foot at the start, and declare, we recognize no Presidential War Power, no Imperator to be turned into any Emperor, no Cæsar to be made into any Kaiser, or Czar. He who attempts to govern the People, under any other Power than the Powers of the Constitution; he who leaps over the Laws of Civil Liberty, and the Civil Law, into that boundless field of Despotism, claimed as a War Power, establishes principles and precedents, from Emperors and Cæsars, and merits the execrations of every free man. (Applause.) Hence, I say, when a President ordains Law by Proclamation, under the pretense that he has such right, under any unknown, illimitable War Power, his Proclamation is not to be regarded as Law; it is not Law — (cheers) — and the President of the United States has no more right to declare it Law, than you or I, or any other man. (Tremendous and long-continued cheering.)

Gentlemen, your cheers remind me, that this is strong language— but it is such as the crisis demands. Some body must speak, when the great bulwarks of Law are being broken down, and every thing is thus being put in peril, and I may as well speak as other men. Some humble sentinel must stand on the outposts of the Constitution, and the Law, and standing there, must speak, and cry out against Proclamation Law, against Executives dispensing with, or suspending Law. Two months ago, I know it would not have been safe thus to uphold Law, or to declare against the violation of Law— but it is safe now. Then the casernes of Fort Lafayette or Fort Warren would have been my doom. (Cries, not now, never; we've put a stop to all that.) But when a President is unfaithful to his oath to uphold the Constitution and the Law, and subverts that Constitution and the Law— it is my duty, it is your duty, before God and man, to denounce all his arbitrary uses of power. (Great applause, and three cheers for the speaker.)

SUBJUGATION IMPOSSIBLE.

In the beginning of this war—when it was a war for the Constitution, and for the whole United States, not only were the people of the North a unit, or nearly so—but we had a great and powerful party in some of the Southern States of the Union; and for that Constitution, and under that Flag, which was the symbol of the Constitution, there was a fair prospect, not of subjugating, not of exterminating, not of crushing out the people of the South—but by prudence and wisdom, and a fair adhesion to the principles of the Constitution, and of the Laws of Civilization as well as of Nations, of bringing back the great body of the Southern people to the embrace of the Union, and to the reverence of that ancient and honorable Flag. It was their Flag, as well as our Flag—and the associations connected with it, were as dear to them as to us. (Applause.) But I hesitate not now to say — what hitherto I have refrained from saying, though often felt, that it is vain, utterly vain, to attempt to subjugate, extinguish, or exterminate six or seven millions of Anglo-Saxon people. (Applause.) Their race is our race. The blood that runs in our veins is their blood. The same pulsations that beat in our hearts, beat in theirs. The same current of life that flows in us, flows in them. Now, who of us, standing here on this Northern soil, believes, Southron or Saxon, Celt or Teuton, or Frank, can invade, or conquer, or subjugate us? All Britain, all France, the whole South combined, could never shake us from our propriety, and make us tremble, and yield, under invasion. (Applause.) Subjugation — subjugo—is not a word of Anglo-Saxon derivation, or origin. (Cheers.) Anglo-Saxons never were, never are, never will be, brought under the yoke — subjugated, conquered, crushed out, exterminated. (Cheers.) Edmund Burke well comprehended all this, and in that masterly speech of his on "Conciliation with America," cited four cases where, for years and years, the British government had attempted to subjugate a neighboring people — the people of Ireland, of Wales, and of the Counties Palatine of Durham and Chester. Ireland was, for a hundred years, he shows, in the process of subjugation, and arms never did conquer her. "It was not English arms, (says Burke,) but the English Constitution that conquered Ireland." The British, at last, threw over her the protecting mantle of British liberty, and Ireland then began to be subjugated. When England piled fifteen acts of penal legislation upon Wales and Welshmen, "no Englishman traveling in that country could go six yards from the high road without being murdered." (Laughter.) "When, after two hundred years of struggle, the day-star of the English Constitution," adds Burke, "had arisen in their hearts, all was harmony, within and without—

> ———Simul alba nautis
> Stella refulsit,
> Defluit saxis agitatus humor, etc. etc.

And the like is said of the Counties Palatine, Durham and Chester. Hence how vain this attempt to subjugate, crush out, or exterminate millions of our own people, of our own flesh and blood—protected as they are by an almost boundless territory stretching from the Potomac to the Rio Grande— a territory almost without high roads, in large plantations, without visible population, in winter, no inconsiderable portion under water; in summer, the heat so oppressive that the man of the North can hardly endure exposure to the rays of the sun. Such a territory, if there were no defenders upon it, would be almost unconquerable, geographically, or climatically, if I may coin the word. The subjugation, therefore, of such a people, or such a territory, in such a climate, may as well be abandoned first as last. If we wish then to bring them back into the Union, we must bring back to them the Constitution and the Protection of the laws. We must do what Burke said, was done for Ireland and Wales, throw over them the protecting folds of the Constitution, in the spirit in which that Constitution was formed. We must re-lift up from the ground where it was trodden under foot, the Constitution, and only the Constitution. (Applause.) We must do Equity and Justice, and then we can exact Equity and Justice. We must hold out Equality for the States, and then we can enforce Equality. We must respect our own rights, and the rights of States, and then we can compel respect for these rights upon others. We must rear up here in the North, a Conservative, Constitutional Party, and when that party is reared up, which accepts the Constitution not as this man or that man expounds it—but as the Supreme Court has expounded it, (cheers,) then, and not till then shall we be a reünited States. Then, and not till then, shall we begin to subjugate the South. Force nor Violence can ever win back a People to love. Conquest would but impose the necessity for re-conquest, until here, as in Europe, we should ever be revolving in the ruinous circle of War and Despotism. We hold in the South, now, only what is under the range of our guns. Our conquest is only of the soil on which we are treading. To hold all this, to possess, to occupy a territory so vast, not alone are one million of men indispensable to hold—but a million more, to conquer, to subjugate, as well as to occupy, or to re-fill the ever-thinning ranks of those who do conquer and subjugate. How much better, then, how much wiser is the law of self-Government, or of that home Government, that State Government, which relieves a nation from obligations so vast, and impresses the duty of Government upon every individual. Rely upon it, then, the only army for subjugation is the Constitution of the United States, and the principles of free self-government, interwoven in every part of it. But what we are doing now—organizing and arming negroes, forming negro Battalions, Regiments, and Brigades—is but outraging public sentiment. All Europe is crying out against it. The whole civilized world shrinks from and abhors any prospect of the repetition of the bloody scenes of Hayti and St. Domingo. That European sympathy and civilization which has hither looked up to us as the model Republic, now turns with horror from white men co-operating with African slaves to shed fraternal blood. We have no hope, then, from the world; we can have no hope in ourselves, until we retreat from this disgraceful exhibition of twenty millions of white men calling on four millions of negroes to fight eight millions, at the most, of white fellow-men. Let us, then, hasten back to the principles of Washington, and of the Fathers of the Republic, as soon as possible, and put the Republic back upon the old track of the Constitution. These were principles of compromise and concession, the North to the South, and the South to the North, and under them, from 1776, on to 1860, we carried on a successful and united government. (Applause.) I do not expect an immediate, nor an early, reëstablishment of confidence between the North and the South; the demagogues have been too long successfully at work in parting us—but I do expect, that when we can successfully reëstablish the principles and spirit of the Constitution in the North, we shall be answered by a corresponding party, South. Or, in other words, when we can effectually subvert Abolitionism, North, a corresponding party in the South will successfully subvert Secessionism there. (Applause.)

THE PURPOSES OF THIS GOVERNMENT.

But, I am asked—what is our programme?—what we intend to do? Do we intend to lay down our arms, we are tauntingly asked, and to submit to Rebellion, and let Rebellion ride roughshod over us? Do we intend to let the capital of our country be taken—our armies surrender—and our cities, perhaps, be sacked? No; we have no such intent, no such purpose. (Applause.) We now have no such idea, and we never had. We think, and we feel, first—that if we act upon the purpose and upon the principles, which created this Government, the war will soon, of itself, cease. When the Constitution in 1787 was created, it was not altogether the work of Patriotism, or the love of Liberty that inspired our Fathers. The treaty of 1783, with Great Britain, had secured the Liberty of the People, and the Independence of the States. There was not a right then, we have now, that every body had not then. The great principles of British and of American personal Liberty were as well secured under the old Confederation of States, as under the Constitution of the United States. But there were other things wanting we had not under the Confederation — free trade, free intercourse, a common currency — and, above all, protection and security from European intervention or invasion. Thirteen independent States had thirteen different custom-houses, and thirteen different laws, and regulations of commerce, and of trade. There was one rate of duties in Newport, Rhode Island, and another in New-York, and yet another in Baltimore, or Norfolk. The Fathers of the Republic then felt the great business necessity of creating order out of this chaos — and of adding to a Free People, a system of Free Trade, and of Free intercourse. It was INTEREST, then, SELF-INTEREST, as much as patriotism, that laid the foundations of our Government. There were debts to be discharged, obligations to be met, a navy to be created for the protection of commerce, that could only be achieved by a government of the United States. Under the guidance of these impulses of self-interest, on the 11th of September, 1786, Commissioners from several States assembled in Annapolis, Md., "to consider upon the best means of remedying the defects of the Federal Government." Their very platform was "to take into consideration the TRADE and COMMERCE of the United States, and to consider how far an uniform system, in their commercial intercourse and regulations, might be necessary to their common INTEREST and permanent harmony." The vulgar inspiration of Trade started the Convention held in Philadelphia, afterwards, in 1787. Such men as Washington, Hamilton, Madison, Franklin, Roger Sherman, Rutledge, and Pinckney, did not hesitate to assemble, and to act upon this great inspiration of self-Interest, and of Commerce and Trade. Free-trade, a free intercourse, free rivers, they well reasoned, were indispensably necessary among a free people. The main purpose for which this Government was created, our Constitutional history shows, was to have but one system of customs and of duties, from Georgia to Maine. Or, in other words, more tersely expressed, this is an exterior, not an interior, Government. The Federal Government was created, not for morals, not for religion, not for slavery or anti-slavery — but to promote the "general welfare," or, in other, more vulgar parlance, to collect duties, to raise revenue thereby, to coin money, to have uniform weights and measures, to have one patent-office, and to regulate commerce with foreign nations. I repeat, our great Fathers created a Government of, and founded it upon, self-interest, and only upon these principles of self-interest can it be maintained. When we interfere with morals, or religion, or attempt to govern by Theology, or Philosophy, our Government fails. When we attempt to enforce opinions, or to use Government to enforce opinions, the Government fails — for it never can do what it never was created to do. Hence, when an attempt is made to free negroes, or emancipate negroes in the South, the Government fails, just as if it attempted to emancipate them in Brazil or Cuba, or to emancipate the Sepoys of the East-Indies. Hence, when we prosecute war to free four millions of Southern negroes — though there are twenty millions of us, North concerned it — we must fail, under our form of Government; for the Government was created exactly for reverse purposes, — the purposes of self-interest — South as well as North — (applause) — and it is not the interest of the South to live among free negroes. (Continued applause.) If, then, we wish to end the war, we must resort to the principles of interest that laid the foundations of the Government, and we must make it the interest of the South to live with us — as our fathers did, when they created the Government. We must, then, go back and remember, this is an exterior, not an interior Government, and that slaves and slavery in Georgia or in Carolina do not concern us, as it is our concern to regulate commerce, to collect duties, to have uniform weights and measures, and common patent laws — not to free negroes. We want one system of trade — one uniform commerce upon the sea-coast, and the free navigation of such great Rivers as the Mississippi, Missouri, Ohio, the Red River, the Arkansas, etc. The true programme, then, is to go back, and go back as fast as possible, to the reëstablishment of our Custom-Houses, our uniform system of duties. What they are doing in the interior of Virginia, whether they are in rebellion or not in Texas, or Georgia, but little concerns us, if we hold on to Galveston, to Fort Pulaski, to New-Orleans, to Norfok, and collect the Revenue, and attend to the weights and measures. (A laugh.) If in Tennessee, even, they choose to rebel, let them rebel till they are tired of it, provided at New Orleans they will pay the duties, and let us alone in Kentucky, and on the navigation of the Rivers. The beauty of our form of Government is, that we have little or nothing to do with what is going on in Tennessee, or Alabama, or Mississippi. If the people there think it their interest to be in rebellion, let them rebel, as long as they will confine their rebellion in their own limits. I do not propose to surrender New-Orleans, no, never. (Applause.) That Post and that Port are indispensable to the great West — where millions and millions more of people are hereafter to live, and who can not even run the risk, that England or France, or some other Power may take it from the South, as we took it from her, under Farragut. What Gibraltar is to the great Mediterranean, New-Orleans is to the Great West — the Key, the gateway of the commerce of thirty or forty thousand miles of interior River Navigation. (Applause.) I do not propose to surrender Key West. The possession of it is indispensable to our navigation of the Gulf of Mexico. It is our self-interest to hold it, and hold it we must. I do not propose to surrender Norfolk or Fortress Monroe. They are the keys of the Chesapeake, and the gates to the Capital in Washington. The duty of this Government is to collect duties in Mobile, in Charleston, as well as in North Carolina, Georgia, and Florida, and Louisiana — and I would remove any thing which stands in the way of the execution of this exterior duty.

UNION A NECESSITY.

The God of Nature, I may say more, to the Southern People,—(Oh! that they may heed it to avert eternal wars!)— the God of Nature has written upon our very geography — "One Country, one Constitution, one Destiny." (Applause.) It is written on the long lines of the Missouri and Mississippi, on the Ohio, and all their numerous tributaries, that empty into the Gulf of Mexico. The Father of his Country is not more eloquent in his Farewell Address upon this necessity of Union and Indivisibility, than is the Father of Waters, for four thousand miles — as he gathers up his reasons in the rising rivulets of the icy Rocky Mountains, and rolls them on, into volumes of irresistible logic toward the Gulf of Mexico. (Applause.) These great waters must — it is the law of inexorable necessity — belong to one people, and be in one country. The holding on to what we have got, on the Mississippi, on the Gulf, on the Chesapeake, on the Capes of Virginia, is as indispensable to our safety as it is for the safety of the South to have them too. We are bound together thus, we are linked together, for weal or woe—and no wise man will fight to put asunder what God has thus joined together. (Applause.) If we part by Treaty, we part but soon to meet again in war. Eternal War, or Eternal Union, seems to be our Destiny. (Applause.) Tell me not that the Ohio can divide us as the Rhine divides France and Germany, or, as the Danube parts Nationalities— tell me not all this, unless you tell me, in the same breath, the numbers of the huge standing armies, that garrison the Rhine and the Danube, and secure Peace only by bristling in arms, eternally. (Applause.) England could not live without Scotland and Wales, and France perished in provinces, and Germany has been drenched with human gore — because there, there was one people, speaking one language, cut up, divided into Kingdoms, Dukedoms, Landgraves, etc. It is essential, indispensably essential, for the security of our American Liberty, that we be one People. (Applause.) If but a river part us, or a chain of mountains huge standing armies must stand as sentinels on every such river, or on every such mountain-pass—and there must be cordons of custom-houses, and passports, and restrictions, all utterly destructive of human liberty. Standing armies are the Death of Freedom. Where the sword reigns, the Genius of Liberty runs off in terror and affright—and the People soon yield up to Despotism. (Applause.) Three hundred thousand men on your side, and three hundred thousand on our side, to act as Policemen, will be indispensably necessary to keep apart a People speaking one tongue, and these inflamed by discordant free, and slave institutions. Your negroes would run off, and we should keep them, and you, in revenge, would burn, pillage, and destroy. Eternal war, or huge standing armies, I repeat then, would be our destiny—and where War is, we see now, both North and South, there is no Liberty. In the name of God, then, if we will throw down our arms, throw down yours, and come back to us, or, if God has abandoned men to passion, and blood, in the name of Liberty, that hereditary Liberty, bequeathed to us all, we invoke you, to unite with us, and rescue our country from a destiny that shocks the patriot even in imagination to contemplate. (Great applause.)

UNION OUR SALVATION.

But, gentlemen, Union is not only essential to Liberty, but essential to our salvation. Republics exist on earth only as exceptional governments. Monarchies and despotisms are the common Law, if not the common destiny of nations. All Europe smiles, or seems to smile, upon our divisions, our battles, and the torrents of blood we shed in order to destroy the only great Republic on earth. Monarchy and Despotism both grin their ghastly smile—while Liberty, the earth over, shrieks over the unnatural, the suicidal war.

Gentlemen, "Divide and Conquer" is the principle of monarchies against republics every where. Divide and conquer is the principle which now inspires the British Government, if not the Emperor of France. Divide the North and South, and then if possible conquer both when both are exhausted. Unity and universality of government are therefore a necessity for us both North and South, and the quicker and deeper, and wider, this principle is comprehended universally, the quicker we shall lay down our arms and stop this horrible effusion of human blood. (Applause.)

PRACTICAL RESOLUTIONS.

Gentlemen, I love to speak for practical purposes, and hence I have prepared two or three resolutions to present for your consideration, for your discussion hereafter, not for action at this time and this place, but for submission to this Democratic Association. I see nothing else that is left to us except the principles that are embodied in these resolutions. Revolution is the last thing to be thought of, under a form of government like ours, where grievances can be redressed at the ballot-box. We have to endure this Congress, we have to endure this President; it is wiser to endure them than to overthrow them by revolution. It is possible, barely possible, that at last they may be awakened and may hear and heed the voice of the people. Hence I have selected a State as a medium through which my resolutions may be presented to the people both of the North and the South. A State of the Revolution; one of the Old Thirteen, of high and holy history, which has never been alien, either to the North or to the South, and which has ever been faithful to the Constitution of our common country, and that is, the State, the glorious State, of New-Jersey. (Loud cheers.) I propose, therefore, the following resolutions, to be submitted to the Democratic Association for discussion, for action, and if you approve of them, for presentation to the Government of New-Jersey. And let me remark here that the Government of New Jersey is a homogeneous government, the three branches are all of one faith and one opinion, and hence I name her in preference to the Government of our own New-York.

Mr. Brooks then submitted certain resolutions, the time for action upon which being over, it is not necessary to publish them here.

LETTER FROM EDWARD N. CROSBY, Esq.

TROY, Feb. 25th, 1863.

PROF. S. F. B. MORSE:

MY DEAR AND RESPECTED SIR: I have read with deep interest the letter in the N. Y. Evening Post of the 19th inst., addressed to you by Mr. D. D. Field. Its general tenor harmonizes with views which I have long coveted the privilege of expressing to you, but which have been repressed by a constitutional feeling of respect for eminence and seniority, and a fear of even seeming officiously to intrude. But, as Mr. Field suggests, your fame has become a national inheritance, and this alike is a motive and an apology for a jealous care on the part of your fellow-citizens as to aught that may impair its lustre. It is the omissions, however, rather than the contents of Mr. Field's sensible and temperate letter that prompt me to speak. While appealing to you on many high grounds, still he fails to reach the highest from which the subject is to be viewed. And I trust it is not assuming too much for one who is not only an admiring fellow-countryman and a near neighbor, but also a Christian friend, to discuss this matter with you from the Christian's stand-point. And what, may I ask, appears to you the sufficient reason for a Christian citizen to ally himself with others, for the extreme and radical purpose of undermining or paralyzing the power of the Government at a crisis when unanimity of support is so plainly essential, not only to the welfare but to the very life of the nation?

There are many, alas! who from ignorance or passion, persistently confound all the immense party, which came into being and into power only on the grand purpose of resisting Southern aggression, with the extremest radicalism and infidelity of the Garrison stamp. They would thus justify themselves in an indiscriminate and reckless hostility to the policy of the Government. I can, of course, find in this fact no explanation of the deliberate action of one of your principles and intelligence. Some may say that "the war on our part is unrighteous and, therefore, unworthy of support." But the rebels began it. To this it may be said: "The provocations offered them were such as greatly to diminish if not remove their criminality in thus beginning it." These assertions, though easily refuted, might require a discussion both long and foreign somewhat to my purpose. But it may be said that "the war though righteous is waged by unrighteous methods, such as confiscation and more particularly emancipation." If, however, it is a legitimate function of our Government to destroy the fabric of the Southern Confederacy, à fortiori, is it not justified in removing that which their own highest authorities pronounce to be the corner-stone of that fabric? Moreover, though this position is as palpably untenable as the two previously stated, yet supposing it to be a sincere Christian conviction, inasmuch as these methods must be objected to rather as inexpedient than as morally and legally unjustifiable, should not another Christian conviction, that of duty to the "powers that are ordained of God," prevent any disposition to resist or thwart the Government? But I would fain suppose that rather than either of the above, the grounds of your political views and action have been an earnest desire for peace, and an abomination of war, and its attendant horrors, In both of these feelings I claim the fullest sympathy with you, and yet I can not possibly construct upon them a fulcrum for unfriendly action against our Government.

I have seen in the progress of events

much to criticise and regret in the Administration, but I feel assured that as far at least as our President is concerned, the errors have been those of the judgment, and are compatible with a pure integrity and a high-toned patriotism. Horrible too as war is, we are to remember that it may yet be a worthy means to a worthy end. God has certainly in his word more directly and repeatedly given his sanction to it, than he has to slavery. But what is the legitimate, the inevitable tendency of such unfriendly demonstrations as those to which you were persuaded to give countenance at Delmonico's, and which have had a fuller but natural development in Connecticut and elsewhere? We are not left to theories for a reply. Facts show that while the rebel leaders insultingly spurn all pusillanimous overtures of conciliation, they also exult over them as evidences of divided counsels and increasing feebleness at the North. They are thereby emboldened to declare themselves utterly implacable, except by success in their own ruinous plans. What then should be our necessary logic, our irresistible inference? Certainly patriotism and a wise appreciation of the worthy end and the abundant means committed to us would decide at once. Let us by united and courageous effort show the rebels that their success is perfectly hopeless. May I venture to speak a word also as to the "personnel" in these matters? Mr. Field says that he knows personally nearly all of those who were associated with you at Delmonico's, and implies very plainly that they borrowed from your presence a respectability for which they could make no becoming return. It was on a previous public occasion, that I saw, with no slight regret, your good name published, as appearing on the same platform with the characterless ——, the infamous ——, and the pitiable ——. Can it be that the purest and most patriotic measures draw to their advocacy such persons, while they fail to attract the innumerable host who dissent, and whose patriotism and probity you can not but heartily commend?

The high estimate I have formed of your Christian character, confirmed and increased by my intercourse with ——, has encouraged me to speak with the more freedom, and with the hope that it will be received in the same kindly spirit which has prompted it.

Yours most sincerely and respectfully,

EDWARD N. CROSBY.

PROF. MORSE'S REPLY.

MY DEAR SIR: Yours of the 25th of February is received, and I take in good part, what you say, written, however, wholly under misconception of my opinions, my position, and the objects for which the Society for the Diffusion of Political Knowledge has been organized. I know from your estimable character that your intention and motives were of the most benevolent kind in addressing me, and in reply, I shall make a few remarks, I trust in the same kindly spirit, while on the subjects you introduce I use perfect plainness of speech.

Your letter touches on many topics, upon some of which I have, for years, bestowed much study, and it may be that a frank discussion of them at a time when the public mind is alive to such discussions, may be useful in eliciting truth. Fundamental difference of opinion is often more seeming than real, perhaps from the inherent imperfection of language itself, in conveying our real thoughts to another's mind, or through some defect of intellect or education in not using perspicuous language. If due weight were given to a consideration of this kind, there would be less of that asperity of remark upon other's misconceptions, which in this day of excitement deforms the popular style. Mere difference of opinion, honestly entertained, is entitled to that forbearance which is denied to brazen-faced, persistent falsehood.

of the purpose of our Society, as well as of many other topics upon which you have written, only on the presumption that you ground your remarks on the assumed truth of the egregiously false and impudent representations of an unprincipled reporter of the Evening Post. If this was the source of your information, you might as well look for truth respecting Bible doctrine, from Voltaire or Thomas Paine. Are you not aware that the pretended report of the incipient meeting at Delmonico's which led to the formation of our Society, is a tissue of falsehoods from beginning to end, exposed and refuted in numerous journals? Of how many falsehoods, persistently repeated, must a journal be convicted before its statement of facts shall be received with suspicion? I need not say to you that the admission into the Evening Post of such a grossly abusive report, while entertaining as I have hitherto, for its senior editor, so much personal respect, (however much I may differ from him politically,) is a source of deep mortification to me.

MR. FIELD'S LETTER.

Mr. Field's letter addressed to me was probably indited under the influence of impressions made by that same infamous report, and while I have no complaint of want of courtesy on his part towards me personally, I saw nothing in its general tenor of sufficient importance to require any answer from me. Though addressed to me, it was evidently addressed to the public through me, and I was used only as a convenient mode of addressing the public. So far as any thing he said required notice, that notice was taken of it by several journals. I enclose you clippings from two which happen to be at hand. Whatever personal regard I have for Mr. Field and for his highly respectable family connections, the state of the country compels me to waive all consideration of social relations, in treating of its political condition. His views and mine on the subject of the policy of the Administration are antipodal, and in view of his reported action in the Peace Congress, in connection with some of his radical associates, to which action can be traced the present awful condition of the country, since it was in their power (if I have been rightly advised) to have averted the war, I cannot but look upon his and their political course as laying upon them a weight of responsibility which I would not have upon my conscience for a thousand worlds.

CHRISTIAN STAND-POINT.

You desire "to discuss the subject from the Christian's stand-point." I accede to this the more readily since that is precisely the stand-point from which I have always endeavored to view the whole field of controversy. On Bible truth, therefore, I am ready to plant every position I take.

Did it not lead me into too long a discussion for a letter like this, a discussion starting from a point too far back, even from fundamental theological principles, I should like to establish with you this stand-point impregnably on the Bible. This will have to be done ere the perverted Christian mind of the country can be disabused of the ruinous fallacies which have turned aside the incumbents of so many pulpits from their legitimate duty of allaying the fierce passions of men, through the tranquillizing influences of the gospel of peace, and changed them into impassioned political orators, whose exasperating harangues have added fuel to the already raging fires of a ferocious and desolating fanaticism.* Such a discussion, important as it is, must be in abeyance.

I proceed to answer your question: "What appears to you the sufficient reason for a Christian citizen to ally himself with others for the extreme and radical purpose of undermining or paralyzing the power of the Government at a crisis when unanimity of support is so plainly essential not only to the welfare but to the very life of the nation?"

GOVERNMENT AND ADMINISTRATION.

I will analyze the component parts of your question. You assume, without any warrant, that my purpose is to "undermine and paralyze the power of the Government." You appear to have fallen into the prevalent error of confounding the Government with the Administration of the Government. You are too sensible not to see that they are not the same. The word Government has indeed two meanings, and in order to rescue the subject from ambiguity allow me to say that the ordinary meaning of Government, in free countries, is, that form of fundamental rules and principles by which a nation or state is governed, or by which individual members of a body politic are to regulate their action. Government is in fact a Constitution by which the rights and duties both of citizens and public officers are prescribed and defined. If the word sometimes has a secondary or more limited meaning synonymous with Administration of public affairs, then "the Government" is metonymically used for Administration, and should not be confounded with the original and true signification of the term Administration, which means the persons collectively who are intrusted with the execution of the laws, and with the superintendence of public affairs.

Opposition to the Administration then, is not opposition to the Government; the former may not only be utterly destroyed without affecting the health of the Government, but it may be, and constantly is, thought to be necessary, in the opinion of the supreme power, the People, to destroy the Administration in order to preserve the life of the Government. This is in accordance not only with the theory of our institutions, but with the daily practice of the people. Every change of Administration at every election, Federal, State, or municipal, great or small, exemplifies this great truth. The Government remains intact, unscathed, while the Administration is swept out of existence.

In the light of this explication, you must perceive that so far from "allying myself with others for the purpose of undermining and paralyzing the power of the Government," the very purpose of our Society is to uphold and strengthen the Government, by diffusing among the people, such a knowledge of the principles upon which it is founded, that it shall not be in the power of any Administration, whether weak or wicked, to work its injury.

I yield to no man, in hearty loyalty to the Government, nor in obedience also to the Administration in all its constitutional measures, whatever may be my private opinion of their wisdom. You mistake me if you suppose I have any "radical purpose of undermining or paralyzing" any of its legal measures. If I think them unwise, I shall use my constitutional liberty to say so, and if the Administration transcends the power intrusted to it by the People, I shall endeavor to point out their error, not in a contumacious or unkind spirit, but nevertheless firmly. To the standard of the Constitution, and the Union under it, of all the United States I shall cling as the only political hope of the country, our only defence against anarchy and despotism.

WHAT MUST WE SUPPORT?

But you say "unanimity of support is essential to the very life of the nation." Support of what? Laws and acts subversive of the Government? Laws and acts in direct and palpable contravention of the Constitution? Laws and acts outside of the Constitution? Where in the fundamental law of the Government, the Constitution, does the President, one of the administrators of the Supreme Law, find his authority for his emancipation proclamation? Where for his usurpation of the power to suspend the habeas corpus? Where for the confiscation acts? Where for his authority to arrest and incarcerate citizens? These are all acts of the Administration, not of the Government; they are acts subversive of the Government; acts that are "paralyzing and undermining" the Government; acts that are dividing the people of the North, alarming them for the safety of the Constitution, the Government, and arousing them to call their servants, the Administrators, to account.

It is on such a confounding of terms as this, of government and administration, that you charge "extreme and radical purposes" upon those who rally in support of the Government.

NECESSITY FOR OUR SOCIETY.

You must excuse me, dear sir, if I say that your letter, to so great an extent based upon the popular fallacies of the day, is itself a proof of the necessity of just such a Society as we have formed; because if minds like yours, intelligent, reflective, ingenuous, and conscientious, are so much at fault on the fundamental principles of our institutions, what must be inferred of the minds of others less intelligent, who imbibe their opinions, and mould their actions, from the prejudiced and befogged intellects controlling the fanatical avenues to public opinion?

CHARACTER OF ABOLITIONISM.

By the manner in which you allude to the "extreme radicalism and infidelity of the Garrison stamp," I am glad to find we have a common stand-point from which to view a portion of the field. Look at that dark conclave of conspirators, freedom-shriekers, Bible-spurners, fierce, implacable, headstrong, denunciatory, Constitution and Union haters, noisy, factious, breathing forth threatenings and slaughter against all who venture a difference of opinion from them, murderous, passionate advocates of imprisonments and hangings, bloodthirsty, and if there is any other epithet of atrocity found in the vocabulary of wickedness, do they not every one fitly designate some phase of radical abolitionism?.

DISTINCTION BETWEEN ABOLITIONISTS AND REPUBLICANS IMPOSSIBLE.

But you would have us make a distinction between these "radicals and infidels of the Garrison stamp," and the "immense party which," as you say, "came into being and into power only on the grand purpose of resisting Southern aggression."

Waiving the question you raise of the existence of any Southern Aggression, (previous to the last Presidential Election,) making resistance necessary on the part of the North, I ask you how can any distinction be made, between parties in close alliance, carrying out together and sustaining the same policy? Did not the Republican party, (in whose ranks I recognize many excellent, intelligent, conscientious men,) did not, I say, that party, in the full consciousness of the diabolical character of that "radical and infidel" faction, form a political alliance with it for the purpose of obtaining the power which they now hold? The expectation in forming the coalition was doubtless that you would be able to control the numerically smaller wing of the alliance. You thought this possible; I did not. So soon as it was apparent that such an alliance had been formed, I predicted that the abolition wing would control the whole; and if the party thus formed were successful, the hopes of the country for Peace and Union would be wrecked; for it is the very nature of fanaticism to leaven the whole lump. Was I not right? I ask you now to look at the state of the country. Is it not true that the abolition element has acquired the control of that "immense party" of which you speak? Are you not advocating and supporting the abolition policy of the Administration? Is it not true that these very "radicals and infidels of th Garrison stamp," whom you justly loathe, have framed and passed the most offensive abolition measures that tinge the whole policy of the Administration? So notorious is this fact, that to ask is to answer the question. These then, are the men with whom I find you affiliated. May I not appropriately quote your own question, and ask: "Can it be that the purest and most patriotic measures draw to their advocacy such persons, while they fail to attract the innumerable host who dissent," etc.? But I will not do you the injustice thus to judge you by the standard by which you would judge me, for your standard is defective. Every one of any experience in political movements is aware that on both sides, in party excitements, there is every possible variety of character associating together, not because of other or general affinities, but for the single purpose of carrying a common measure, in which all feel more or less interest. Their several interests in that common measure may be as diverse as possible; some from high principle, some for the triumph of an mion, some to obtain office, some to obtain money. It is not, therefore, safe to characterize a cause by the character of some few who may be loud and forward in advocating it. Bad men may promote a good cause for bad ends. It is safest to judge of a cause on its own merits.

EMANCIPATION PROCLAMATION AND THE CORNER-STONE.

I am sorry to find you defending the President's emancipation proclamation. It is a measure which I have considered from the moment of its promulgation, unwise, unconstitutional and calamitous, productive of evil and only evil, a measure that, more than any other, has tended to divide the counsels of the North, and unite the South, and render the restoration of the national Union next to hopeless. Your defense of it rests on a fallacy. You say "If it is a legitimate function of our Government to destroy the fabric of the Southern Confederacy, à fortiori, is it not justified in removing that which their own highest authorities pronounce to be its corner-stone?" To answer your question intelligently, it is necessary to know the nature of that corner-stone, before we can pronounce whether the Government would be justified in removing or attempting to remove it. If the stone should happen to be a providential fixture, unalterable in its very nature by any thing that man can do, a condition of a physical character, not to be affected by any act of man, you will agree with me, that the Government would not be justified in making any such necessarily abortive and quixotic attempt. I presume from your question you have adopted the prevalent misunderstanding of a passage in Mr. Stevens's speech at Savannah, in which he speaks of the corner-stone of the Confederate Government. You assume that this corner-stone is slavery, and so our Government is justified in its measures to destroy slavery. Although a great multitude both in Europe and America entertain this stereotyped error, and it has within a few days been twice reiterated in the late non-intervention report of the Senate Committee of Foreign Relations, yet it is none the less an egregious misapprehension of Mr. Stevens's remark, and a false assumption that the Confederate Government have adopted any such corner-stone. In the first place if Mr. Stevens had made such an announcement in his speech, (which he has not,) that would not constitute law for the Government. We do not look for the authority of the fundamental law of a government in a casual speech of any members of its administration, not even from the President, but in the fundamental law itself, in its written officially accepted Constitution. Now, there is not one word in the Constitution of the Confederacy that gives color to any such idea as slavery being the corner-stone of the Government; on the contrary, Section IX. Article I. clearly repudiates it. For if slavery is the adopted corner-stone of their Government, common-sense suggests, that in their fundamental law they would and should use every effort to strengthen and support it, and yet they forbid in that section and article that very policy which would give strength and permanency to such a corner-stone. Mr. Stevens, however, has made no such declaration, yet he is quoted every where as the source whence this widespread erroneous apothegm has proceeded. It may be well to ventilate this matter more thoroughly.

THE CORNER-STONE IS THE INEQUALITY OF THE TWO RACES.

Let us learn what Mr. Stevens actually did say. His language is this: "The foundations of our new Government are laid, its corner-stone rests upon"—what? slavery? no, "upon the great truth that the negro is not equal to the white man, that slavery "which he then defines to be, "subordination to the superior race, is his natural and moral condition. This our new Government is the first in the history of the world based upon this great physical, philosophical, and moral truth." This language could not be applied to slavery. It would be a strange misapplication of terms to call slavery a physical, philosophical and moral truth. He had just been stating to his hearers that the ideas prevalent at the time our Federal Constitution was formed "rested upon the assumption of the equality of the races." This proposition he declares to be unsound, and that the new Government was founded upon exactly the opposite idea. The error on one side which he combats is the assumed equality of the races. The opposite truth which he propounds is the physical, philosophical and moral truth, that the two races are not equal, and the inference he draws from this truth is that this physical difference determines the status of the inferior race. I confess I can not see how to escape that conclusion, except by denying the inequality of the races; by denying that there is this physical difference between them, for if there is this difference, then one race of necessity is superior, and the other inferior, and if the two physically unequal races are compelled to live together in the same community, the superior must govern the inferior. Can you avoid this conclusion?

THE CORNER-STONE CAN NOT BE REMOVED.

What prospect of success then is there, of any attempt to remove such a corner-stone? Who has constituted the two races physically different? There can be but one answer, it is God. To attempt, therefore, a removal of this corner-stone, which infinite wisdom has laid in the fabric of human society, is of so presumptuous a character, that few should be rash enough to undertake it. The physical inequality of the races then is this corner-stone, and not Slavery. Slavery, which is a Government, must be, in some form, the necessary resultant of this fact, and if you can remove the corner-stone, to wit, the physical inequality of the races, you may thus destroy slavery; but since the "Ethiopian can not change his skin," nor can any earthly power do it for him, so long as the two races exist together in the same community, you may change the master, or the relative position of the races, but one or the other will still be dominant. Slavery in America can only be abolished by separating the races. Is it worth while to attempt to remove a corner-stone which God has laid?

The reasoning of Mr. Stevens has an apposite parallel in the reasoning of the elder Adams, on the Theory of Government, as given in his "Life by his grandson, C. F. Adams, the accomplished representative of our Government to the Court of St. James.

"Unlike most speculators on the theory of Governments, Mr. Adams begins by assuming the imperfection of man's nature, and introducing it at once as an element with which to compose his edifice.

"He finds the human race impelled by their passions as often as guided by their reason, sometimes led to good actions by scarcely corresponding motives, and sometimes to bad ones rather from inability to resist temptation than from natural propensity to evil. This is the Corner-stone of his system."

Let us put Mr. Adams' theory in the language of Mr. Stevens. "The foundations of Civil Government are laid, its corner-stone rests upon the great truth that man has an imperfect nature, that the human race is impelled by their passions, that, therefore, subordination of the inferior to the superior, inherent in the very nature of Government, is man's natural and moral condition. Civil Government is based upon this great physical, philosophical and moral truth." Would it be just to accuse Mr. Adams of basing Government on Slavery, as the corner-stone, because he admits the necessity of the subordination of the inferior to the superior? In other words, to make him utter the absurdity, that "Government is the corner stone of Government"?

PRESIDENT LINCOLN AND MR. STEVENS PROCLAIM THE SAME CORNER-STONE.

Perhaps you may think I have adopted Southern views on this point, and that the inequality and physical differences of the two races are altogether Southern dogmas. I need not cross the Potomac to find the same great truth proclaimed in a quarter entitled to respect, and by one who politically outranks the Vice-President of the Confederacy, to wit, the President of the United States.

You will recollect the interview, on August fourteenth, 1862, between a committee of colored men and President Lincoln, invited by him, to hear what he had to say to them. His object in summoning them before him was to persuade them to emigrate, and he bases his argument to them on the very corner-stone declared by Mr. Stevens, to wit, the physical difference or inequality of the two races. President Lincoln's plan was to separate the races.

"You and we," said he to them, "are different races. We have between us a broader difference than exists between almost any other two races. Whether it is right or wrong, I need not discuss, but this physical difference is a great disadvantage to us both, as I think. Your race are suffering, in my judgment, the greatest wrong inflicted on any people. But even when you cease to be slaves, you are far from being placed on an equality with the white race. On this broad continent not a single man of your race is made the equal of a single man of ours. Go where you are treated the best, and the ban is still upon you. I do not propose to discuss this, but to present it as a fact with which we have to deal. I can not alter it if I would. It is a fact about which we all feel and think alike, I and you."

THEIR DIFFERENT MODES OF DEALING WITH THE CORNER-STONE.

Thus you perceive that both President Lincoln and Mr. Stevens are in perfect accord in accepting and acting upon the same great truth. President Lincoln accepts the physical inequality of the two races, as completely as Mr. Stevens, for where there is a broader difference than exists between almost any other two races, it would be absurd to say they are equal, especially when the President justly adds that this difference is physical, that is, grounded in the original constitution of each race. The only difference between the President of the United States and Mr. Stevens is in the use to which they put this physical, philosophical and moral truth, this corner-stone. Mr. Stevens proposes it in his Savannah speech, as the basis of the new government; Mr. Lincoln adopts it as the basis of his plan of separating the races, because of this physical difference. Mr. Stevens takes the stone, as a whole, upon which he would construct a government. Mr. Lincoln would split the stone and drag the parts asunder. Mr. Stevens accepts the fact and adjusts his fabric to it. Mr. Lincoln also accepts the fact, and is perplexed with inextricable difficulties in his attempts to dispose of the two portions of the common corner-stone.

THE PRESIDENT'S PERPLEXITIES IN DEALING WITH THE CORNER-STONE.

It is well to notice these perplexities of the President's mind as they are manifested in his singular interview with this colored delegation. The great truth of the physical difference of the two races is so palpable that he can not controvert it, and he frankly declines to make the attempt, yet, while accepting the fact, he more than doubts the wisdom of the fact itself by raising the singular question of right and wrong upon its existence, and thus (no doubt unconsciously) impugns the wisdom of the Creator, for who but God could ordain a physical difference in the two races? The raising of the question, therefore, whether a physical fact is "right or wrong," as if there were two sides to such a question, directly implicates the wisdom of the Creator. The President, too, while declining to discuss this question of right and wrong, actually decides it to be wrong, by declaring it to be a "disadvantage to both" races, in his opinion. The plain good sense of most of the remarks of the President in this interview, and the collisions of thought in his own breast which he discloses, where truths and doubts come into constant conflict, point to some great radical disturbing error, not in the President's mind alone, but pervading the popular mind on the subject of African slavery every where.

THE GREAT ERROR OF THE WORLD ON SLAVERY.

The great fallacy, so rife throughout the world, that slavery is the cause of our national troubles, rests on the almost universal persistent closing of the eyes to this fact of the physical difference between the two races. Slavery is not the cause of the sectional war, but a blind and mad resistance to a physical condition which God has ordained and which man is, in vain, attempting to subvert.

THE CORNER-STONE DULY ACKNOWLEDGED, SOLVES THE VEXED QUESTION OF SLAVERY.

Take your stand on this great acknowledged fact that the African and white races are physically different, follow out this truth to its logical result, and the question of slavery, or subordination of the inferior to the superior race, is clearly solved in all its phases.

Do you ask how?

First: We must accept as a fixed fact that ordinance of God which he has decreed, that the two races are physically different, and not complicate the fact, with any modifications, drawn from the prevalent visionary, infidel notions of an equality which has no existence, nor make any vain attempt to fix upon the mere relation of superior and inferior, or of rulers and ruled, moral or religious qualities which God in his word has not fixed to the relation.

Second: We must leave to each and every State in the Union where the two races exist together, whether in larger or smaller proportions, unmolested control over any adjustment of their relations to each other.

Third: In the kindly spirit of the Fathers of 1787, which they brought to the construction of our priceless Constitution, we should refrain from embittering the relations of the two races by an irritating busybodyism, a meddlesome interference with the manner in which the duties belonging to their relation to each other are or are not fulfilled, and taking the Apostle's counsel "to be quiet and mind our own business."

These three directions carried out in a Christian spirit faithfully, would restore the Union on the only basis on which it can ever be restored. Whether enlightened reason can make its voice heard in this din of warring passions and interests, so that its "Peace be still," can calm the storm that is desolating us, is a question I will not pretend to answer. It is to the true, sober, Christian sentiment of the country when disenthralled from its entanglement with the delusive socialistic and infidel theories of the day, that we look with any hope for our national salvation.

I have dwelt at some length on this one point because of its paramount importance. It is a noticeable and gratifying circumstance that our President and the Vice-President of the Southern government are in accord on a fundamental principle. Union of opinion on one point, especially if that point be fundamental, is hopeful, and prophetic of further conciliation, perhaps pacification in the future. The great physical fact of the broad difference of the African and white races, which the President so justly and openly recognizes, lies at the root of the whole controversy respecting slavery. Let us, then, study the condition of things resulting from this truth in the light of an intelligent Christian philosophy, not viewing it through the distorted medium of Abolition spectacles, but with the clear vision of an eye spiritually enlightened, and a temper of heart which accepts a Providential fact with humility, recognizing the highest wisdom in all God's ordinances, however mysterious to us, endeavoring to adapt our ways to his facts, not his facts to our ways. In that temper of heart, you will clearly discern that this providential arrangement of conditions in human society has for its end a purpose of infinite and eternal good to both races, a purpose clearly discerned in the light of gospel truth, but wholly obscured in the smoke with which a proud but shallow infidel philosophy, a false Christianity, and pretentious humanitarianism have enshrouded the whole subject.

PROBABLE ENGLISH INTRIGUE TO PREVENT RE-UNION.

One word on your remark that the South "spurns all overtures of conciliation." When, where, and by whom have any overtures been made where, and by whom have they been spurned? If you take the intemperate speeches, the passionate flings in editorial and anonymous articles, in the Southern journals, as the exponents of the real sentiments of the Southern masses, are these the safe bases upon which to found your remarks? If so, by parity of reasoning, the Southern masses should take the "radical and infidel" ravings of the "Garrison stamp" which are their counterpart in the speeches, editorials, and anonymous articles of our newspapers. We have been accustomed to condemn the South for its false judgment of Northern sentiment, because formed from just such radical sources. These are very unsafe sources of information on each side in exciting times like these, on which to found intersectional sentiment. Let me hint at one latent danger from relying on such undiplomatic sources of information. Glance for a moment at the attitude of England towards the United States. We there see two well-defined parties, neither of them friendly to us as a nation, one the cotton interest siding with the South, and the other her abolition coterics siding with the North, and so, England, balancing herself adroitly between these two parties in her own island, safe from any dangerous collision between them, harmful to herself, through her administration can give aid in our deplorable strife to the one section or to the other, or to both, to prevent conciliation, as best may serve the great political purpose of England, the permanent Division of the United States. Keeping within the bounds of a quasi-neutrality, England can, on the one hand, furnish the South with munitions of war, and privateers to prey on Northern commerce, and on the other can get up abolition demonstrations at Exeter Hall and elsewhere, to strengthen and encourage the fanatical element of the North, as the vicissitudes of our unnatural war, manifest, in the one or the other section, any abatement of that ferocity of hate which she has for so long a period engendered and sedulously promoted as the sure means of accomplishing her political purpose of *permanent separation. Is it an unreasonable supposition that English emissaries at the South, supported from the "secret service fund," are the authors of those assumed spurnings of conciliatory overtures which you look upon as coming from the Southern heart? While this supposition, natural in the light of her past history, is not only possible but probable, I need better evidence than has yet appeared that the Southern masses, the great conservative body of the Southern people are really Disunionists. There is evidence on the contrary, that Union sentiment exists in the South, and would show its existence and activity, were it not stifled by the unconstitutional means which Northern, in alliance with English abolitionism, have brought to bear, to kill it.

I stop rather abruptly, possibly to my disadvantage, for I am compelled to leave untouched points perhaps necessary to prevent misapprehension. There is, however, a sentence in your letter, which I can not pass unnoticed, grounded, it appears, upon a remark of Mr. Field, casting an imputation upon the respectability and purity of intention of those associated with me in the effort to diffuse political knowledge. What Mr. Field may have said under the influence of that mendacious report of the Post, or what he may think of their characters, becomes of consequence only through your reiteration of his opinion. I notice it, therefore, (since you are in actual ignorance as well of the persons who were present, as of their social and moral position,) to say that neither could their respectability be enhanced, nor my own diminished by my association with them. I can not close without thanking you for your frank letter and expressions of neighborly and friendly interest, which I cordially reciprocate.

Truly, with respect and high personal esteem, your friend and neighbor,

SAMUEL F. B. MORSE.

NOTE A.

"Politics and the pulpit are terms that have little agreement. No sound ought to be heard in the church but the healing voice of Christian charity. The cause of civil liberty and civil Government gains as little as that of religion, by this confusion of duties. Those who quit their proper character to assume what does not belong to them, are, for the greater part, ignorant both of the character they leave and of the character they assume. Wholly unacquainted with the world in which they are so fond of meddling, and inexperienced in all its affairs, on which they pronounce with so much confidence, they have nothing of politics but the passions they excite. Surely the church is a place where one day's truce ought to be allowed to the dissensions and animosities of mankind." — BURKE: Reflections on French Revolution, vol. i. p. 460.

"I have something also to the divines, though brief, to what were needful, not to be disturbers of the civil affairs; being in hands better able, and more belonging, to manage them; but to study harder, and to attend the office of good pastors, knowing that he whose flock is least among them has a dreadful charge, not performed by mounting twice into the pulpit with a formal preachment huddled up at the odd hours of a whole lazy week, but by incessant pains and watching, in season and out of season, from house to house, over the souls whom they have to feed. Which, if they well considered, how little leisure would they find to be the most pragmatical sidesmen of every popular tumult and sedition."—MILTON: Treatise on Tenure of Kings, etc.

Let me ask your attentive reflection upon such indications of English designs and desires as the following. In an able article on the American Revolution, in the Edinburgh Review of Oct., 1862, the reviewer says: "We therefore say, without hesitation, that we wish the war to cease, and the independence of the South to be established."

Lord Campbell, in the House of Lords on the 4th of August, 1862, said: "It is not too much to say that no class or party in the country any longer desires to see the reconquest of the South and the reconstruction of the Union." The reviewer says: "At the outset of the struggle the tendency was strong in England to side with the North. On the other hand, many felt undoubted satisfaction at the breaking up of that great democratic Government, whose institutions had been held up to them by their own reformers as a model of perfection," etc. The reviewer puts the question: "Is it the interest of the civilized world, and especially of our own country, (England,) that the American Union should be restored?" And he answers it by saying: "It can scarcely be said that the relations of the American Union to Europe, and to England in particular, have been so satisfactory as to make us anxious for its continuance."

Further on he says: "The feeling in England is not founded on a desire of vengeance or personal retribution on any one, for insults which we have received. It rests on a much more calm and rational basis—that is to say, on the conviction that the unity of the Government at Washington alone made the blow tell; it is hoped that when that unity is gone, all insults of the kind, if not so impolitic as to be avoided altogether, will at least be harmless, and of no consequence to England." In another place: "The independence of the South would open new markets for our manufactures, without the previous restrictions of Federal tariffs."

These extracts, from the most intelligent exponents of public opinion in England, could be multiplied to any extent. I give one or two only from the North British Review of February, 1862: "Most Englishmen, and ourselves among the number, have arrived at the conclusion, not only that the Secessionists will succeed in their enterprise, but that this success will, eventually, be of the most signal service to humanity, to civilization, and to the cause of universal and enduring peace."

Again: "We entertain, then, no doubt that the dissolution of the Union is an accomplished and irreversible fact, and one of the very greatest facts of our day. We can see no grounds on which the continuance of that Union should be desired by any wise or good man."

Again: "That the independence of the South and the dissolution of the great Republic are accomplished and irreversible facts, seems to us undeniable. The nation founded by Washington is severed—the Union contrived by his wisdom, and consecrated by his name, is at an end. We have now to ask what beauty there was in it that we should have longed for its continuance? What sacred purpose did it serve that we should deplore its end?"

These are specimens only indicating the bias of English sentiment, and showing that the English Government looks with exultation on the success of its plot of dividing our Union. Is this then the time for persistence in unconstitutional acts which must inevitably create further rendings and divisions?

SPEECH OF GEORGE TICKNOR CURTIS.

MR. PRESIDENT AND GENTLEMEN OF THE DEMOCRATIC ASSOCIATION:

Nothing but a sense of the duty which every man owes to society, according to the measure of his ability to serve it, would have induced me to address you in a time like this. It is a time of strange excitements and strange acts. No man who does not join in a wild, undiscriminating support of the measures and dogmas of a dominant party, can hope to escape detraction and obloquy. The utmost exertions are made to suppress ordinary freedom of speech; every device is employed to misrepresent, and every effort is made to misunderstand, the purposes of those who are in political opposition to the party in power. The vocabulary of political slang is exhausted to find terms of reproach and infamy, with which to stigmatize men whose motives have in their favor all the ordinary presumptions of purity, and whose arguments and opinions are at least entitled to a respectful hearing. This process, which has been going on for many months, with a violence unexampled even among a people whose political discussions are never marked by too much temperance, has culminated from time to time in outrages upon the rights of persons and property, and may do so again. It is no time when one would choose to utter opinions, without being impelled by a strong sense of duty.

But if we are not prepared to suffer for our convictions, they must be very feeble convictions. If we do not love our country and its institutions well enough to encounter all the hazards that may attend an honest effort to save them, our love must be cold indeed. Such, I am sure, is not your case, or my own. Meaning to utter here nothing but words of truth and soberness—the truth as I hold it, in the soberness that becomes me—I accept all the responsibility to public opinion which may justly fall thereon.

I propose to speak to you to-night upon a subject which seems to me to be strangely misapprehended by many good men, and strangely perverted by many who are not good. I mean the subject of "LOYALTY." The word itself, at least in the sense in which it is used in those countries from which we have lately borrowed it, can scarcely be said to have an appropriate place in our political and social system. But it is a word, at present, in great use among us; and we must take it as we find it, and are bound to inquire what are the moral duties which its just and true signification embraces. This inquiry, and the certain consequences of accepting and following out the doctrines which are now forced upon us, will form the topics of my discourse.

The true conditions of American loyalty are not to be found in the passionate exactions of partisan leaders, or in the frantic declamations of the pulpit, the rostrum or the press. People who do not like my political opinions may hurl at me the epithet "disloyal;" but when they have thrown this missile, they have not taken a single step towards defining, to me or others, what the true conditions of loyalty are. It is important that this step should be taken; for whether we are to go on or to cease, in this course of idle and unmeaning abuse, it concerns us all to know what measure of public duty may rightfully be exacted of us. To know the hight and depth of those great virtues which are comprehended in the term "patriotism"—to feel at once that they are seated in our affections and enthroned in our reason—is to "get wis-

The true conditions of American loyalty are to be found in the law of the land; in the institutions under which we live; in the duties flowing from the Constitution of our country; in the political system which we have inherited from our fathers, with all its manifold relations, through which we may trace the clear dividing-line that separates perfect from imperfect obligations.

The text of our fundamental law is the guide, and the sole guide, in all ethical inquiries into the duties of the citizen. To that source all must come, rulers and people alike; to that fountain all must resort. The vague and shifting standards that are drawn from supposed dangers to what is called "the national life," or which spring from the conflicting judgments of men respecting public necessities, can determine nothing. These things can furnish no rule. We must have a rule, for loyalty is a moral duty; and it must therefore be capable of definition. A people whose "national life" exists only by virtue of a written constitution, and who can have no necessities that lie out of or beyond that written necessity, can find no rule of loyalty in any of the necessities which their constitution of government does not cover. They may find grounds of expediency, in one or another supposed necessity for destroying their constitution; but it would be extremely absurd to say that this expediency could be made the object of their "loyalty." Let us go then to the fountain head — the source of all our national obligations.

The Constitution of the United States itself prescribes the full measure of our loyalty in these words:

"This Constitution and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be THE SUPREME LAW OF THE LAND."

Observe how precise as well as comprehensive this great rule of our duty is. It expresses without ambiguity the whole of our obligations towards the Federal Government. It makes a supreme law; — a law paramount to all other human laws — an obligation transcending all other political obligations. It leaves no room whatever for the intrusion of another or a rival claimant to our civil obedience. That claimant can neither be a person invested or uninvested with office, nor an idea of public necessity, nor an imaginary national life beyond or apart from the life created under the Constitution. The only possible claimant of our obedience is the LAW; for as that law is made supreme, all other demands or demandants upon our submission are of necessity excluded.

What then does this supreme law embrace? The text on which I am commenting itself furnishes the answer. "This Constitution," it says — what this Constitution contains, and the laws that shall be made in conformity with it. — these shall be the supreme law, rising in authority above all other laws. No public necessities, save as they are embodied in the Constitution; no "national life" save as it exists under the Constitution; no legislation that is not in accordance with the Constitution — is the supreme law; but what the Constitution ordains or authorizes, that is the public necessity, that is the national life, because it is the supreme civil obligation.

Such is the fundamental character of our political system; and so perfect is it in its consistency with itself and with the rights of all who are subject to it, that it contains a machinery by which the conformity of all acts of the Government with the principles of the Constitution may be peacefully tested, without forcible resistance. If the acts of the Government are complained of as unconstitutional, they may be brought to a judicial test, or the people may themselves pass upon them at the ballot-box, through the instrumentality of frequent elections.

Now when we look into the Constitution of our country to discover the full scope of the obligations which are embraced in the supreme law of the land, we find that it grants certain political powers and rights to the central or national government, and reserves all other political powers and rights to the States or the people. Hence it is plain that the reserved rights of the States or the people are just as much a part of the supreme law of the land, just as much comprehended within the duty of our allegiance, just as much the rightful objects of our "loyalty," as the powers and rights vested in the national government. If the political existence created by the Constitution is the national life, called into being by the supreme law of the land — and he would be a bold and reckless sophist who should undertake to find that national life any where else — then the rights which the Constitution reserves to the States or the people are equally comprehended in that life, for they are equally declared to be parts of the supreme law of the land. For this reason, all idea of a supremacy of the national rights or powers or interests, when founded on something not embraced in the Constitution, is purely visionary. No duty of "loyalty" can possibly be predicated of any claim that is not founded in the supreme law of the land. When it is once ascertained what are the rights and powers vested in the national authorities by the Constitution, they are parts of the supreme law, and our "loyalty" is due to them. When we know what are the rights and powers reserved to the States or the people—and we know that they are the whole residue of all possible political rights and powers — they are equally the objects of our "loyalty," for the self-same reason, namely, they are parts of the supreme law of the land.

Again: the Constitution not only contains some political powers and rights granted to the Federal Government, and a reservation of all other political powers and rights to the States or the people, but it also embraces rights of person and property guaranteed to every citizen in his individual capacity; and these are equally made, not by implication but expressly, parts of the supreme law of the land, and are therefore equally the objects of our "loyalty." All pretence, therefore, of any paramount authority in the central government to override these personal rights of the citizen, or to claim our "loyalty" in disregard of these coordinate parts of the supreme law, is a perversion of the very idea of American loyalty. As well might the citizen claim, because the Constitution has made his personal rights part of the supreme law, that therefore the loyalty of his neighbor is due to him alone, as the Government can claim that loyalty is due solely, or chiefly, or primarily, or ultimately to the functions which it is appointed to perform. The rights of the Government, the rights of the States, and the rights of individuals, all and equally, are comprehended in the supreme law of the land, and our loyalty is due to that law, to the whole and to every part of it, and public officers are in the same sense and for the same reason bound to obey every "jot and tittle" of it.

These positions are very plain and familiar truths; too familiar, perhaps, you will say, to require to be stated. But in these days, nothing that is true is too fundamental or too plain to be inculcated. The extravagant language and ideas that are current in the mouths of even sensible people, on this subject of loyalty, would have exceeded all capacity of belief in any other period than this. If one were to undertake to reduce this language and these ideas to something like a definite moral proposition, it would be found that the doctrine is something like this. In a time of war, when there are great public dangers, the rights of the States and of individuals must give way; and if those who administer the government are satisfied that public necessity requires them to use powers that transcend the limits of the Constitution, he who does not acquiesce in their judgment, or who questions their authority to do particular acts, is a "disloyal" citizen. This statement of the doctrine is the best that I know how to make; for I know not how else to interpret or to apply the denunciations which we find in the proceedings of public meetings, in the columns of party newspapers, and in the common speech and action of very many persons. I need only point to the utter prohibition that is attempted to be placed upon all discussion of any plan for bringing this dreadful civil war to a close, except ng by the particular method of fighting; or to the manner in which the terms 'traitor" and "secessionist" are hurled at all who question the policy and lawfulness of the methods pursued by the Government in the prosecution of the war. For myself, I do not profess to have a definite opinion, as yet, concerning several of the modes in which a peace might safely be sought. But I know not what right I have, legally or morally, to say that my neighbor shall not discuss such a question, or shall not act upon it at the polls, or shall be denounced as "disloyal," because his opinions on these subjects differ from mine. It is to me very plain, that this whole effort of a dominant party to control opinion, by such means, can, under such institutions as ours, lead to but one of two results—the establishment of a despotism of a very bad kind, or the overthrow of the political power of those who resort to such methods. Either the institutions of the country will perish, or the party which undertakes to repress all freedom of discussion will perish. I hope we shall make up our minds to destroy the party and save the institutions. But of this hereafter.

Let me return to this new doctrine of "loyalty," which requires us to acquiesce in silence in the judgment of public servants as to what the public necessities require, even to the extent of overlooking great infractions of the Constitution. This doctrine entirely ignores the purpose for which the Constitution imposed certain stringent limitations on the powers of the national government. In order to explain this, it will be necessary to descend from general reasoning to particular illustrations.

The Constitution, after conferring certain well-defined political powers upon the Federal Government, declares that all other political powers are reserved to the States or the people; and it further secures to every citizen certain inalienable rights of person and property, which it recognizes as inherent in the citizen forever, beyond all possible control of that government. Now does any one suppose that this was done without a serious purpose? Does any man imagine that it was done for what is vulgarly called buncombe? Do you believe that it was done with a mental reservation of the doctrine of public necessity, standing behind the Constitution and ready to strike it down from its supreme control over us and our affairs? Let me suggest to you, my fellow-citizens, that you can not study the Constitution and the purposes of the great generation who made it, without seeing that the very object of all this careful provision for rights that were placed beyond the reach of the central government, was to exclude forever this doctrine of public necessity as a measure of the powers that were conferred upon that government. I use this language deliberately. I affirm that when the Constitution repeated the words of Magna Charta, not as a statute but as a fixed provision of fundamental law, and declared that "no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law"—it meant to make a rule for all time and all circumstances, shutting the door forever against any supposed public necessity for violating the rights of the citizen.*

* It is in my opinion, a monstrous fallacy to suppose that the implied authority for suspending the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus warrants indefinitely the arrest and detention of citizens without judicial process. This implied authority was given in the original Constitution. But after the adoption of that instrument, the people came forward and annexed to it the prohibition of Magna Charta, making that provision part of the supreme law. The two clauses of the Constitution must therefore be so construed and applied as not to render nugatory the one last adopted, and so as to give effect to its stringent declarations. These clauses can be reconciled only by such a course of legislative and executive action, as will preserve the operation of both. If under peculiar circumstances of imminent danger the actual seizure is made without judicial process, the prisoner should immediately be charged with an offense by warrant; and then the suspension of the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus may intervene, to prevent his discharge from the imprisonment for causes which would operate to discharge him if the writ were not suspended. This is the only course of legislation, in my opinion, that can be consistent with all the provisions of the Constitution. I do not see how it is possible to contend that a continual imprisonment, founded on mere executive seizure, can be authorized by taking away the privilege of the habeas corpus. If Magna Charta had not been interposed there might have been more ground for this pretension; for then there would have been no necessity for process at any time.

In like manner I affirm that when the Constitution reserved to the States or the people all political powers not granted to the Federal Government, it meant to preclude every ground of necessity for the assumption by that government of the powers thus withheld.

In fact, the idea of a written constitution—a fixed and supreme law—is utterly irreconcilable with the theory that the administrators of such a government can resort to their own judgment of public necessity, and act contrary to that supreme law, and that good citizenship requires the people to acquiesce in that judgment. They who set up such a claim for our rulers claim for them an entirely irresponsible power. We are required, for example, to believe that what are called "arbitrary arrests" are necessary, but no one explains to us the grounds of that necessity. No account is rendered. We are to assume the existence of causes of justification, but no one tells us what those causes are. They may remain forever locked in the bosoms of those who do the acts of which we complain. Why should American citizens, filling high places of public trust, act upon such a principle as this? Can any thing be more degrading, more injurious to the public conscience of a people, than to form a habit of implicit belief in the existence of necessities which nobody explains, and of which nobody is required to give an account? You may hear a hundred men in a day, speaking of some particular case of this kind, profess its necessity; and not one man in the whole hundred can tell you what the necessity was.

My friends, these false theories of loyalty—for false I must deem them—are infusing into our national character a fatal poison. They are leading those who cherish them to impute factious and interested motives to all pure and manly efforts in defense of the principles of civil liberty. They who indulge in this dangerous work of deriding the defenders of constitutional rights, can have but a very inadequate conception of the convulsions that must precede the final loss of those rights. They take but a very superficial view of the depth of those feelings which lead men in all free countries to resist every form of mere arbitrary power. They make no account of the principles implanted in our breasts, and cherished into dictates of nature by generations of training in the practice of liberty; those principles on which depends the primary office of an opposition in a free government, and by means of which all constitutional rulers are restrained from abuses of power. Impatient of those restraints, such persons rush to methods which can not be employed without undermining the foundations of liberty; and for a supposed temporary advantage barter away the strength and the supports, the vigor and the health of the body politic. This has been in all ages the downward course of nations, who have substituted for free institutions and systems of fundamental law a blind and unquestioning faith in public necessities, and have then welcomed some despotic power. Thus did the Roman Empire succeed the Republic, and thus we may be preparing ourselves for a like destiny. Let us be warned in time.

I have endeavored to state with due precision and fairness one very important part of the conditions of a true loyalty. But I should leave this subject in an imperfect state, if I omitted, on the other hand, to give equal prominence to certain principles of our political system which limit the mode in which States and individuals are to exercise their constitutional rights of opposition to the measures of the Federal Government. I have briefly adverted to this already; but a more extended statement of the principle is necessary.

I will assume then that a measure, having all the forms of law, is believed upon good grounds to be a violation of the constitutional rights of States and individuals. What is the rule of action under such circumstances? There is no difficulty whatever in finding the answer. By the establishment of a judicial system within the Federal Constitution, having ultimate cognizance of all cases arising under that Constitution, one mode is provided by which both States and individuals can ascertain whether their reserved rights are invaded by the Federal authorities

This remedy is at all times open; and there is no valid reason why a State should forcibly assert its constitutional rights, any more than that an individual should do the same thing. While a State remains a member of the Union, it is bound to vindicate its constitutional rights and powers in that mode which is consistent with the preservation of that Union; and it can at any time, under any supposed violation of its rights or the rights of its people, make a case for judicial determination. Forcible resistance is open revolution; and nothing but an intolerable oppression, cutting off all judicial remedy, can make revolution a necessity and a duty.

Again:—there is another equally good reason, which shows that no popular tumults, and no forcible resistance, are either legally or morally justifiable, while the ballot-box remains untouched. If the people of a State have reason to believe that measures of the Federal Government are subversive of the Constitution, it is their right and their duty to correct the evil by a change of their rulers. In cases of supposed extensive violations of the Constitution, to which the attention of the whole country is called, the remedy of elections is ordinarily sufficient to reverse, and is in our system held to reverse, erroneous constructions of that instrument, as well as errors of policy. The popular tribunal may not be quite so precise in its action as the judicial; but there can be no mistaking the judgment of the people, when it is pronounced upon an issue clearly made with an Administration which is charged with infringing the Constitution.

These principles no one, I presume, will be inclined to dispute. But there is thrust in, to intercept their application to the present crisis in our affairs, a doctrine which I for one distinctly repudiate. That doctrine is, in substance, that all questioning of the measures of the Administration should be postponed while we are in a civil war; that there should be but one party; and that all should rally in an "unconditional support of the constituted authorities." This dogma needs examination. If by an unconditional support of the constituted authorities, it is intended to claim that we must all recognize the fact that we are engaged in a civil war, and that we must conduct it, while it lasts, through those authorities, and must hold no irregular intercourse with the public enemy, I readily accede to the proposition. But if it is meant that we are not to question the methods which the Administration pursue in the prosecution of the war; that we have no rightful control over their measures; or that we are to refrain from demanding a change of their policy—I reject the doctrine without the slightest hesitation. The very issue which you make with the Administration of itself refutes that doctrine. That issue is, that their course of action subverts the Constitution; makes the war an attack upon the social system of the South; and renders it impossible to succeed in that war, without destroying, for the South and for the North, the whole principle of State sovereignty on which the Union was necessarily founded as one of its corner-stones. It is in vain to say that the acts of the Administration, of which you complain, are military measures. In every civil war there are political considerations which must qualify the military action, or that action can result only in disaster. A government that undertakes to suppress a great revolt of powerful and organized communities, at the same time furnishing the strongest of moral motives for resistance, is in the same situation as he who fights his enemy with one hand and supplies him through the other with the munitions of war. In the present case we have made the conquest one of infinite difficulty, by first declaring that we waged the war solely for the supremacy of the Constitution, and then turning round and making the overthrow of the Constitution a too probable result of our success.

This result will not be confined to the condition of the revolted States, if the war continues to be prosecuted as it has been for the last six months. You can not acquiesce in the measures of the Administration, involving, as they do, the exercise of many powers that lie wholly outside of the Constitution, without leaving this country hereafter to be ruled by powers that will rest upon nothing but what the judgment of a party, or a faction, or a clique, shall deem to be public necessities. In this aspect of our affairs I can not avoid a word of earnest appeal to all reflecting men, to consider what fate must attend the securities of property, as well as the rights of person, if we permit the Constitution to be lost.

There are five great securities of property, the continuance of which in this country is dependent on the preservation of the Constitution of the United States. Let me enumerate them. They are:

1. A uniform metallic currency, as the basis and standard of all values.

2. The power to establish a uniform system of bankruptcies, whenever the interests of commerce require it.

3. The inviolability of contracts by State Legislatures.

4. The provision which places property under the protection of the Constitution, as against Federal power, so that no man can be deprived of it without legal process.

5. The prohibition which restrains the Federal power of eminent domain, so that private property can not be taken for public use without just compensation.

Now no rational being can suppose that these guaranties can be extorted anew from that centralized despotism which is but too likely to be the only successor that the Constitution of the United States can ever have. I care not what ideas men may form of that "stronger government," which some allow themselves to wish for in the place of our present system. My reason and my instincts both teach me that that government will be an unchecked and uncontrolled despotism; and we need not look far for the signs of its approach. Consciously or unconsciously, there are many agencies at work to promote its advent; one of the most potent of them is the false doctrine of "loyalty," against which I contend, and another is the perilous idea that you can safely trifle with a fixed constitution. We have made such vast strides towards a system entirely unknown to the Federal Constitution, that we can now see the nature of the only power that will ever replace it. When that power has fully come, the present securities of property will have been swept away with the securities of person. Both will disappear with the Federal Constitution; and we shall never extort them as concessions from the new power, or place them beyond reach, if we can extort them. There are no Barons on this our American earth to make a new Magna Charta; our race will never see another Runnymede; and we shall never see another Washington, another Madison, another Hamilton, another Jay, another Patrick Henry, another Samuel Adams. Even the States, with their separate constitutions, their bills of rights, and their present capacity to protect their people, will fall beneath the new and unchecked power to which the nation will surrender itself, when it cuts aloof from the Federal Constitution; and if they should not, every intelligent man, who has had much to do with accumulation, knows, or should know, that property, deprived of the supports which it derives from the Federal Constitutional system, can maintain but a feeble and precarious existence. We must remember that long, long centuries ago—in a state of society in one sense rude, but when the manly virtues of our ancestors gave them a historic splendor that we can only reflect, it providentially happened that the rights of property and the rights of person were indissolubly blended in one immortal maxim, that was laid, for all time, at the basis of the civilization of our race. Whatever may happen in other civilizations, or in other climes, Liberty and Property for us must flourish or perish TOGETHER.

My friends, it is time that the warfare upon opinion, and thought, and speech, should cease. It is time we had ascertained that our national difficulties can never be cured without the action of the people. It is time we had exploded the fallacy that patriotism and party are incompatible in any conceivable circumstances of our country. You, at any rate, let me hope, reject this dogma as a delusion; for in all the gloom of the present, in all the dark uncertainties of the future, I put my hopes in the great Democracy of the Union. I see nothing else to which we can look. I see you, it is true, occasionally distracted by the tactics of your opponents, occasionally disturbed by the indiscretion of friends. But I also see you animated by a patriotism which I fully believe will guide you aright, and which, in spite of all that men may say of you, commands my respect and confidence. Permit me then, with such freedom as may be taken by one who neither has nor seeks any special place in your organization, to offer you a word of friendly counsel.

What you need, as it seems to me, is to be fully impressed with a belief in your mission and in your capacity to fulfill it. That mission is to save the Constitution of the United States. By saving it, I mean of course that you are to save it for the whole Union, for the South and the North, for the East and the West, with every right which it protects completely reëstablished. I can see no other mode of saving it; for it is to my mind apparent, that a war prosecuted against the South for the acquisition of powers over their domestic institutions which the Constitution expressly withholds from the Federal Government, can result in nothing but the establishment of a system under which there can be no local rights of self-government left for any section or any State. This it is your mission to prevent. You can not prevent it, by uniting with those who proffer support of the war without the slightest protest against the unconstitutional policy with which it is prosecuted. In all the late popular proceedings looking to the establishment of what are styled "Loyal Leagues," I have not seen one word of indignant remonstrance against the unconstitutional measures of the Administration. You can not expect, and need not look for such remonstrance from assemblies largely composed of those who are the peculiar political supporters of the Administration, and who are more or less responsible for its measures. Public opinion, if it is to make itself heard and felt against all violations of the Constitution, must make its utterances through the action and the voice of those who have never failed to protest against the policy that has created for us so much peril. If that public opinion fails to recognize this necessary channel of expression — if it yields itself to a fatal apathy, or will not see how it can at once save a Government and change an Administration — then all will be lost, and there will remain to us only the consolation that we have individually done our duty.

You are then, permit me to add, to seek by every constitutional and upright method, to obtain the control of all the organisms of government. If in the mean time you can not induce the present Executive of the United States to change his policy, then, remembering his position, possess your souls in patience until you can give him a constitutional successor. Let every thing be prepared with one fixed and unselfish purpose: namely, to make every successive election reverse the doctrines and dogmas and usurpations which you know you should condemn. By this course of action, instead of weakening, you will strengthen your Government; for you will make it apparent to the whole world that the present arbitrary rule is to be succeeded by a period when the Constitution is once more, in all its beneficence and all its power, to be "THE SUPREME LAW OF THE LAND." Fail to do this, and the nation, losing heart and hope, will lose sight of the methods by which a constitutional succession can be preserved to a better day, and will yield itself to the despair which welcomes despotism, or to the rage which welcomes anarchy.

I know the difficulties of your position; but you must not falter, and you must not admit that you can fail. High virtues are demanded of you. You must live down slander, you must despise obloquy, you must watch your own motives, you must chasten your own spirits, you must

> ——"stretch every nerve

to the salvation of your country. You must win public confidence by your purity; you must challenge public respect by your intelligence. Above all, and before all, without one instant's hesitation, without pleading one solitary excuse, you must be true to the principles of civil liberty. You must learn that those principles are no chance production of the "piping times of peace," but that they are the rules which in all times of tranquillity and all times of commotion have been evolved out of the wisdom of ages, to save us from the mad thirst for arbitrary power that has again and again seized upon highly civilized nations, and destroyed the hopes of mankind.

Preparing yourselves in this way for the great task that is before you, you will be able to approach the difficult problem of this war with a firm and fearless step. You will see that this problem presents to you the alternatives of consenting to a dismemberment of the country, or of preventing that dismemberment by a reversal of the popular and governmental action which has made it so nearly an accomplished fact. You will soon hear it said, by those who have urged on the war upon this most disastrous policy, that it is too late now; that the breach can never be closed; that the South must be permitted to go in peace. Just here, then, precisely here, before all is given up to the control of the extremists North and South, you must interpose. You have a right to have other measures and other counsels tried. You are numerically a majority in at least four of the largest States in the Union. You may rightfully demand that the Constitution, with all its guarantees, be tendered to the revolted States; and you may rightfully do all that can assure the people of the South of its protection, without calling upon your government to change its military attitude. I know well enough the insidious answer that is made to this suggestion; how confidently we are told that the South would reject your offer with scorn. But I tell you that history has never seen a case of war, foreign or civil, in which a nation could absolve itself from the moral responsibility of doing right, by asserting beforehand that it knew its adversary would do wrong. The elements of a moral judgment do not exist in advance of such an offer, either in the controversies of nations or in the controversies of individuals. Whatever others may think, or say, or do, you, I trust, will act upon a principle which I am persuaded rests upon a moral foundation that no sophistry and no casuistry can successfully assail. If, after such an offer, the war must still be carried on, no language can overstate the advantage that would be gained in the vigor of its prosecution.

And here, gentlemen, I close. One path of duty is clearly open before us. I can see no other now. Sufficient unto the day is the evil, sufficient unto the day is the duty thereof. He who does that one duty in a firm and humble faith in the providence of God, prepares himself for a clear perception of the next that may arise in the future.

No. 9.

EMANCIPATION AND ITS RESULTS.

INTRODUCTORY.

GIGANTIC efforts are now being made to convince the people of the North that the overthrow of the present relations of the black and white races in the South, or what is mistakingly called "the Abolition of Slavery," would be a great benefit to all concerned—a benefit to the white race, to the negro race, and a grand step in the progress of civilization and Christianity. Now the simple TRUTH is the exact opposite of this. To overthrow the present relation of the races is to injure both the white man and the negro, and to inflict a deadly blow upon the cause of humanity, civilization, and Christianity. We only need to approach this subject in a spirit of candid inquiry, and to bring it to the touchstone of FACT. It is proposed to show in the following pages—

First. The effects of emancipation in the Northern States in the increase of crime, pauperism, and vice among the freed negroes;

Second. Its results in the West-India Islands, where it has ruined production, destroyed commerce, and where the negro is fast relapsing into his original African savagism;

Third. The effect of Free Negroism upon the commerce, wealth, and business of the world, and especially upon the white laboring and producing classes, in producing a scarcity of tropical productions, and a consequent increase of price, thus allowing Negro Idleness to tax WHITE LABOR.

The inherent right or wrong of any measure may be fairly determined by its effect. That which produces crime, pauperism, immorality, poverty, and misery can not in the nature of things be right. Theories vanish before the stern arbiter of FACTS, and to that unerring tribunal we appeal.

PART I.

FREE NEGROISM IN THE NORTH.

SOON after the close of the Revolutionary War, a few individuals, mostly Quakers, commenced efforts for the emancipation of negroes then held as so-called slaves in all the States, except Massachusetts and Pennsylvania It was a purely philanthropic movement, and had no more connection with politics than have the various missionary societies now in existence for diffusing Christianity in Burmah or China. Several States were induced to follow the example of Massachusetts and Pennsylvania, namely, Connecticut, Rhode Island, New-Hampshire, Vermont, New-York, and New-Jersey. In New-Jersey and New-York emancipation was gradual, and though provided for in the former State in 1784, and in the latter in 1799, "slavery" did not entirely disappear until 1820, '27. Here emancipation ceased, and did it ever occur to any one to inquire why, all of a sudden, this should be so? If it were a benefit to take from the negro the care and guidance of white men, why did not all the rest of the States follow the example? This question is better answered by the detail of a few facts.

It was not without grave apprehensions as to the result that emancipation had been inaugurated, and it was only nine years after Pennsylvania had set the example in 1780, that Benjamin Franklin issued an Appeal for aid to his society "to form a plan for the promotion of industry, intelligence, and morality among the free blacks." How far Franklin's benevolent scheme had fallen short of his anticipations, may be judged of from the fact that forty-seven years after Pennsylvania had passed her act of emancipation, one third of the convicts in her penitentiaries were negroes or mulattoes! Some of the other States were even in a worse condition, one half of the convicts in the penitentiary of New-Jersey being freed negroes. But Massachusetts was almost as badly off, as appears from the report of the "Boston Prison Discipline Society."

This benevolent Association included among its members, Rev. Francis Wayland, Rev. Austin Edwards, Rev. Leonard Woods, Rev. William Jenks, Rev. B. B. Wisner, Rev. Edward Beecher, Lewis Tappan, Esq., John Tappan, Esq., Hon. John Bliss, and Hon. Samuel M. Hopkins. In the First Annual Report of the Society, dated June 2d, 1826, they enter into an investigation "of the progress of crime, with the causes of it," from which we make the following extract:

"Degraded Character of the Colored Population. — The first cause, existing in society, of the frequency and increase of crime is the degraded character of the colored population. The facts, which are gathered from the Penitentiaries, to show how great a proportion of the convicts are colored, even in those States where the colored population is small, show most strikingly the connection between ignorance and vice."

The Report proceeds to sustain its assertions by statistics, which prove, that, in Massachusetts, where the free colored people constituted one seventy-fourth part of the population, they supplied one sixth part of the convicts in her Penitentiary; that in New-York, where the free colored people constituted one thirty-fifth part of the population, they supplied more than one fourth part of the convicts; that in Connecticut and Pennsylvania, where the colored people constituted one thirty-fourth part of the population, they supplied more than one third part of the convicts; and that in New-Jersey, where the colored people constituted one thirteenth part of the population, they supplied more than one third part of the convicts.

In the second annual report of the Society, dated June 1st, 1827, the subject is again alluded to, and tables are given, showing more fully the degraded character of the freed negro population. "The returns from the several prisons," says the report, "show that the white convicts are remaining nearly the same, or are diminishing, while the colored convicts are increasing. At the same time the white population is increasing in the Northern States much faster than the colored population." The following table is taken from the report:

In Massachusetts,.	313	50	1 to 6
In New-York,..	981	101	1 to 4
In New-Jersey,..	67	33	1 to 2

Were not these facts and statistics powerful arguments for arresting emancipation? The other States, seeing its evil effects, took the alarm. Some of them passed laws prohibiting the freed negroes from coming within them, and it began to be declared that it was much easier and less expensive to manage "slaves" than free blacks. So great was the reäction which the disastrous experiment of emancipation produced, that some of the States passed laws prohibiting emancipation, unless upon condition that the freed negroes be removed from the country. Thus the Colonization Society arose. It was argued that if the negro could not rise to any respectable condition here, it might be owing to the prejudice against his color and the social outlawry visited upon him. To place him, therefore, in a position where none of these influences could affect him, it was proposed to colonize all who were freed, and, for many years, negro "philanthropy" exhausted itself in this direction. The Society was popular at one time, even at the South. It was regarded by some as the agent or means which would gradually do away with "slavery," and by others as simply an organization to get rid of the incubus of freed negroes. In 1826 the Society, by a resolution, declared itself as "not designing to interfere with slavery where it existed, nor yet as endeavoring to perpetuate its existence." This did not suit the more radical members, and Wm. Lloyd Garrison, James G. Birney, Gerrit Smith, and others, who had ranked among its prominent supporters, shortly after withdrew from it. In 1833 the British Parliament passed the act for the West-India emancipation, and the result was a great impulse to the cause of anti-slavery in the United States.

But no more States could be induced to try emancipation. The advocates of emancipation formed societies, and raised the cry of "immediate abolition." They deluged Congress with petitions, and the country with tracts, pamphlets, and newspapers. Thousands and millions of pages of printed matter were sent out, but all in vain. "Moral suasion" accomplished nothing, and "slavery" not only remained as firm as ever, but it had extended and fortified itself in such a manner that the Abolitionists themselves gave up their "immediate abolition" demand in utter despair. They cried, but no one listened. They expostulated, but the public heeded them not. The freed negroes of the North were a standing monument to the folly of Abolitionism. They had not progressed, or shown themselves active, enterprising members of society. They would black boots, whitewash and do other menial offices, and they would hold conventions and pass ridiculous resolutions, but as for clearing up land and settling themselves in independent circumstances, they would not. In 1852 Gerrit Smith, who has done more for freed blacks than any other man, for he gave all who would accept them, free homes on his lands, complained in a letter to Governor Hunt that "the most of them preferred to rot both physically and morally in cities, rather than become farmers or mechanics in the country." His own experiment with them resulted in signal failure. Even Horace Greeley, in a moment of apparent forgetfulness, declared in the Tribune, September 22d, 1855, that "nine tenths of the free blacks have no idea of setting themselves to work except as the hirelings or servitors of white men; no idea of building a church or other serious enterprise, except through beggary of the whites. As a class, the blacks are indolent, improvident, servile and licentious."

We have shown what the condition of the freed negro population of the North was in 1826–27, according to the statistics of the Boston Prison Discipline Society. We will now give some figures and facts from the United States Census Report of 1850, showing the number of black and white convicts in the penitentiaries of the four States of Massachusetts, New-York, Pennsylvania, and Ohio, and the proportion of free negro convicts over the whites:

POPULATION IN 1850.

	Mass.	N. Y.	Penn.	Ohio.
Whites,.....	985,450	3,048,325	2,258,160	1,955,050
Free Negroes,.	9,064	49,069	53,626	25,279

NUMBER IN THE PENITENTIARIES AND STATE PRISONS.

	Mass.	N. Y.	Penn.	Ohio.
Free Negroes,...	47	257	109	44

It will be seen from the above, that in Massachusetts there was one white convict to every 2533 of white population. In New-York there was one white convict to every 2208 of white population. In Pennsylvania one to every 6884, and in Ohio one to every 5400. But how stands the case as to the free negroes? In Massachusetts, there was one free negro convict to every 192 of the free negro population. In New-York one to every 190. In Pennsylvania one to every 492, and in Ohio one to every 574. It is instructive to note these facts. It appears that crime among the free negroes of Massachusetts is over eight times greater than among the white population. Yet the negroes of Massachusetts have enjoyed the benefits of "impartial freedom" ever since 1780. It would seem, therefore, that the more you try to force white men's rights upon them, the lower and lower they sink in the scale of morality.

The freed negro population of the United States has increased from 59,466 in 1790, to 434,495 in 1850, and 481,823 in 1860. In some States it has become so large as to excite well-grounded alarm, and what is remarkable, some of the very States that have little or none of this population among them, are industriously engaged in trying to force it upon others.. The six Eastern States, as is shown by the census returns of 1850—Maine, New-Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Connecticut—have 65,440 square miles; and in 1850 they had 23,021 freed negroes in the six States. By the census taken in 1790 they had 17,042 free and slave. The State of New-York has 46,220 square miles, and had 49,069 free negroes in 1850. She has to-day, under the census of 1860, 49,031—a decrease. The six New-England States, and New-York, have 111,660 square miles, and 72,090 free negroes. The little State of Maryland, has but 10,755 square miles; and in 1850 she had 74,723 free negroes; according to the census of 1860, she has nearly 84,000! The State of Pennsylvania has 46,215 square miles, lying upon the northern border of the State of Maryland, only divided by an imaginary line, and she had 53,626 free negroes in 1850. Thus we see that the State of Maryland has not one fourth as many square miles as Pennsylvania, and yet Maryland has, by the census of 1860, 27,345 more free blacks than the State of Pennsylvania. The State of Delaware has, by the census of 1860, 19,723 free negroes. The District of Columbia has 11,107 free negroes, and if no slaves had been removed before the abolition of "slavery," this number would have been increased to 14,000—and this, too, in a territory less than ten miles square! Here, then, we see the comparatively small territory comprising the States of Maryland, Delaware, and the District of Columbia, with no less than 115,000 free negroes! Set free all their "slave" negro population, which previous to the emancipation in the District of Columbia must have been about 100,000, and there would be 215,000 free negroes on 13,000 square miles, or one negro to every 2½ white persons! No people can stand such an incubus of black laziness, vice, and crime as this state of affairs would produce, to say nothing of degrading the white population to a level with the negro. It will not be, it can not be a long time before the cry, "Abolition of free negroism," will be raised in Maryland and Delaware, unless the people are deprived of all right of self-government. If allowed to go on, free negroism will yet produce a social convulsion in those States and elsewhere, to which even civil war, with all its horrors, will be but a faint parallel. Robespierre and Brissot, in 1791, tried the "impartial freedom" of Sumner and Greeley, in St. Domingo, and Alison has vividly painted the result. Speaking of the Haytien tragedy, he says: "That negroes marched with spiked infants on their spears, instead of colors; then sawed asunder the male prisoners, and violated the females on the dead bodies of their husbands." The mind of white persons can scarcely conceive of such infernal atrocities, and yet they are common to negroes, when perverted into what is called freedom.

From all that has been presented, then, it is easy to see that the present condition of the freed negroes of the North is of the most degraded character, and after fifty years of freedom, they are worse instead of better off. They are engaged in no productive employments; they furnish a large proportion of our criminals; they fill our alms-houses; and hence are a constant tax upon white labor. If their number according to the population were as great as it was when Massachusetts and Pennsylvania were complaining of the burden they cast upon them, our people would not stand the incubus it would be upon their labor and industry. The free negroes of the North do not now, owing to the immigration and the immense white population, form an appreciable element of society. If they did, our people would demand a remedy, even to a return of these negroes to the care and protection of persons who would guarantee that they should not become public burdens. Society scarcely appreciates the burden of one negro living upon the industry of 100 whites, as in Massachusetts, but when free negroes become as numerous as in Maryland, where there is one to every five whites, they become an intolerable weight, and must irretrievably drag down any State that submits to it. The crimes and indolence of these people are not, however, so much to be charged to their account as to the whites, who, with sufficient intelligence to know and comprehend this race, and their duties toward it, shut their eyes from mere party spirit, to absolute facts, and keep on neglecting and persecuting it under the name of philanthropy. The effort to make the negro live out the life or manifest the capabilities of the white man, is like trying to force the woman to live the life of a man, or a child to exhibit the capabilities of the adult, or an ox to perform the duties of a horse! Each one of God's creatures has his specific organization and his specific life, and it is just as reasonable to expect a white man to be an angel as it is to expect a negro to be a white man; that is, to act as a white man, to think as a white man, or to work as a white man. Hence it is, as we have shown, that crime, disease, and death mark the career of Free Negroism. It destroys the negro, drags down white men, burdens them with taxes, and must inevitably end, where the number of the two races approximate, in social convulsions and a horrible and revolting war of races.

PART II.

FREE NEGROISM ELSEWHERE.

Having taken a brief glance at free negroism among ourselves, we will now take a general survey of it elsewhere. Freeing the negro in temperate latitudes, where the number was limited, was a matter of no moment in its effect upon the interest of commerce or civilization. White labor, better adapted to those regions, rushed in to supply its place, and if no emancipation had occurred, the result would have been even more healthy, for the negro labor, rendered unprofitable, would have been sent southward, where it would have been productively employed in raising articles to be exchanged for the skilled labor of more northern latitudes. In order, therefore, to see the really disastrous effects of free negroism, we must turn our attention to that vast tropical territory which has been cursed with this miserable delusion. Many people, perhaps, have no idea of the vast territory, which now lies an uncultivated waste, solely from the effects of removing the negro from the control of the superior race. The entire continent of North and South-America, from the Rio Grande on the North to Brazil on the South, is to-day, little more than a desert waste. But this is not all. Those beautiful and fertile islands —the West-Indies—with the exception of Cuba and Porto Rico, are in the same condition. Let us see how much land is thus lying unproductive and neglected.

The number of square miles in the territory to which we have alluded, is as follows:

	Square miles.
Mexico,	829,916
Central America,	155,770
Venezuela,	426,712
New-Granada,	521,948
Ecuador,	287,638
British Guiana,	96,000
Dutch Guiana,	59,765
French Guiana,	22,500
West-India Islands,	150,000
Total,	2,550,249

The United States and Territories comprise an area of 2,946,166 square miles, so that here is an extent of territory nearly equal to the entire length and breadth of our country, which, with here and there an exception, lies an unproductive waste. If the curse of God had rested upon it, and, like the Cities of the Plain, it had been covered with a bituminous lake, its condition would not be materially different. But, instead of that, the Creator made it originally the most glorious land the sun ever shone upon. Perpetual summer reigns, and the fertility of the soil is as exhaustless as the sea. The variety and extent of its productions are almost unbounded, but, as God said before he made Adam, "Lo! there is no one to till the ground." The negro freed, basks in idleness, and only performs just sufficient labor to keep life in his body. The earth, however, is so rich in spontaneous productions, that the labor which necessity requires, is comparatively none; and hence the negro indulges his constitutional complaint of laziness to its full extent. It would require more space than we have at our disposal to give a review of the decrepitude and decay of the vast extent of territory from the Rio Grande to the Amazon. But a brief extract from Prof. Holton's work on New-Granada,* will give an indication of it. Speaking of the Valley of the Cauca, in that country, he says:

"What more could nature do for this people, or what has she withholden from them? What production of any zone would be unattainable by patient industry, if they knew of such a virtue? But their valley seems to be enriched with the greatest fertility and the finest climate in the world, only to show the miraculous power of idleness and unthrift to keep land poor. Here the family have sometimes omitted their dinner, just because there was nothing to eat in the house! Maize, cocoa, and rice, when out of season, can hardly be had for love or money; so this valley, a very Eden by nature, is filled with hunger and poverty."

Now there are over 2,000,000 of square miles essentially in the same position—the inhabitants, degraded in morals, lazy in habits, and worthless in every respect. The improvements under the Spaniards are gone to decay and ruin, while the mongrel population do nothing except insult the name of "God and Liberty" by indulging in pronunciamentos and revolutions!

* New-Granada: Twenty Months in the Andes. By Isaac F. Holton, M.A. Harper & Brothers.

THE WEST-INDIA ISLANDS.

From these Islands, where emancipation was inaugurated as an example for us to follow, we propose to draw our principal illustrations of the failure of free negroism. This is the more important, because the abolitionists still endeavor to cling to the delusion that it has been a success. The West-India Islands comprise, it is estimated, in all about 150,000 square miles, or an extent of territory as large as the States of Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi. Some of the smaller islands are uninhabited, but those inhabited, and more or less under cultivation, have an area, as stated in Colton's Atlas, of 96,000 square miles. Cuba takes off 42,000 square miles, leaving 54,000 in Hayti and the British and French Islands. When emancipation took place in Jamaica, in 1834, it was loudly heralded that free labor in the West-Indies would soon render "slavery" entirely unprofitable in the United States. Mr. Birney encouraged his followers with this hope, and William Lloyd Garrison even made the confident prediction that the "American slave system must inevitably perish from starvation." George Thompson, the English Abolitionist, who came over to this country about that time to fan the flame of anti-Southern agitation, declared that "soon all slave labor cotton would be repudiated by the English manufacturers." The labor of free negroes was to accomplish all this, for it was presumed that freedom would give an impetus to production, and that the enterprise and industry of the freed black men would soon far outstrip the resources of those countries where "the unprofitable and expensive system of slave labor" was still adhered to. The millennium was thus, in 1833, but just a step ahead of the Abolitionists. They had almost clutched the El Dorado of negro perfection. But alas! for their confident anticipations and positive predictions. In six years the answer came, and it was as follows: In 1800 the West-Indies exported 17,000,000 lbs. of cotton and the United States 17,789,803 lbs. They were thus at this time about equally productive. In 1840 the West-Indies exported only 866,157 lbs. of cotton, while the United States exported 743,941,061 lbs.! Instead, therefore, of the "American system dying of starvation," as Garrison predicted, or of the British spinners refusing to use "slave" grown cotton, England went right on manufacturing "slave" grown cotton, while her "philanthropists," to keep up the delusion, began to talk about raising cotton in Africa, by free-negro labor there, and they have kept on talking about it, and all the while using the productions of "slave" labor. But, in order to give the reader a fuller and more complete view of the terrible blow the industrial resources of the world have received by emancipation in the West-India Islands, we propose to take up a few of the more important Islands, and notice their decline with some minuteness. As it was the first to try "impartial freedom," we commence with

HAYTI.

This island is divided into two parts — the western portion being Hayti proper, and the eastern forming the Dominican Republic. It is next in size to Cuba, and is regarded as the most fertile of the Antilles. The entire island is 406 miles in length by a maximum width of 163. The number of square miles is 27,690, of which 10,091 are comprised in the Haytien or negro Republic, and the balance in the Dominican. It is very difficult to arrive at the exact population of Hayti, as no definite statistics exist, but it is variously estimated at from 550,000 to 650,000. The climate, natural productions and fertility of its soil are not surpassed by any other portion of the known world. Gold, silver, platina, mercury, copper, iron, tin, sulphur, rock-salt, jasper, marble, etc., etc., are found among its mineral productions. The gold-mines have long since been abandoned, as has every employment requiring laborious industry. The climate is warm, but on account of the sea-breezes, generally agreeable and pleasant, even during the summer heats. Vegetation is of the richest and most luxuriant kind.

"It is extremely difficult," says a traveler, "to convey to one unacquainted with the richness and variety of the island scenery of the tropics, a correct impression of its gorgeous beauty. Islands rising from a crystal sea, clothed with a vegetation of surpassing luxuriance and splendor, and of every variety, from the tall and graceful palm, the stately and spreading mahogany, to the bright flowers that seem to have stolen their tints from the glowing sun above them. Birds, with colors as varied and gorgeous as the hues of the rainbow, flit amid the dark green foliage of the forests, and flamingoes, with their scarlet plumage, flash along the shore. Fish of the same varied hues glide through waters so clear that for fathoms below the surface they can be distinctly seen. Turn the eye where it will, on sea or land, some bright color flashes before it. Nature is here a queen indeed, and dressed for a gala day.

"In the island of St. Domingo, the rich beauty of the tropics is combined with some of the finest mountain scenery in the world. The broad, fertile lagoons, covered with groves of orange, citron, and coffee, with here and there a delicate column of smoke indicating the locality of some invisible dwelling; groves of mangroves, rising apparently from the midst of the waters, but indicating the presence of dangerous shallows, gradually become visible. No rough promontory, as upon our northern shores, meets the eye; every angle is delicately rounded, every feature of the scenery undulating and graceful."

any, fustic, satin-wood, lignum vitæ, and other cabinet woods. All the usual tropical productions grow spontaneously in great abundance, including plantains, bananas, yams, maize, millet, oranges, pine-apples, melons, grapes, etc. The staples of cultivation are coffee, cocoa, sugar, indigo, cotton, and tobacco. Surely, such a country as this has been peculiarly blessed by the Creator, and it seems nothing less than a crime against nature to allow its exhaustless resources to remain undeveloped. But what is its history?

In 1790 Hayti was in a high state of prosperity. At that time it supplied half of Europe with sugar. It was a French colony, and contained a population which numbered about 500,000, of which 38,360 were whites, and 28,370 free negroes, mostly mulattoes. The remainder were negro "slaves." The period of which we speak was the era of the great French Revolution, when doctrines of "liberty, equality, and fraternity" had full sway in France. The colonists or white people of Hayti entered with great fervor into the support of these doctrines, but they intended them to apply to white men, and white men only. But this did not suit the pleasure of the "Mountain Department" of the French Assembly. That demanded "impartial freedom," and "impartial freedom" it was. In 1793 the freedom of the blacks in Hayti was decreed, and the grand experiment of "impartial freedom" commenced. The result of that experiment is now, after seventy years' trial, before the world. If the negro has any capacity for self-government, any of the inherent, natural abilities or energies of the white man, surely he ought to have shown them during this time. With a country whose natural resources and fertility are beyond question, and with a climate exactly suited to the physical peculiarities of the race, surely there should have been no such word as fail. The island had been brought to a high state of cultivation, and to an exalted commercial prosperity by the French planters. It was turned over to its new masters like a garden ready cultivated, and all they had to do was to keep it as it was, and go on in the career of prosperity which had been so successfully inaugurated. But what are the facts? A few statistics will show, more vividly than words, how fearfully the island has retrograded and how fallacious are all the hopes which have been indulged in, as to the industry of negroes, when left to themselves. In 1790 the value of the exports of Hayti were $27,828,000, the principal productions being as follows:

Sugar, lbs.,	163,405,220
Coffee, "	68,151,180
Cotton, "	6,286,126
Indigo, "	930,016

In 1826, about thirty years after emancipation, the figures stood thus:

Sugar, lbs.,	32,864
Coffee, "	32,189,784
Indigo, "	none.

Now there is no sugar at all exported, while coffee and logwood have become the principal items of export. The former is gathered wild from the mountains, or from the old abandoned French plantations, while all that is required in order to get the latter is to cut down the tree, which grows spontaneously, and take it to market. It is, therefore, seen that all cultivation is abandoned, and only those articles are now exported which require no labor to produce them. In 1849, the latest date of which we have any reliable statistics, and sixty years after emancipation, the exports of the articles we have named were as follows:

Sugar, lbs.,	none.
Coffee, "	30,608,343
Indigo, "	none.

It is impossible to state, with accuracy, what the present value of the exports of Hayti amount to. Mr. Sumner, in a recent speech in the Senate, placed them at $2,673,000. This, we apprehend, is just about double the real value. A recent traveler, Mr Underhill, says he could find no statistics in Hayti as to her commerce, and Mr. Sumner's figures are, doubtless, mere guess-work. But grant what Mr.

Sumner says, and what a doleful picture of commercial ruin it presents! In 1790, the exports of Hayti amounted to $27,828,000, and now, according even to abolition testimony, they foot up only $2,683,000! Comment is unnecessary.

The statistics we have quoted are taken from the U. S. Commercial Relations," Vol. I. pp. 561–2, officially reported to Congress, and published by order of that body. But all these figures are fully corroborated by every candid and impartial traveler. A foreign resident at the capital of Hayti, under a recent date, writes:

"This country has made, since its emancipation, no progress whatever. The population partially live upon the produce of the grown wild coffee plantations, remnants of the French dominion. Properly speaking, plantations after the model of the English in Jamaica or the Spanish in Cuba, do not exist here. Hayti is the most beautiful and the most fertile of the Antilles. It has more mountains than Cuba, and more space than Jamaica. Nowhere the coffee-tree could better thrive than here, as it especially likes a mountainous soil. But the indolence of the negro has brought the once splendid plantations to decay. They now gather coffee only from the grown wild trees. The cultivation of the sugar-cane has entirely disappeared, and the island that once supplied the one half of Europe with sugar now supplies its own wants from Jamaica and the United States."

In order to show the present condition of Hayti more fully, we quote from a work just published in London, entitled The West-Indies — their Moral and Social Condition. The author, Mr. E. B. Underhill, was sent out by the Baptist Missionary Society of London, and is an abolitionist of the deepest dye. While finding all the excuses he can for the decay of the island, he is forced to own the truth. He describes his journey to Port au Prince as follows:

"We passed by many or through many abandoned plantations, the buildings in ruin, the sugar-mills decayed, and the iron pans strewing the roadside, cracked and broken. But for the law that forbids, on pain of confiscation, the export of all metals, they would long ago have been sold to foreign merchants.

"Only once in this long ride did we come upon a mill in use; it was grinding canes, in order to manufacture the syrup from which tafia is made, a kind of inferior rum, the intoxicating drink of the country. The mill was worked by a large over-shot or water-wheel the water being brought by an aque duct from a very considerable distance. With the exception of a few banana-gardens, or small patches of maize round the cottages, nowhere did this magnificent and fertile plain show signs of cultivation.

"In the time of the French occupation before the Revolution of 1793, thousands of hogsheads of sugar were produced; now, not one. All is decay and desolation. The pastures are deserted, and the prickly pear covers the land once laughing with the bright hues of the sugar-cane.

"The hydraulic works, erected at vast expense for irrigation, have crumbled to dust. The plow is an unknown implement of culture, although so eminently adapted to the great plains and deep soil of Hayti.

"A country so capable of producing for export, and therefore for the enrichment of its people—besides sugar, and coffee, cotton, tobacco, the cacao bean, spices, every tropical fruit, and many of the fruits of Europe—lies uncultivated, unoccupied, and desolate. Its rich mines are neither explored nor worked; and its beautiful woods rot in the soil where they grow. A little logwood is exported, but ebony, mahogany, and the finest building timber rarely fall before the woodman's ax, and then only for local use. The present inhabitants despise all servile labor, and are, for the most part, content with the spontaneous productions of the soil and forest."

The degraded, barbarous condition of the negroes of Hayti is well illustrated in a description given by Mr. Underhill, of what is known as "the religion of Vaudoux, or serpent-worship." It is a native African superstition, and proves, beyond all question, the rapid return of the Hayti negroes to the original savagism of their African ancestors. Mr. U. gives a full description of the ceremonies of this heathenish rite, as described to him by one of the resident missionaries, which we regret we have not space to give entire. The performances are preceded by the following barbaric chorus!

"Eh! eh! Bomba, hen! hen!
Canga bafia te Canga mourne de le Canga de ki li Canga li."

The object worshiped is a small green snake, and the custom is a purely African heathenism. The negro always has a predisposition to it, but it is repressed when he is under white control. Of late years it has been revived extensively in Hayti.

"The Vaudoux," says Mr. Underhill, "meet in a retired spot, designated at a previous meeting. On entering they take off their shoes, and bind about their bodies handkerchiefs, in which a red color predominates. The king is known by the scarlet band around his head, worn like a crown, and a scarf of the same color distinguishes the queen. The object of adoration, the serpent, is placed on a stand. It is then worshiped; after which the box is placed on the ground, the queen mounts upon it, is seized with violent tremblings, and gives utterance to oracles in response to the prayers of the worshipers. A dance closes the ceremony. The king puts his hand on the serpent's box; a tremor seizes him, which is communicated to the circle. A delirious whirl or dance ensues, hightened by the free use of tafia. The weakest fall, as if dead, upon the spot. The bacchanalian revelers, always dancing and turning about, are borne away into a place near at hand, where sometimes, under the triple excitement of promiscuous intercourse, drunkenness and darkness, scenes are enacted, enough to make the impassible gods of Africa itself gnash their teeth with horror."

What a disgusting picture of savagism and heathenism does not the present! And yet, there are people who try to palm off upon the world the idea that negroes can remain civilized when left to themselves. This same missionary, Mr. Webley, writing to the London Missionary Herald, in 1850, says: "These Vaudoux almost deluge the Haytien part of the Island. They practice witchcraft and mysticism to an almost indefinite extent. They are singular adepts at poisoning. A person rarely escapes them when he has been fixed upon as a victim." It is thus seen that Obeism is quite as prevalent in Hayti as it is in the interior of Africa. What more need be said to prove the relapse of these negroes into their original barbarism? Such, then, is the condition of Hayti. Production gone, commerce gone, and the negroes themselves returning to their original African heathenism!

JAMAICA.

Jamaica is about 150 miles long by about 50 in width. Its area is about 6400 square miles, or 4,000,000 of acres. It is the largest and most valuable of the British West-India Islands. The last census taken was in 1844, when the population stood as follows: Whites, 15,779; negroes, 293,128; mulattoes, 68,529. By the census of 1861, the only one taken since, the population is stated as follows: whites, 13,816; mulattoes, 81,065; negroes, 346,374. The whole number of persons who can read is set down at 80,724, and 50,726 as able to read and write. It will be seen from this that over 300,000 can neither read nor write. The education is evidently confined to the whites and mulattoes, leaving the negroes in their natural ignorance, where they have neither oral nor any other instruction. Of course "educated" negroes are simply monstrosities, but as some people seem to suppose that "freedom" will develop such "white crows," we have cited these statistics to show that Ja maica has not yet produced them, after a twenty-five years' trial. The white population, it will also be seen, is gradually decreasing — dying out — through the blood of the negro.

The productions of Jamaica are similar to those of the other West-India Islands. The soil is deep and fertile, and one of the best in the world for the production of sugar, coffee, pimento, and ginger. It is also rich in minerals, cabinet-woods, etc., and the low grounds yield abundantly the plantain, banana, yam, sweet potatoes, pine-apples, oranges, pomegranates, etc., etc. Jamaica has been in possession of England ever since the days of Oliver Cromwell, and at the time of the prohibition of the importation of negroes from Africa in 1807, was in a most flourishing condition. Her history, since then, has been one of gradual but sure decay. The restriction upon her supply of labor produced some decrease in her productions, and the abolition of "slavery" in 1833 hastened the final destruction of the island. The negroes freed in 1833 were to serve five years as apprentices, and on the first of August, 1838, to have their unconditional liberty. For this injury to the negro, and crime toward the white man, the planters were allowed about $30,000,000, the whole sum expended in all the islands, by the British government, being about $100,000,000. And what is the result? Facts speak louder than words, and to them we appeal. The value of the exports of Jamaica, (we quote from the Cyclopædia of Commerce, published by Harper and Brothers, of this city,) before and after the emancipation, will illustrate what we say:

BEFORE EMANCIPATION.

Years.	Value of Exports.
1810	2,303,579

AFTER EMANCIPATION.

The productions of Jamaica show, forcibly, what the above figures exhibit by values. In 1805, two years before the prohibition of African emigration, the productions of Jamaica were as follows:

PRODUCTS OF JAMAICA IN 1805.

Sugar,	150,352 hhds.
Rum,	46,837 punch.
Pimento,	1,041,540 lbs.
Coffee,	17,961,923 lbs.

The production of the island, at that time, was at its highest point. The sugar was the largest crop ever produced in Jamaica. The loss of labor was severely felt, especially in the sugar-culture, so that in 1834, the year emancipation was effected, the production stood as follows:

PRODUCTS OF JAMAICA IN 1834.

Sugar,	84,756 hhds.
Rum,	32,111 punch.
Pimento,	3,605,400 lbs.
Coffee,	17,725,781 lbs.

In the very next year, the first one under free negroism, there was a manifest falling off. The sugar production was only 77,970 hhds., nearly 10,000 hhds. less; coffee was only 10,593,018 lbs., a decrease of over 7,000,000 lbs., and this decrease has steadily continued, until in 1856 the production of Jamaica stood as follows:

PRODUCTS OF JAMAICA IN 1856.

Sugar,	25,920 hhds.
Rum,	14,470 punch.
Pimento,	6,848,622 lbs.
Coffee,	3,328,147 lbs.

The only crop that had increased was that of pimento, or allspice, the increase of which, instead of being an evidence of the industry of the negro, is the reverse. The pimento-tree grows wild in Jamaica, and rapidly spreads over land formerly under cultivation. As the plantations were abandoned, they were overrun with this tree, and the negro women and children picked the berries without the trouble of cultivation. The coffee-tree, to a certain extent, is like the pimento, and grows wild in many places. Hence the production of coffee has not fallen off in the same proportion as that of sugar, which can only be produced by careful cultivation. The coffee crop of Jamaica, however, was in 1813, before the overthrow of "slave" labor, 34,045

585 lbs., but the average crop for the past ten years has not been over 5,000,000 lbs., while the sugar crop had fallen in 1853 as low as 20,000 hhds.! These facts and statistics demonstrate the down-hill progress of Jamaica, and show what may be expected wherever the experiment of free negroism is attempted.

The rapidity with which estates have been abandoned in Jamaica, and the decrease in the taxable property of the island, is also astounding. The movable and immovable property of Jamaica was once estimated at £50,000,000, or nearly $250,000,000. In 1850 the assessed valuation had fallen to £11,500,000. In 1851 it was reduced to £9,500,000, and Mr. Westmoreland, in a speech in the Jamaica House of Assembly, stated it was believed, that the falling off would be £2,000,000 more in 1852. From a report made to the House of Assembly of the number and extent of the plantations abandoned during the years 1848, '49, '50, '51 and '52, we gather the following facts:

" " partially abandoned,..	71
Coffee-plantations abandoned,....	96
" " partially abandoned,.	66

The total number of acres thus thrown out of cultivation in five years was 391,187! This is only a sample, for the same process has been going on ever since emancipation. In the five years immediately succeeding emancipation, the abandoned estates stood as follows:

Sugar-estates, 140,.....	168,032 acres.
Coffee-plantations, 465,.	188,400 "

These plantations employed 49,383 laborers, whose industry was, therefore, at once lost to the world, and the articles they had raised were just so much subtracted from consumption. The price of these articles, sugar and coffee, was increased on account of the diminished production, and that increased cost represented the tax which the world paid for the privilege of allowing Sambo to loll in idleness. The Cyclopædia of Commerce says, "that the negro is rapidly receding into a savage state, and that unless there is a large and immediate supply of immigrants, all society will come to a speedy end, and the island become a second Hayti."

Such, then, is the condition of Jamaica, as stated in an impartial work. Let us hear now what the London Times candidly owns up to. It says:

"There is no blinking the truth. Years of bitter experience, years of hope deferred, of self-devotion unrequited, of prayers unanswered, of sufferings derided, of insults unresented, of contumely patiently endured, have convinced us of the truth. It must be spoken out loudly and energetically, despite the wild mockings of 'howling cant.' The freed West-India slave will not till the soil for wages; the free son of the ex-slave is as obstinate as his sire. He will not cultivate lands which he has not bought for his own. Yams, mangoes and plantains—these satisfy his wants; he cares not for yours. Cotton, sugar, coffee and tobacco he cares but little for. And what matters it to him that the Englishman has sunk his thousands and tens of thousands on mills, machinery and plants, which now totter on the languishing estate that for years has only returned him beggary and debt? He eats his yams and sniggers at 'Buckra.' We know not why this should be, but so it is. The negro has been bought with a price—the price of English taxation and English toil. He has been redeemed from bondage by the sweat and travail of some millions of hard-working Englishmen. Twenty millions of pounds sterling—one hundred millions of dollars—have been distilled from the brains and muscles of the free English laborer, of every degree, to fashion the West-India negro into a 'free, independent laborer.' 'Free and independent' enough he has become, God knows, but laborer he is not; and, so far as we can see, never will be. He will sing hymns and quote texts, but honest, steady industry he not only detests but despises."

dence of every candid individual. How different is this picture from that predicted by the Abolitionists! The Rev. Dr. Channing, the Dr. Cheever of that day, made the following prophecy in 1833, as the result of emancipation:

"The planters, in general, would suffer little, if at all, from emancipation. This change would make them richer rather than poorer. One would think, indeed, from the common language on the subject, that the negroes were to be annihilated by being set free; that the whole labor of the South was to be destroyed by a single blow. But the colored man, when freed, will not vanish from the soil. He will stand there with the same muscles as before, only strung anew by liberty; with the same limbs to toil, and with stronger motives to toil than before. He will work from hope, not fear; will work for himself, not for others; and unless all the principles of human nature are reversed under a black skin, he will work better than before. We believe that agriculture will revive, our worn-out soils will be renewed, and the whole country assume a brighter aspect under free labor."

This is the same story the Abolitionists are singing now, not having yet learned that "the principles of human nature are reversed under a black skin"—that is, of white human nature, and it was from a total misconception of the negro that Dr. Channing fell into his grand mistake. Mr. Anthony Trollope, an Englishman, and an anti-slavery man, who has written a book on Jamaica, seems to know rather more of the negro race than Dr. Channing did. The London Times, drawing its facts from Mr. Trollope, says of it:

"A servile race, peculiarly fitted by nature for the hardest physical work in a burning climate. The negro has no desire for property strong enough to induce him to labor with sustained power. He lives from hand to mouth. In order that he may have his dinner and some small finery, he will work a little, but after that he is content to lie in the sun. This in Jamaica he can very easily do, for emancipation and free trade have combined to throw enormous tracts of land out of cultivation, and on these the negro squats, getting all that he wants with very little trouble, and sinking, in the most resolute fashion, to the savage state. Lying under his cotton-tree, he refuses to work after ten o'clock in the morning. 'No, tankee, massa, me tired now; me no want more money.' Or, by the way of variety, he may say: 'No, workee no more; money no nuff; workee no pay.' And so the planter must see his canes foul with weeds, because he can not prevail on Sambo to earn a second shilling by going into the cane-fields. He calls him a lazy nigger, and threatens him with starvation. His answer is: 'No, massa; no starve now; God send plenty yam.' These yams, be it observed, on which Sambo lives, and on the strength of which he declines to work, are grown on the planter's own ground, and probably planted at his own expense.

"There lies the shiny, oily, odorous negro under his mango-tree, eating the luscious fruit in the sun. He sends his black urchin up for a bread-fruit, and, behold, the family table is spread. He pierces a cocoa-nut, and lo! there is his beverage. He lies on the ground, surrounded by oranges, bananas, and pine-apples. Why should he work? Let Sambo himself reply: 'No, massa, me weak in me belly; me no workee to-day: me no like workee just um little moment.'"

This is a graphic description of the negro character, where the climate gives him a chance to show out his real nature. The same author says that "one half of the sugar-estates, and more than one half of the coffee-plantations have gone back into a state of bush."

The idea of working for pay never entered in black nature. As long ago as Mungo Park traveled in Africa, he discovered that "paid servants, persons of free condition, voluntarily working for pay, are unknown here." No traveler in Africa, down to Dr.

Livingstone, has reversed that judgment.

In Lewis's West-Indies, written 17 years before emancipation, it is remarked: "As to free blacks, they are unfortunately lazy and improvident; most of them half-starved, and only anxious to live from hand to mouth. Even those who profess to be tailors, carpenters, or coopers are, for the most part, careless, drunken and dissipated, and never take pains sufficient to attain to any dexterity in their trades! As for a free negro hiring himself out for plantation labor, no instance of such a thing was ever known in Jamaica." Earl Grey said, in the House of Lords, on June 10th, 1852, "that it was established by statistical facts that the negroes were idle, and falling back in civilization; that, relieved from the coërcion to which they were formerly subjected, and a couple of days' labor giving them enough food for a fortnight, the climate rendering clothing and fuel not necessary to life, they had no earthly motive to give a greater amount of service than for mere subsistence." Sir H. Light and Gov. Barkley have both shown, also, that the majority of the free negroes of the West-Indies are living in idleness, and the French colonies, according to a work from M. Vacherot, published a few years ago at Paris, demonstrate the same ruinous result under their emancipation act.

Captain Hamilton, on his examination as a witness, before a select committee of Parliament, stated that "Jamaica, without any exaggeration, had become a desert."

In 1850 Mr. John Bigelow, then one of the editors of the New-York Evening Post, paid a visit to Jamaica, and wrote a book thereon. As the testimony of an anti-slavery man his statements are given. Mr. Bigelow says that the land of that island is as prolific as any in the world. It can be bought for $5 to $10 per acre, and five acres confer the right of voting and eligibility to public offices. Planters offer $1.50 per day for labor; 16 days' labor will enable a negro to buy land enough to make him a voter and the market of Kingston offers a great demand for vegetables at all times. These facts, said Mr. Bigelow, place independence within the reach of every black. But what are the results? There has been no increase in voters in 20 years. Lands run wild. Kingston gets its vegetables from the United States.

But we will accumulate proof—pile it up, if needed. Mr. Robert Baird, who is an enthusiastic advocate of "the glorious Act of British Emancipation," on visiting the West-Indies for his health, could not fail to be struck with the desolate appearance there.

"That the West-Indians," says Mr. Baird, "are always grumbling, is an observation often heard, and, no doubt, it is very true that they are so. But let any one who thinks that the extent and clamor of the complaint exceeds the magnitude of the distress which has called it forth, go to the West-Indies and judge for himself. Let him see with his own eyes THE NEGLECTED AND ABANDONED ESTATES—THE UNCULTIVATED FIELDS, FAST HURRYING BACK INTO A STATE OF NATURE, WITH ALL THE SPEED OF TROPICAL LUXURIANCE—THE DISMANTLED AND SILENT MACHINERY, THE CRUMBLING WALLS, AND DESERTED MANSIONS, WHICH ARE FAMILIAR SIGHTS IN MOST OF THE BRITISH WEST-INDIAN COLONIES. Let him then transport himself to the Spanish Islands of Porto Rico and Cuba, and witness the life and activity which in these slave colonies prevail. Let him observe for himself the activity of the slaves—the improvements daily making in the cultivation of the fields, and in the processes carried on at the Ingenois or sugar-mills—and the general, indescribable air of thriving and prosperity which surround the whole—and then let him come back to England and say, if he honestly can, that the British West-Indian planters and proprietors are grumblers, who complain without adequate cause."

Ex-Governor Wood, of Ohio, who paid a visit to Jamaica in 1853, and who is no friend to "slavery," says:

"Since the blacks have been liberated, they have become indolent, insolent, degraded and dishonest. They are a rude, beastly set of vagabonds, lying naked about the streets, as filthy as the Hottentots, and I believe worse. On getting to the wharf of Kingston, the first thing the blacks of both sexes, perfectly naked, come swarming about the boat, and would dive for small pieces of coin that were thrown by the passengers. On entering the city the stranger is annoyed to death by black beggars at every step, and you must often show him your pistol or an uplifted cane to rid yourself of their importunities."

Sewell, in his work on the Ordeal of Free Labor, in which he defends emancipation, and pleads for still more extended privileges to the blacks, says of Kingston:

"There is not a house in decent repair; not a wharf in good order; no pavement, no sidewalk, no drainages, and scanty water; no light. There is nothing like work done. Wreck and ruin, destitution and neglect. The inhabitants, taken en masse, are steeped to the eyelids in immorality. The population shows unnatural decrease. Illegitimacy exceeds legitimacy. Nothing is replaced that time destroys. If a brick tumbles from a house to the street, it remains there. If a spout is loosened by the wind, it hangs by a thread till it falls; if furniture is accidentally broken, the idea of having it mended is not entertained. A God-forsaken place, without life or energy, old, dilapidated, sickly, filthy, cast away from the anchorage of sound morality, of reason and of common-sense. Yet this wretched hulk is the capital of an island the most fertile in the world. It is blessed with a climate the most glorious; it lies rotting in the shadow of mountains that can be cultivated from summit to base with every product of tropic and temperate region. It is the mistress of a harbor wherein a thousand line-of-battle ships can ride safely at anchor."

We might fill a volume with such quotations, showing the steady decline of the Island. But it is well to note the moral condition of the negro. The American Missionary Association is the strongest kind of Abolition testimony in regard to the moral condition of the negroes. The American Missionary, a monthly paper, and organ of the Association, for July, 1855, has the following quotation from the letters of one of the missionaries:

"A man here may be a drunkard, a liar, a Sabbath-breaker, a profane man, a fornicator, an adulterer, and such like—and be known to be such—and go to chapel and hold up his head there, and feel no disgrace from these things, because they are so common as to create a public sentiment in his favor. He may go to the communion-table, and cherish a hope of heaven, and not have his hope disturbed. I might tell of persons, guilty of some, if not all of these things, ministering in holy things."

The Report of the American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, for 1853, p. 170, says of the negroes:

"Their moral condition is very far from being what it ought to be. It is exceedingly dark and distressing. Licentiousness prevails to a most alarming extent among the people. . . . The almost universal prevalence of intemperance is another prolific source of the moral darkness and degradation of the people. The great mass among all classes of the inhabitants, from the governor in his palace to the peasant in his hut — from the bishop in his gown to the beggar in his rags — are all slaves to their cups."

So much for "freedom" elevating the blacks. It is complained that the marriage relation is not always regarded where "slavery" exists, but it would seem, from this statement, that "slavery" had done more for the moral improvement of the negro, in this respect, than he was at all disposed to do for himself.

Mr. Underhill indorses the stories

"of the crowds of bastard children" in the Island, and says it is "too true." "Outside the nonconformist communities," he says, "neglect of marriage is almost universal. One clergyman informed me that of seventeen infants brought to his church for baptism, fifteen, at least, would be of illegitimate origin." In fact, from all the admissions made, it does not appear that there is any more marriage in Jamaica than in Africa. The churches, Mr. Underhill allows, are less attended than formerly, and there is evidently little of the religious training of the whites left among the people. The negro, however, has all the advantages of "impartial freedom," and "the highest offices of the state are open to colored men. They are found," says Mr. U., "in the Assembly, in the executive, on the bench and at the bar. All colors mix freely. This would be the paradise for Seward, Phillips and Greeley. Mr. Underhill estimates the annual loss of wages to the people, from the decay of estates and plantations, can not be less than £300,000, or nearly $1,500,000! Negroes who work at all can not be prevailed upon to do so, generally, more than four days in the week, and rarely five. Mr. U. also states that it has been officially ascertained that two thirds of the persons employed on sugar-estates are women and children. Yet, notwithstanding all these facts, the anti-slaveryite still adheres to his favorite hobby. He has excuses and palliatives for his friend, the negro. True, Jamaica is ruined, but still emancipation is a success. The seasons are poor, the estates were mortgaged, the planters have not treated the blacks kindly, and they have bought patches of ground of their own rather than labor for others. Such are some of the excuses of the friends of Sambo. But the facts still stand out in bold relief, despite the assertion of "negro missionaries," who are interested in keeping up the delusion. The facts they do admit. They can not deny or controvert them. This is all we ask —we need none of their excuses. In order to relieve themselves of the odium of having ruined the fairest Island of the Antilles, they will naturally look for reasons not chargeable to them. But figures do not lie. The exports of Jamaica have been gradually decreasing ever since "slavery" in the Island was interfered with, until they have dwindled down to insignificance, and, as the London Times says, "there is no blinking the truth —the negroes will not work for wages," and hence the tropics are going back to jungle and bush, while white men are taxed double the price they ought to be for all tropical products.

THE OTHER ISLANDS.

The careful survey we have taken of the condition of Jamaica, derived both from official statistics and the evidences of anti-slavery men, render it almost unnecessary to notice the remaining islands, where emancipation has been carried out. The story of Jamaica is the story of all. We will, however, briefly notice the condition of Trinidad and Barbadoes, for these islands are often held up by the discomfited Abolitionists as an evidence of the success of emancipation. Again we will take their own evidence to vanquish them. Trinidad contains 2020 square miles. Her soil is as fertile as any of the islands, and if production has somewhat increased within the past few years, it is owing entirely to the Coolie slave-trade.

As illustrating the terrible ordeal through which Trinidad has passed, we quote from Mr. Underhill. He says:

"Three years after emancipation, in 1841, the condition of the island was most deplorable; the laborers had, for the most part, abandoned the estates, and taken possession of plots of vacant land, especially in the vicinity of the towns, without purchase or lawful right. Vagrancy had become an alarming habit of great numbers; every attempt to take a census of the population was baffled by the frequent migrations which took place. Criminals easily evaded justice by absconding to places where they were unknown, or by hiding themselves in the dense forests, which in all parts edged so closely on the cleared lands. Drunkenness increased to an enormous degree, assisted by planters who freely supplied rum to the laborers, to induce them to remain as cultivators on their estates. High wages were obtained, only to be squandered in amusement, revelry, and dissipation; at the same time, these high wages induced a diminished cultivation of food, and a corresponding increase in price, and in the import of provisions from the neighboring islands and continent. The laborers steadily refused to enter into any contracts which should oblige them to remain in the service of a master; this would too much have resembled the state of slavery from which they had but just emerged. It was with reference to this state of things that Lord Harris wrote in 1848: 'Liberty has been given to a heterogeneous mass of individuals, who can only comprehend license; a partition in the rights and privileges and duties of civilized society has been granted to them; they are only capable of enjoying its vices.'"

With the help of Vagrant Acts and other legislative enactments, somewhat like order was established; and the introduction of Coolie labor has enabled Trinidad to recover from the state of poverty into which it has been plunged. The island, however, has been compelled to burden itself with a debt of $725,000 on account of the expenses of the Coolie slave-trade, which is disguised under the name of apprenticeship.

According to Lord Harris, one fourth of the entire negro population of Trinidad, in 1850, were living in idleness. Estates were wholly abandoned, and poverty stalked abroad. The Coolie labor arrested this downward tendency. Between 1847 and 1856, 47,739 Coolies were introduced into the West-India possessions of Great Britain, the greater portion going to Trinidad and Guiana. These 47,739 protests against the idleness of the negro have about doubled the production of sugar in Trinidad—raising it from 20,000 to 40,000 hogsheads. But no thanks to the negro for this. It is none of his doings. Mr. Underhill declares that NOT ONE FOURTH of the persons employed on the estates are negroes. Hence this increase in the sugar production of Trinidad is no evidence of the benefit of emancipation, but just the reverse.

The case of Barbadoes is still more emphatic, though the Abolitionists are never tired of referring to that island as the proof positive of the success of "free negro labor." Now, what is Barbadoes? Well, it is a small island, about large enough for a good-sized water-melon patch. It is about 21 miles long by 14 wide, and contains 100,000 acres of land, all told. It has 150,000 inhabitants, and is more thickly settled than China. There is not an acre of wild or unimproved land; not room, as Trollope says, "for a picnic." This land is monopolized by the whites; and, under a rigid system of vagrant laws, the black is compelled to work. If an idle negro is seen, he is set to work, at wages, or else compelled to DRAG A BALL AND CHAIN on the highways. Mr. Trollope says: "When emancipation came, there was no squatting ground for the poor Barbadian. He had still to work and make sugar—work quite as hard as he had done while yet a slave. He had to do that or to starve. Consequently, labor has been abundant in this island only." Now, how this "capsizes" all the stuff the anti-slaveryites tell us about Barbadoes! Not long since there appeared in the Independent, of this city, an article glorifying emancipation as it had affected Barbadoes. Gov. Hinks, of that island, published a letter in proof of it, and in it occurs this remarkable admission:

"In Barbadoes, I have explained already that wages have ranged from 10*d.* to 1*s.* per task, and that rate prevails generally. In addition to these wages, a small allotment of land is usually given, but on a most uncertain tenure. The laborer may be EJECTED AT ANY TIME ON A FEW DAYS' NOTICE, and he is subjected to PENALTIES FOR NOT WORKING ON THE ESTATE."

There is the alternative to the negro,

"work or starve." Does any one suppose that the negroes of Barbadoes would work any better than the negroes of Jamaica, if there were plenty of unoccupied land in that island, as there is in Jamaica, on which they could squat? If the negroes of Barbadoes are as enterprising as the Abolitionists would have us believe, why do they not emigrate to Jamaica, where labor is in such demand, much higher than in Barbadoes, and where land is plenty? The truth is easily told. The negro never emigrates voluntarily any where. He works when compelled to, and riots in idleness wherever he has a chance to show out his nature. It is doubtful, however, whether the production of sugar in Barbadoes is any larger now than it was nearly 200 years ago. It was one of the first islands in which the Spaniards cultivated sugar, and in 1676 the sugar-trade of Barbadoes required 400 vessels, of 150 tons each.* The production of sugar in 1852 was 48,000 hogsheads. In 1836, the tonnage of its shipping was 62,000, about the same as in 1676. It is, therefore, quite evident that there has not been a material change in Barbadoes for many years. The negroes have simply exchanged masters, and are probably now in a worse condition than under the old system.

We have thus traced, with some minuteness, the present condition of four of the principal West-India Islands. Hayti, where the negro has been left mainly to himself, we have seen, has gone back to its original, uncultivated wilderness, and the inhabitants are sunk into the SAVAGISM OF THEIR AFRICAN ANCESTORS. They are rapidly losing even all conceptions of civilization, and, as soon as the mulattoes die out, the process will be complete. Abolitionism will have reared an African heathenism on this continent as the culmination of their bastard philanthropy. Civilization, and all the wants of civilization, are utterly ignored by the negroes of Hayti. The cotton, sugar, coffee, indigo, etc., which they ought to supply to the world, are left uncultivated.

Jamaica, the principal British West India island, though the white population there has struggled against it, presents essentially the same features. Every where are desolation and ruin. These beautiful and fertile islands, perfect "gems of the sea," are turned over to savagism, and ruined upon the false and visionary idea that negroes are white men!

To present at a glance the effects of Free Negroism in the West-India Islands, and to sum up the whole subject in a brief space, it is only necessary to examine the following table, showing the deficit in production under "free negro labor:"

If it were necessary to add to the proof we have given, that it is the overthrow of the supremacy of the white race, and that alone, that has produced this deplorable result, it is only required to cite the case of Cuba. Let Mr. Underhill, the British Abolitionist, from whom we have quoted, describe the difference between Cuba, where "slavery" exists, and where it does not. Of Havana he says:

"It is the BUSIEST AND MOST PROSPEROUS OF ALL THE CITIES OF the Antilles. Its harbor is one of the finest n the world, and IS CROWDED WITH HIPPING. Its wharves and warehouses are piled with merchandise, and the general aspect is one of GREAT COMMERCIAL ACTIVITY. Its exports nearly reach the annual value of NINE MILLIONS STERLING, ($45,000,000,) and the customs furnish an annual tribute to the mother country over and above the cost of government and military occupation. EIGHT THOUSAND ships annually resort to the harbor of Cuba."

Evidently Mr. Underhill had got into a new world. He saw it, and was struck with the contrast it presented to the dilapidated region he had just left. In order to show the contrast between the PROGRESS of Cuba, and the DECLINE of Jamaica, it is only necessary to give a few statistics. The value of the exports of Jamaica, in 1809, were greater than those of Cuba in 1826, and a comparison of the two islands gives the following:

Cuba, in 1826,	13,809,388
Jamaica, in 1854,	4,480,661
Cuba, in 1854,	31,683,731

What a picture is this of free negroism! What can the Abolitionist, who prates of free negroes laboring, say to these facts and figures? Cuba has been just as steadily advancing as Jamaica has been retrograding.

The productiveness of Cuba is most astonishing. Her exports are more per head than those of any other country on the face of the globe. Her export and import trade for 1859 was as follows:*

Exports for 1859,	$57,455,185
Imports for 1859,	43,465,185
Showing an excess of exports over imports of	$13,989,506

Now, the population of Cuba is only about one million and a half, all told, black and white. Upon analyzing the above figures, then, it will be seen that the exports of Cuba amount to about $40 per head for each man, woman and child on the island! At the same time it should be noted that this great production is not all exchanged for articles imported, but there is a net income or surplus of exports over imports of $13,989,506.

This net surplus of wealth amounts to $9.32 cents for each man, woman and child in Cuba. No other country in the world can present such a picture of prosperity, and yet Cuba is by no means as productive as she might be. Through a mistaken policy, or supposed kindness to the negro, manumissions are easily procured, and freed negroes are multiplying so rapidly that her welfare will, ere long, be very seriously impaired, unless the evil be checked.

But it will be instructive to take a glance at our own exports and imports, so that we may be able to see how much we are dependent upon negro labor for our prosperity. The exports of the fiscal year ending June 30th, 1860, embracing specie and American produce, amounted to $373,167,461; in addition to which we also reexported about $27,000,000 of foreign produce, the result standing as follows:

Excess of exports over imports	$38,370,252

This gives a net surplus of only $1.26 cents per capita, while in Cuba, an exclusively negro labor country, it is $9.32 per head. Taking our aggregate domestic exports, and making a similar comparison, we find, calling our population in round numbers thirty millions, that our exports per head are $12.43, against $40 per capita in Cuba.

Having shown now that the exports of the United States, North, South and West amount, we will call it, to $12½ per head, it will be interesting to analyze these exports and see where they come from. To whom is the country mainly indebted for this surplus wealth, which enables us to buy and pay for nearly four hundred millions of foreign goods per year? It is very certain that we can have no imports, unless we have something to pay for them. Nor can we have any commerce unless we have something to sell which other nations want. It has been shown that the specie and American produce exported were, as above stated, $373,167,461; of this amount the specie was $56,946,851. The amount of American produce consequently exported was $316,220,610.

We propose to classify the amount furnished exclusively by the free States, the amount furnished by both the free and "slave" States, (which it is impossible to separate and designate the respective amount furnished by each,) and the amount furnished exclusively by the "slave" States.

If any one will analyze the articles embraced in the amount, $96,826,299, belonging alike to the North and the South, he can not fail to come to the conclusion that at least one third is justly the product of negro labor. The result, then, stands as follows:

Exports of Southern States,	$246,898,313
Exports of Northern "	69,322,297
Total,	$316,220,610

Calling the population of the North, in round numbers, twenty millions, and the population of the South ten millions, we have the significant fact that while the exports of the North amount to only $3.45 per head, those of the South amount to $24.65!* It is not intended by this statement to deny that the North has vast industry, but white men, in a temperate or cold latitude, consume nearly all the products of their own labor, and hence it is, that in all ages, every nation which has acquired wealth and power, obtained them from tropical regions where the inferior races, in their normal relation to the superior race, produced them. It is thus self-evident that nearly all the wealth of our country is derived from negro servitude, for wealth is the surplus of production over consumption. The North has but little over — the South a great deal. It is the tropical regions which must be relied upon for this surplus wealth. When Spain held all her tropical possessions on this Continent, it is estimated that her net income from them was not less than $50,000,000 annually, and she was the mistress of the world. When she lost them, her greatness and wealth declined, and she soon sunk to a third or fourth-rate power. Of late years she has been improving, and if she do not commit the folly of overthrowing the natural relation of the races, she will rapidly advance in power, wealth, and prosperity.

There is one other view of this question, which is very important,

* To this statement it may be objected that the North sends a vast quantity of produce and manufactured articles to the South, but it should be remembered that the South also sends a vast quantity of her produce North. Our consumption of cotton is about $55,000,000; of sugar, $25,000,000; besides naval stores, rice, tobacco, etc., which do not enter into our calculation of Southern exports, any more than the Northern articles sent South enter into the exports of the North. Our calculation is based upon the foreign exports, as these only represent the surplus wealth of the country.

and is worthy the careful attention of every person who desires to be well informed upon the causes of the greatness, grandeur and prosperity of his country. It is frequently asserted, by thoughtless people, who have never investigated this subject, that the North has supported the South, paid the expenses of the government, etc. Now, all imports are based upon exports, and hence it is the exports which, in fact, furnish the revenue of a country, and not the imports, for the latter are but the representative of the former, without which they could not exist. Taking the history of our government for forty years, this view of the case presents some most astounding results, which are condensed with much labor in the following table:

It will thus be seen that Southern products have contributed to the support of the government nearly $800,000,000, while Northern products have contributed less than half that sum! Can there be any doubt, therefore, in the mind of any candid and sensible person, that this country owes its unparalleled prosperity to negro labor? We do not mean to say that this difference arises from any inferiority of Northern or superiority of Southern men, but solely from that universal law of nature, that the cultivation of the tropics, carried on by the enforced labor of the inferior races, produces a large surplus over consumption, while white men in temperate latitudes consume nearly all they produce. Destroy this cultivation, and you destroy Northern commerce, labor, mechanics, manufactures, etc., etc., and reduce white men to poverty and privation.

The comparative value of free negro labor and "slave" negro labor is

* Some people, without reflecting, may suppose that this estimate, giving the South one third of the gold production for forty years, is too high; but they should recollect that the estimate is made for forty years, and we have had gold from California for only ten or twelve years. Previous to that time we depended entirely upon the mines of Georgia, North and South Carolina, Virginia, and Maryland for our gold. These mines have been very productive, the Dorn mine in South-Carolina bringing to the U. S. Mint, at Charlotte, $220,000 to $225,000 annually.

also forcibly illustrated in the progress of our own country, when compared with those places where the negro has been deprived of the guidance of the white man. It is often the habit of Abolition writers to compare the value of "free" and "slave" labor, in order to show the vast superiority of the former over the latter. But they are always very careful to have the comparison to occur between WHITE labor and negro labor. They never DARE to make a comparison between negro "FREE" labor and negro "SLAVE" labor. As white men are superior to negroes, their labor ought to be superior to theirs, and in all latitudes where white labor is available, it is more valuable, because more intelligent. There is no sense, therefore, in comparing Ohio with Alabama, simply because there are no grounds for a comparison. The white man could not do the work of the negro in Alabama, nor could the negro do the work of the intelligent farmer in Ohio. The real question is, are the Southern States in a better condition than the free negro countries? This is the correct test as to the success of free negroism. It is only necessary, in order to answer this question, to show the constant and steady increase of the great staple of cotton—a product that has done more for the comfort and happiness of the great toiling masses than any and all other productions of modern times:

What a grand and noble picture does not this present! Yet in 1817, the production of cotton in the West-Indies and the United States was just about the same! and Wm. Lloyd Garrison, Geo. Thompson and Dr. Channing, at the time of the West-India emancipation, predicted that free negro labor would soon drive all "slave" grown cotton out of the market! These architects of ruin, however, shut their eyes to the desolation they have achieved, and now, with the malignity of demons, desire to bring the calamities upon our own hitherto prosperous and happy country, which have marked the progress of the free-negro delusion in other places.

The territory cursed by free negroism in the West-Indies, however, is but a small portion of the space now blighted in the same manner. We have given no statistics of the condition of all that vast territory, comprising the fairest and most beautiful portion of our continent, extending from the Rio Grande almost to the Amazon. When it was under its Spanish conquerors, this territory, almost as large as the whole United States, was largely productive. Its capabilities, however, were never developed to any thing like their full extent, yet such cultivation as was commenced has been almost wholly abandoned. The country may be truly described as a desert, with only here and there an oasis, where a rude kind of cultivation produces just enough to let the world know that it is not an entire waste. Brazil, on the south, is the first spot where commerce and trade exist to any great extent, and there the negro has NOT BEEN FREED. We are thus able to count up, with perfect ease, the only places where tropical production is now carried on on this Continent—Cuba, Porto Rico, our own Gulf States and Brazil! Just four comparatively small green spots amid the wild and uncultivated yet fertile and glorious tropical regions of the western hemisphere!

PART III.

THE EFFECT OF EMANCIPATION UPON TRADE, COMMERCE, AGRICULTURE, AND WHITE LABOR.

No nation or people, from the days of imperial Babylon, has ever been great in wealth or power which did not possess the trade of the tropical regions of a continent. The wealth of the East-Indies made England what she is. With the riches which poured into her coffers, from 1750, after she expelled the Dutch from India, she was enabled to crush Napoleon, and raise herself to that power in the world which was formerly swayed by Rome. The rise and fall of imperial greatness in Asia and Europe has been determined by the possession of the trade of the East-Indies, where the enforced labor of two hundred millions of natives has formed an ever-flowing stream of wealth.

The Creator has intended our own tropical regions to be productive. They were not made "to waste their sweetness on the desert air." How are they to be made productive? That is the practical question of the hour. The negro has been brought here from Africa, where he had been a wild, untutored savage for centuries, just what he must and will be forever, (so far as we are able to judge by all the facts before us,) when he is separated from the white man. This negro has been made available for just the work to be done. The white men of this continent need and MUST HAVE cotton, sugar, coffee, indigo, and spices. Without these, civilization is put back five hundred years. True, we MIGHT again drag along as our ancestors did, the rich only being able to afford good clothing. The poor might manufacture their own by spinning, and carding, and weaving. Sugar, coffee, etc., might be again unknown luxuries. The farmer might have little or no market for his grains; but this would not satisfy us. These articles must be had, and they can not be had without the enforced labor of the negro.

Already white men have been, and are to-day, seriously taxed on account of emancipation of this negro. Take the two items of sugar and coffee alone. If we estimate the decline in the production of sugar and coffee by the reduction that has taken place in Jamaica and other places, it is fair to calculate that, were all the negroes, now lolling in the sun, eating yams and laughing at white men, set to work, we should have at least THREE TIMES the amount of both articles now produced. Such a production would decrease the price at least ONE HALF, thus furnishing the white men of this country with their groceries at fifty per cent less than present prices.

Let us look at this subject a little more closely. The "grocery bill" of the people of the United States is computed* annually at $86,928,000. Our imports of coffee, sugar, tobacco, and molasses, for 1853, amounted in value to $38,479,000, of which the negro "slaves" of Cuba and Brazil supplied $34,451,000. The balance of these four articles that we need, $48,449,000, is the product of our own "slave" States. The "grocery bill" of the people of the United States, therefore, stands indebted as follows:

To all other sources.....	4,028,000

A great many well-meaning people no doubt sincerely believe that it would be good policy to emancipate the negroes engaged in producing this $82,000,000 worth of groceries for the North. If it were done, the result is apparent. All kinds of groceries would rise in price to such an extent that no one but perhaps the wealthy classes could afford to use them. The negro, if freed in the tropical regions, ceases to produce; and all know that the less of an article produced, the higher the price, and of course the greater the tax upon the consumer. Every negro, therefore, lazily squatting in the West-Indies, and, as the London Times says, "sniggering at

Buckra," takes something from the pocket of every consumer of sugar, coffee, and molasses. The cost of tropical productions is now fifty per cent above what it ought to be. Coffee ought to be had for about the tax now upon it, and sugar in proportion. We are paying nearly NINETY MILLIONS of dollars annually for our groceries—FORTY MILLIONS of it at least ought to be saved, and would be, if every negro were fulfilling the Heaven-decreed ordinance of labor.

But the tax of emancipation upon the North is not fully seen in the increased price of coffee, sugar, tobacco, etc. Every negro freed in the tropics becomes at once a non-consumer of Northern products. When at work on the plantation, he eats bacon and bread, and is furnished with plenty of good, coarse clothing, shoes, hats, etc. When freed, as we have shown, he eats yams and plantains mainly, and consumes little or nothing of Northern productions. The farmer and mechanic, therefore, are taxed by his idleness in two ways—First, by an increase in the price of coffee, sugar, etc.; and secondly, by a decrease in the DEMAND for their own productions. It was not until the extension of "slavery" occurred in Alabama, Mississippi and Louisiana, that the Western farmer began to get any thing like remunerative prices for his grain. And it is a singular fact that, the column of black labor on the Gulf, and of white labor above the 36th parallel of latitude, have kept right along pari passu. The one is the handmaid of the other. Carry out emancipation on the Gulf, and you destroy the farmer in Ohio, Illinois, Indiana, and Iowa. It would be of little use to remove the blockade of the Mississippi if the negro is to be freed. Sectional agitators have educated the Northern mind to believe that there is an antagonism between what they call "free and slave labor," that is, between white labor and negro labor. Now, the real truth is that there never was a more perfect harmony in the world than that existing between white labor and negro labor, and when we say negro labor, we mean so-called "slave" labor, for we must disabuse ourselves of the fallacy, that there is any such a thing as productive free negro labor. The negro, as we have shown, on a plantation, becomes a consumer of the agricultural productions of the Northern farmer, and the skilled labor of the Northern mechanic. His labor therefore sets in motion cotton factories and machine-shops. THE MUSCLES OF THE NEGRO AND THE INTELLECT OF THE WHITE MAN THUS BECOME THE GREAT AGENCIES OF MODERN CIVILIZATION. The exchange of the products of the one for the other constitutes OUR COMMERCE, gives employment to shipping, erects our banks, lines our streets with marble palaces, and makes a rocky island like New-York, the seat of untold wealth. Destroy this tropical production, that is, emancipate the negroes, and the commerce that flows from it would be annihilated, and New-York would be in the position of the city of Alexandria when the Portuguese discovered the route for the East-India commerce by the way of the Cape of Good Hope.

But people often say, is not the North great and powerful by herself? We answer, as history attests, that no nation has ever been great in commerce and wealth that did not have the trade of the tropical regions of a continent. What are all the productions of agriculture unless there is a market for them? The matter can be illustrated thus: Suppose all the negroes of Brazil, Cuba, and the Southern States, from which we now derive all our groceries, were set to raising grain, etc., for their own subsistence. Of course there would be no exchange of commodities and no commerce. The world is constituted with different climates and productions for the purposes of exchange and commerce. Each hemisphere has its temperate and tropical regions, and those regions require different labor. To overthrow that form of labor, by which only the tropics can be cultivated, is as criminal as it would be to overthrow the system of labor necessary for the temperate latitudes. The tropics can not be cultivated by "freed" negroes any more than the temperate latitudes could be by putting white men in slavery. Looking to Europe as a market for our agricultural productions is a mistake. Each hemisphere of the world is mainly independent of the other. For centuries they existed without the knowledge of each other. The foreign call for our agricultural productions occurs perhaps in one year out of five, but our real and permanent markets are the tropics of our own continent, and to these our farmers should direct their attention. If every negro in Mexico, Central America, New-Granada, and the West-Indies, were this day industriously at work, we judge each white laborer in the North would have his wages increased nearly one half, while the cost of articles for his family would be decreased in about the same ratio. The Western farmer, now getting only eight or ten cents per bushel for his corn, ought to and would then get twenty-five cents. Each man, therefore, can compute the expense of emancipation as it effects himself personally. The laboring classes, then, instead of living in close, ill-ventilated apartments, where the light of day is scarcely permitted to enter, might afford neat and agreeable cottages. The demoralization of huddling human beings together would be mainly obviated, and the education, intelligence, and morality of the white population vastly increased. While emancipation has conferred no benefit on the negro, yet its most serious results have fallen on white men. It enslaves them, it binds burdens upon them, and if in contact with this free negro, he becomes their legal equal, and among the debased and vicious leads to amalgamation. Philanthropists have dreamed of social reforms, of the elevation of the white laboring classes, and predicted a future wherein want should be comparatively unknown, and labor meet an adequate reward; but they have been looking for it through social reforms, perhaps convulsions. The great want is remunerative labor. Where can it be had? is the universal cry. The farmer wants better prices for his grain, the mechanic for his labor. Why do they not get them? The answer is summed up: Thirty degrees of latitude on our continent are almost a desert waste. The finest countries the sun of heaven ever shone upon are a wilderness simply because no one will "till the ground." Hence there is not sufficient market for the farmer, for the mechanic, for the laborer of the temperate latitude. He has no one who stands ready to consume what he is anxious to produce, and there is no one ready to produce what he stands ready to purchase. Shall we, therefore, go on in this career of folly? Shall we shut our eyes to facts, and in sheer party madness rush on to national suicide? All around us are scattered the ruins of emancipation. Torn and distracted Mexico, desolate and wild Central America, silent and deserted New-Granada, ruined and savage Hayti, dilapidated and broken-down Jamaica, all testify in thunder tones to beware of the breakers of emancipation. On the contrary, Brazil, Cuba, and Porto Rico are the marts of commerce and trade. Wherever the negro occupies the relation of servitude to the white man, all is happiness and prosperity. Where he does not, all is social chaos and blight.

CONCLUSION.

1. The foregoing pages show that these naturally fertile regions have been nearly withdrawn from the commerce of the world. The little that remains springs from a lingering force of former improvements, or from articles requiring little culture to prepare them for a market.

2. It appears that a gradual Africanization is passing over the people, which points back to their fatherland for its permanent type—a type which has been the same ever since the Portuguese attempted to civilize by Christianizing the west coast of Africa, nearly four hundred years ago.

Had these and other fields of emancipation around the Gulf kept their former position in the market of the world, or had they obviously lost that position by misfortune, they would have furnished an argument in favor of further emancipations. Their American friends predicted and hoped for this result. Their English friends (except the planters in Jamaica) cared little about it; for they were still nauseous over our revolution, and cherished a rival interest in Asia, Australia, and the Eastern Islands.

Our reformers are slow to admit the whole truth of these results. They denied for a long time, then tried to excuse the thriftless course of these people, and now, under political pressure, they allege that the separation of master and servant must be effected without regard to consequences of this sort.

The price paid by England to separate the master and servant in Jamaica was the boast of the whole English press, as a vast sacrifice to the cause of African civilization. Not so now. There has been a larger generalization; new elements have come into the argument; the discussian has ranged over the relations of an unlimited population to a limited surface of a food-growing earth; and the London Times has more than intimated that Exeter Hall had led the British Parliament into a social blunder in regard to Jamaica. But the English press is now nearly unanimous in the conclusion that the only good done to the Africans in Jamaica and St. Domingo has been to deliver them from labor, and consequently from appearing in the commerce of the world. And, to turn the sharp edge of this conclusion, some of the English social philosophers ask: "What business is it of the whites, that the blacks in America shall do one thing or another, or nothing?"

If mere exemption from moderate labor is the sum of all the good to the emancipated, in return for the Africanization of the tropical regions of America—and this concession is claimed from the whites in cold climates of the United States—then we must look deeper into the relation of the two races north of the Gulf of Mexico, and our reformers must not be surprised if we ultimately, in behalf of a common humanity, put a stop to the Africanization on the south side of the Gulf.

The two races had wants which could be better supplied in America than in Europe or Africa. The whites foresaw their future; but the blacks could not, because they know no past; and therefore the whites constrained the blacks to come.

The whites took the cold climate, and placed the blacks in the warm, just as they had been at home.

The whites left feudal masters, in a small country, and gained large freeholds in a great country.

The blacks left little and gained much. The blacks gained a full supply of the wants of themselves and their families, with freedom from care about an employer, a sick-day, a sick family, a birth or a funeral. Never before had they fancied such a condition of life.

The blacks left the same cannibal tribes, the same fetishes and witches, and the same wars, which Du Challu found in Africa five years ago, where the chief of the last tribe he reached, in the interior, sent him, as a complimentary breakfast, a little boy to be roasted. America is the Paradise of the blacks. Would they leave it? The Colonization Society asked them, Mr. Lincoln asked them. Did they go? Political emancipation may constrain a few; military necessity may drive more; but the millions will be buried where they were born, in the sunny South. The blacks never have regretted that their race was brought to America.

THE PROBLEM TO BE SOLVED.

But the blacks were placed in America as coöperating partners of the whites. They grow large, and strong, and healthful, and long-lived on the food and clothing produced for them. Their coöperation is the essence of our prosperity: they must not spoil it. We are as essential to each other as boys on the opposite ends of an up-and-down plank. They have the warm end of the plank, and we the cold. The cold constrains us to work hard to provide for a long winter; and nothing but changing work with them makes our winter tolerable, and bring us through.

On an east and west line, in the same climate, coöperative labor may be useful, if the one country is more advanced in its manufactures, or if it is rich in mines, but, even then, the utility requires that she shall have free access to tropical products. If the coal and iron and consequent manufactures of England induce her to take our corn and pork, it is because she gets from Asia and Brazil the price of her goods to pay us; and the time may come when we shall make similar goods for those markets. If England should sink in the ocean, it would not permanently check the prosperity of American civilization. Our coal and iron fields would work us out. But let our tropical lands (which are made small by the Gulf of Mexico) be sunk from our commerce, by Africanization, and we shall go down together. Labor-saving machines can not save us. The steam-engines down-town could not build palaces up-town and colleges at Princeton, by the cheap manufacture of sugar, if like engines did not first produce cheap sugar in the tropics. Machinery only makes the relations of the two races more essential to the North. For the machines open the way for a four-fold population in the North only on condition that the South increases its products for our use. Our great civilization rose on the abundance and cheapness of tropical products. Tropical cotton and wool in New-England enriched the boys and girls who peopled the West, and the West nursed her millions, because of the interchanges above and below Cairo.

HOW THE MODERATE LABOR OF THE BLACKS GIVES SOME LEISURE AND LUXURY TO THE WHITES.

Climate is the chief agent in this operation. The effects of climate on men and things teach laws, on this subject, which must be observed by those who would go with us in the further examination of this matter.

By the mere difference of climate, one cotton or cane field, under the same labor, is worth four corn-fields, and the support of the laborer costs less. The three fourths saved by climate are claimed by capital, commerce, and cold, and accumulate in the North.

But the products are such as we can not dispense with. The loss of them would send us back to the age of the Crusades. What sort of a toilet would a lady make of mere wool and flax? What sort of a table could a matron set forth with Indian corn, insipid pumpkins, sour apples, hard cider, and fox-grapes, without the sweets, spices, and coffee of the South?

The first smile that relaxed the grim face of the Pilgrims was raised by the sight of a West-India trader. And, perhaps, an abundant and cheap supply of tropical products induced a Boston minister to say at thanksgiving, that while he was very proud of his descent from the Puritans, he was equally thankful that the Puritans had not descended to us. The genial power of these products is akin to that of sun-rays. It can melt the iron heart of a disappointed reformer, and almost soften into modesty the temper of an escaped martyr!

Before the use of cotton-machinery, the English ships used to go, once in each year, to the Deccan, carrying food to the poor serfs, who made India shirting for our use, at one dollar a yard. They had made their cloths as usual, had delivered his share to the landlord, and waited for the ships to fetch them food; but the machines had made better cloths in England, at half the price. No ship came; and one hundred thousand of the tenants died of starvation.

To us, the failure of the blacks to coöperate will entail just as sure a diminution of the people, but it will come more gradually, and be less obvious, because the market of the world will be open, to give us temporary relief, until the prices of a diminished supply of cotton, groceries, etc., lift them out of our reach; and we turn from one cheap article to another, until insufficient food, and clothing, and fuel do their work of grinding a large and vigorous population into a small and weak peasantry.

We have shown that had all the blacks, whose labor has been withdrawn by emancipation, continued in the field, they would have been better provided for than they are now, and we might have had sugar at four cents a pound, and cotton and coffee at eight.

But this would not have met the requirement of the "reformers" in England and France. The same spirit has spread over our "reformers." No adjustment, no amendment, no melioration of the tie that binds the blacks to coöperation can be accepted. It is vain to show them, by the sad examples in these pages, that the blacks, being once fairly off the plank, are not likely to return. They talk of the unrequited labor of the blacks. We answer them, by comparing their requital with that of the laboring class in the North. They talk of hardships in the South, and we prove to them that there is more laughing and dancing on one plantation than in a dozen Northern factories. They talk of religious privileges, and we show them that there is as much singing, and praying, and preaching, and as large communions among the blacks as among the whites in the North..

But the blacks are not free. The whole history in these pages shows that, in the vocabulary of the blacks, liberty is a license not to work. And the whole matter comes to this: a necessity is laid on the "reformers!" They have a mission from human nature. A moral necessity is upon them. They are sent to preach the gospel of laziness to the blacks! They have put some of their spirit upon the President. He catches the idea of the mission, that it is the gospel of laziness. Being a military chieftain, he feels a military necessity to cut the cord which binds the blacks to the whites, and then, to rid his country of the laziness, he beseeches the blacks to go away—somewhere: and beseeches us to pay somebody a thousand millions of dollars for the privilege of abstaining from cotton, coffee, and sugar.

The "reformers" have had help. The war brought on by their movement has precipitated the practical results of a success which is not yet quite sure. Practically the link is broken—the blacks are pushed off the plank, and we of the North, who are not in office, are rolling in the dirt. The sugar and the coffee are gone out of the laborer's dinner-pail; his ragged cotton-shirt can not be replaced; the Sunday-clothes of his children are unsightly; (the son who used to work at his side is drafted:) but yield not to despair! Carry these symbols of a poverty not induced by your fault to the assembly of these apostles of laziness, and hold them up to their eyes, and say you did it. And when the day of deliverance comes, march with your comrades to the ballot-box and say to these "reformers," Now, we will do it.

HOW EMANCIPATION WORKS TO-DAY.

As pertinent to this subject, illustrating the effects of the emancipation theory as it is operating under our own eyes, this very year, we append the following from Gen. Banks's department, New-Orleans and its vicinity. Recalling to mind the anti-slavery proclivities and the antecedents of General Banks, and the character of the New-Orleans Picayune, under the dominant influence of those there in power, we may give more than ordinary weight to the testimony here adduced to show the essential character of the negro, and the effects of emancipation upon him and society. In this as in every other attempt to carry out their emancipation ideas, under the influence of their visionary anti-slavery hostility, these theorists are compelled, in spite of themselves, to return to the system of enforced labor which is slavery.

From the New-Orleans Picayune, Feb. 1863.

THE NEGRO QUESTION IN THIS DEPARTMENT.

Gen. Banks has responded to the general desire to know what course he would pursue upon the negro question in this department, through his "General Orders, No. 12," published in our columns yesterday morning. The subject is now fairly before our planters and others for their consideration. It is an exceedingly practical matter, and one of no small importance. The time is now at hand when, if at all, work must commence upon plantations in order to make a crop. What therefore shall be done? Shall there be any crops made? or shall the plantations be allowed to go to ruin? These questions must be promptly answered or they will gradually answer themselves. It is certainly true that "wise men will do what they can when they can not do what they would." It is clearly the part of wisdom to make the most of the condition in which we find ourselves placed, to do the best we can when we can not do what we would. Nobody will counsel idleness on the part of gangs of negroes throughout the entire season. This would subject them to all the evils of hunger and crime, and entail a curse upon the inhabitants which is already onerous, and would become every day more so.

Gen. Banks declares that "under no circumstances whatever can they be maintained in idleness, or allowed to wander through the parishes and cities of the State without employment. Vagrancy and crime will be suppressed by an enforced and constant occupation and employment." The negro idea of freedom generally is to have plenty to eat, and to lie all day in the sun and sleep! Doubtless hundreds left comfortable homes with the expectation of realizing this rather peculiar elysium. When the hordes of runaways learn, as they soon will now, that they can not be maintained in idleness, they will probably be willing to return to their homes, to industry, and to plenty. Some have done this already, after having had a little experience under the altered state of things, and learned what this much talked of mode of living without work really amounts to. Some of them have had glimpses of the elephant, and do not desire a second sight of him. It is probable, under these circumstances, we think, that planters will not find it difficult to effect an arrangement with their servants, by which the accustomed labors upon the plantation may be again resumed. Such an arrangement once made, the Commanding General says, it "shall be enforced on the part of the negroes by the officers of the government," and that this shall include all the conditions of continuous and faithful service, respectful deportment, correct discipline, and perfect subordination," and "under such regulations as will tend to keep families together, and to impart self-supporting habits to the negroes."

Great numbers of these people have already died, and multitudes more will unless they are promptly sent back to work upon the plantations where they can receive the food to which they have been accustomed, and resume again the habits of their lives. It is a great mistake to suppose that the negro can stand any thing and every thing better than the white laboring man. He can stand the heat better, that is, a hot climate is more congenial to his nature; but change his food, and his habits, and he sinks more rapidly than the white man. His body and mind are alike feeble, and both require the paternal care and superior wisdom of the master. To place these now idle hordes back upon the plantations is, therefore, a work of genuine humanity, while it will be a relief to the community and will promote its interests. If we can not do what we would, let us do what we can, and make the most of our circumstances.

Common-sense, duty, and patriotism alike demand it.

Ex-Governor T. H. SEYMOUR, | RICHARD O'GORMAN, Esq.
Governor PARKER, N. J.

Henry Laurens was President of the Continental Congress in 1779. In 1780 he was sent as Minister to Holland. On his way he was captured, and imprisoned in the Tower of London for fourteen months. When Lord Shelburne became Premier. Laurens was brought up, on Habeas Corpus, and released. After his release, he was treated with great kindness and respect by the British authorities. He dined with Lord Shelburne. After dinner, the conversation turned on the separation of the two countries. Lord Shelburne remarked:

THE OVATION AT THE ACADEMY OF MUSIC

TO

AND THE OTHER ORATORS OF THE DAY.

It was in good taste that the Society which called Ex-Governor Seymour to open the campaign at the Cooper, and John Van Buren to open all eyes and lips by reading the letter of General Scott, should welcome Governor Seymour at his coming to set in order the defenses of our City and State. This Society contents itself with spreading political knowledge. Under the liberal patronage of a few princely seniors, The Young Men's Democratic Association has done a good year's service, and is fairly entitled to be placed on record at its first anniversary.

The celebration at the Academy of Music was conceived and arranged by the Nestor of the Society, Philip W. Engs, aided by the generosity of Mr. Loring Andrews, and others; and the details were gracefully executed by the President, the Hon. Luke F. Cozans, and other regular officials of the Society.

The audience was invited by tickets, and the invited came from every State. The house was filled to its entire capacity, and the music ruled the hour from one to two o'clock — the scene being graced by the presence of near one thousand ladies.

At two o'clock the Committee escorted the speakers to the front of the stage. The President named Mr. Engs as chairman of the meeting, and conducted him to his seat. There was no time for reading the letters of the absent, not even such as that of Mr. George S. Hillard.

The Chairman called on C. Godfrey Gunther, Esq., to read the Declaration of Independence. The indictment against the king moved the audience intensely by suggestive analogies.

Mr. Eli P. Norton, Chairman of the Committee on Correspondence, was then called on to read the Ten Commandments of the Constitution, which he prefaced as follows:

Fellow-Citizens: It has been thought appropriate to the times in which we live, and to the day which we celebrate, that there should be read on this occasion those guarantees of the Constitution by which our fathers intended to secure for themselves and for us certain rights believed to be essential to the existence of free communities. These guarantees do not derive their sanctity alone from the fact that they are a portion of our written Constitution; they came to us hallowed by ages. Our Revolutionary ancestors and the people from whom we derive so many of our laws, maintained them with arms in their hands. The people of England, although under a monarchy, from the earliest period, have contended for that priceless privilege of being tried alone by a jury of their peers, and by the laws of the land. Magna Charta, the great charter, extorted from King John by the people of England six hundred and forty-eight years ago, provided, among other things, "that no subject should be exiled, or in any shape whatever molested, either in his person or effects, otherwise than by judgment of his peers, and according to the law of the land." In 1627, Charles I. of England violated this sacred provi-

ion of Magna Charta by repeated acts of arbitrary power. The people remonstrated with him; but he still persisted and declared, in a letter to Parliament that, "without the overthrow of sovereignty, he could not suffer the power of general commitment to be questioned." At once, those great lawyers Coke and Selden prepared that celebrated statute called the Petition of Right. The Petition of Right declared that the King had no right to make arbitrary arrests, and punish by military commissions. Although the King gave his written assent to that statute, he continued to violate it. The result of these violations, and the continuance of arbitrary arrests and trials by military commissions, was civil war, and the loss, by the King of England, of his head upon the scaffold. Sixty years after the adoption of the Petition of Right, Parliament, for the purpose of placing the liberties of the people of England upon a basis that could never be questioned, enacted the Bill of Rights. The material provisions of that Bill of Rights were ingrafted into the Constitutions of the American colonies and American States, and are now in the Constitution of the United States. Our Constitution, my fellow-citizens, is not like the written Constitutions of the French, Mexican, and South-American Republics, which can be repeatedly changed without any shock to the habits and moral sense of the peoples they were intended to govern. The written Constitution of the United States constituted, in the proper sense, the essential institutions of the Republic. Its guarantees, indeed, are necessary to the life of American liberty. If they are permitted to be destroyed or suspended at the will of the Executive, American manhood will be lost, and the once proud and lofty American citizen will sink into the cringing subject of arbitrary power.

Those portions of the Constitution peculiarly appropriate to the present t nes were applauded to the echo.

When the "Hail Columbia" of the band subsided, Governor Seymour was introduced amidst cheers so loud and long continued, that nothing closed them but the clear and familiar tones of the speaker.

ADDRESS OF GOVERNOR SEYMOUR.

Fellow-Citizens: When I accepted the invitation to speak, with others, at this meeting, we were promised the downfall of Vicksburgh, the opening of the Mississippi, the probable capture of the confederate capital and the exhaustion of the rebellion. By common consent, all parties had fixed upon this day when the results of the campaign should be known, to mark out that line of policy which they felt that our country should pursue. But in the moment of expected victory there came the midnight cry for help from Pennsylvania to save its despoiled fields from the invading foe; and almost within sight of this great commercial metropolis, the ships of your merchants were burned to the water's edge. Since that time to this, I have occupied every hour of my time, to the point of physical exhaustion, to rally our troops to the rescue of an adjoining sis-

State, (tremendous applause;) to organize the militia of our own State for defense, and to place New-York in that condition of dignity and power which a great State should ever hold that respects its own rights. (Great applause.) I have concerned myself with those measures that I thought best calculated to protect the commerce of this great city. I stand before you, then, upon this occasion, not as one animated by expected victories, but feeling as all feel who are now within the sound of my voice, the dread uncertainties of the conflicts which rage around us, not alone in Pennsylvania, but along the long line of the Mississippi—contests that are carrying down to bloody graves so many of our fellow-countrymen, so many of our friends—that are spreading renewed mourning throughout this great broad land. Under circumstances like these, I shall allow to go unnoticed many topics upon which I meant to speak at this time. They might seem to jar with the solemnity of the occasion. They might not be in keeping with the feelings which now oppress us. But there is one subject to which even now I feel it my duty to call your attention. There is one appeal that I would now make to this whole community, irrespective of party, and I pray that you may hear that appeal.

A few years ago we stood before this community to warn them of the dangers of sectional strife, but our fears were laughed at. At a later day, when the clouds of war overhung our country, we implored those in authority to compromise that difficulty, for we had been told by the great orator and statesman, Burke, that there never yet was a revolution that might not have been prevented by a compromise opportunely and graciously made. (Great applause.) Our prayers were unheeded. Again, when the contest was opened, we invoked those who had the conduct of affairs not to underrate the power of the adversary—not to underrate the courage and resources and endurance of our own sister States. This warning was treated as sympathy with treason. You have the results of these unheeded warnings and unheeded prayers; they have stained our soil with blood; they have carried mourning into thousands of homes; and to-day they have brought our country to the very verge of destruction. Once more I come before you, to offer again an earnest prayer, and beg you to listen to a warning. Our country is not only at this time torn by one of the bloodiest wars that has ever ravaged the face of the earth; but, if we turn our faces to our own loyal States, how is it there? You find the community divided into political parties, strongly arrayed, and using with regard to each other terms of reproach and defiance. It is said by those who support more particularly the Administration, that we who differ honestly, patriotically, sincerely, from them with regard to the line of duty, are men of treasonable purposes and enemies to our country. ("Hear, hear.") On the other hand, the Democratic organization look upon this Administration as hostile to their rights and liberties; they look upon their opponents as men who would do them wrong in regard to their most sacred franchises. I need not call your attention to the tone of the press or to the tone of public feeling, to show you how at this moment, parties are thus exasperated, and stand in defiant attitudes to each other. A few years ago we were told that sectional strife, waged in words like these, would do no harm to our country; but you have seen the sad and bloody results. Let us be admonished now in time and take care that this irritation, this feeling which is growing up in our midst, shall not also ripen into civil troubles that shall carry the evils of war into our own homes. Upon one point all are agreed, and that is this: Until we have a united North we can have no successful war. Until we have a united, harmonious North we can have no beneficent peace. How shall we gain harmony? How shall the unity of all be obtained? Is it to be coërced? I appeal to you, my Republican friends, when you say to us that the nation's life and existence hangs upon harmony and concord here, if you yourselves, in your serious moments, believe that this is to be produced by seizing our persons, by infringing upon our rights, by insulting our homes, and by depriving us of those cherished principles for which our fathers fought, and to which we have always sworn allegiance? (Great applause.) I do appeal to you, my Republican friends, and beg that you will receive this appeal in the earnest, and patriotic spirit which prompts me to make it. I appeal to you if you are not doing yourselves and your country a great wrong, when you declare that harmony and unity of purpose are essential to save the nation's life, essential to the highest interests of our land, and yet stigmatize men, as true and honest as yourselves, and whom experience has proved to have been wiser, as men who do not love their country, and who are untrue to her interests? How, then, are we to get this indispensable harmony—this needed unity? It is not to be obtained by trampling upon rights; it is not to be obtained by threats; it is not to be obtained by coërcion; it is not to be obtained by attempting to close our lips when we would utter the honest purposes of our hearts and the firm convictions of our judgment.

But, my Republican friends, there is a mode by which it can be reached; there is a mode by which the nation's life can be saved; there is a mode by which, in the end, we will restore this Union of ours, and bring back those glorious privileges which were so wantonly thrown away. We come to you in no spirit of arrogance. We do not ask you to make any concession of advantage to us. On the contrary, we only say to you, holding in your hands and in your control almost all the political power of your country, to exercise it according to your chartered rights. (Tremendous applause.) We only ask that you shall give to us that which you claim for yourselves, and that which every freeman and every man who respects himself will have—freedom of speech, the right to exercise all the franchises conferred by the Constitution upon American citizens. (Great applause.) Can you safely deny us these? Will you not trample upon your own rights if you refuse to listen? Do you not create revolution when you say that our persons may be rightfully seized, our property confiscated, our homes entered? Are you not exposing yourselves, your own interests, to as great a peril as that with which you threaten us? Remember this, that the bloody, and treasonable, and revolutionary doctrine of public necessity can be proclaimed by a mob as well as by a government. (Applause.) Remember all the teachings of history; and we implore you, with regard to your own interests, to stop and inquire if you are not doing yourselves and your own families, and all that you hold dear to you, an infinite wrong when you sustain propositions that tear away from them, as well as from us, all the protections which the Constitution of your country has thrown around public liberty. (Great applause.) Can you tell when ambition, love of plunder, or thirst for power, will induce bad and dangerous men to proclaim this very principle of public necessity as a reason why they should trample beneath their feet all the laws of our land? I ask you again to think if measures like these give power, dignity, or strength to our Government? I ask you, on the other hand, if those governments have not lived out the longest periods which, in times of public danger, instead of shrinking back from the principles of liberty and the barriers of order, have raised aloft these great principles, and battled under them, and thus given strength to the hearts of the people and gained the respect of the world. (Applause.) I ask you if it is not an evidence of weakness, defeat, and discomfiture, when, in the presence of armed rebellion, the Administration is compelled to assert that the very charter by which it holds its power has ceased to have a virtue that can protect a citizen in his rights? Suppose we accept this doctrine, what will be the consequences? To-day the great masses of conservatives who still battle for time-honored principles of government, amid denunciation, contumely, and abuse, are the only barriers that stand between this government and its own destruction. If we should acquiesce in the doctrine that in times of war constitutions are suspended and laws have lost their force, then we should accept a doctrine that the very right by which this Government administers its power has lost its virtue, and we would be brought down to the level of rebellion itself, having an existence only by virtue of material power. When men accept despotism they may have a choice as to who the despot shall be. The struggle then will not be, shall we have constitutional liberty? But having accepted the doctrine that the Constitution has lost its force, every instinct of personal ambition, every instinct of personal security, will lead men to put themselves under the protection of that power which they suppose most competent to guard their persons. And then this Administration would find that, in putting military rulers over us they had made military masters for themselves; for this war teaches us that the general who will betray the liberties of the people for the purpose of gaining the favor of power, will, when opportunity occurs, seize power itself. (Applause.) I came here to-day to appeal to you who may be politically opposed to us. Do not do yourselves a wrong. Do not do your own Administration a wrong, and push us from that position which we are trying to hold. Do not use abuse and contumely against our persons, and threats against our property, because we stand up to say that you, and we, and all shall have our rights; that your houses shall be sacred; and, in English parlance, that every man's home shall be his castle, within which he is safe from intrusion. (Applause.) Why, what is the glory of a people and the glory of a nation? It is not the magnitude of its power; it is not the extent of its dominions. It is the fact that the humblest home is safe under its protection. The proudest boast ever uttered by Britain's proudest statesmen was—not of martial achievements—not of the triumphs upon the field—not of that wonderful dominion upon which the sun never sets—no, it was this; that Britain's monarch could not enter unbidden the meanest home in the land, although its shattered walls might give its humble inmate but a scanty protection from the storms that howled around. (Great applause.) For what are governments constituted? Not for dominion, not for grandeur, but in order that every man should enjoy the rights of person and security of home, and freedom of conscience and the enjoyment of his property, subject to the laws. These are the great objects of government; and any system that comes short of this, fails in its objects; and any declaration that assails or endangers them is treason against human rights. (Applause.) But it is said that there is a law of necessity that, in times like these, suspends our Constitution—that war is unfavorable to liberty. It is not true. Liberty was born in war, it does not die in war. (Great applause.) Liberty was wrought out in the battle-field. That wonderful people who founded this great State—the Hollanders, who for eighty years battled against the martial laws and martial power of Spain, made it a principle which sustained them during that long contest, and enabled them to render their history glorious in the annals of mankind. Were personal rights and personal liberties suspended by our own forefathers during our Revolutionary contest? You heard the words of that Declaration of Independence which said that men had a right to trial by jury; that the military authority should never be exalted above the civil jurisdiction; that men should not be transported abroad for trial, (tremendous applause;) that they should have all the privileges know to English jurisprudence and English law; and yet to-day we are told that the men who put forth that declaration amid the roar of battle, when our nation was struggling into existence in all its weakness, who declared that these rights were to be held sacred in war, that these men made a Constitution that dies and shrinks away in war—that men trained in the perils of revolution had formed a government, that was not equal to the very highest purposes for which governments are constituted. I tell you it is a libel upon our fathers. (Great applause.) So far from it being true that those who formed this Constitution contemplated that these powers should be suspended, you find in all these provisions particular care for all the exigencies of war; you find numerous provisions that are meant to guard against the very dangers that menace us. Your attention has been called to the fact by the gentleman who preceded me. Why was it that they so carefully protected all your rights amid public commotion, if they meant that the mere existence of disorder should suspend the Constitution and the laws? This doctrine of the suspension of the Constitution and of the laws, is unconstitutional, is unsound, is unjust, is treasonable! (Tremendous applause, and waving of hats and handkerchiefs. A voice: "That's just the word!")

I am full of hope for the future. Not that I underrate the dangers which threaten us, not that I do not deplore the terrible ravages of this war. But why does war rage in our land? It is because this generation has lost the virtues patriotism, and wisdom of their fathers. It is because we have become indifferent to those great truths which we have now laid before us as if they were curiosities in legal literature, instead of being principles that should be impressed upon the heart and mind of every American. Examine yourselves, and I ask you how many men there are within the sound of my voice who knew twelve months ago what the Constitution of this country was? I do not say that you did not understand it intellectually; that it was not imprinted upon your memory; that it had not received your assent; but it was not until we were made to feel, as our fathers felt, the value of this declaration, that they had put forth, that any of us could ever see the significance of the Constitution of our country and the Declaration of Independence. (Applause.) We have accepted it, as I said, mentally and intellectually; but why was it, when these familiar words sounded upon your ears on this occasion, as you have heard them often before on the anniversary of our country's liberty, that they stirred your very hearts within you, made your blood tingle in your veins? My friends, we have not now a mere intellectual knowledge of the Constitution; we do not give it now a mental support; we accept it with a vital, living piety that makes us better men and better patriots; and wherever you go, all over this land, you find these sentiments now exist in the minds of more than a majority of the American people. They are now fervent in their faith, fixed in their purpose—fanatics if you please—for the great principles of liberty, and in their determination to see that those rights and liberties are established. (Great applause.) We have seen in our land two small parties, each an inconsiderable minority in the section of country where they existed, but men of purpose, men of zeal, men of fanaticism.

We have seen them wage a war upon the Constitution of our country with a persistence and power that has at last shaken it to its very foundation, and brought us to-day to the very brink of national ruin. We have seen what zeal and purpose could do when it was opposed only by a dull mental acquiescence in great truths. What may we not hope that we may do when the great majority of the American people propose to maintain it at every cost and at every hazard? (Great applause.) Do you wish for peace? Do you wish for victory? Do you wish for the restoration of our national privileges? Here lies the pathway. Let the American people once learn the full value of their liberties, and the battle is fought and won. Without this, my friends, war can bring you no success, peace can give you no quiet. Until that takes place, war or peace are the mere incidents of the great underlying causes of convulsion which have affected our land, and shaken our institutions to the very centre. Your particular views may lead you to attribute it to one special cause or another; but there is one great underlying general cause of this war which must be removed before the country can be restored, and that cause is indifference to our rights, indifference to our liberties, and want of an elevated wisdom that could understand the duties of American citizenship. When you have gained this, peace will be restored; institutions that made us but three short years ago the most glorious nation on the face of the earth will be reinvigorated, and the respect of the world regained. When we have again restored that virtue and that intelligence, our country will again be restored to its former greatness, and to its former glory. (Great applause.) But, my friends, any thing short of this will disappoint your hopes. No victory can restore greatness, and glory, and power to a people who are unworthy of liberty. No peace will bring back prosperity to a land which can not understand the great principles upon which governments should be conducted, and the great objects for which they are instituted. But, my friends, I must close. ("Go on! Go on!") Let us now, upon this sad and solemn, as well as glorious occasion, rededicate ourselves to the service of our country in pure and fervent patriotism, putting aside all partisan passions and prejudices, and preparing ourselves to assert and maintain the great principles stated in the Declaration of Independence, and secured to us by the provisions of the Constitution of the United States. Let us resolve from this time on to do our duty, and demand our rights. (Immense applause.) So far as they are acting in the sphere of their constitutional power, let us be obedient to rulers, let us submit cheerfully, patiently, and willingly to those commands which they have a right to issue, whether we like them or not. When we have done this, let us claim our rights in all their fullness, and in all their perfection.

He who does not do his duty without regard to the misconduct of others is untrue to his country. He who does not claim his rights is false to liberty and to humanity. (Applause.) Our pathways are clear before us if we will but accept the wise teachings of our fathers. From this time let us resolve that we will uphold all the just powers of the general government, the rights of the States (applause) and of persons, and, above all, as their best and surest shield, the independence and purity of the judiciary. (Applause.) We stand to-day amid new-made graves; in a land filled with mourning, upon a soil saturated with the blood of the fiercest conflict of which history gives us an account. We can, if we will, avert all these calamities, and evoke a blessing. If we will do what? Hold that Constitution, and liberties, and laws are suspended—shrink back from the assertion of right? Will that restore them? Or shall we do as our fathers did under circumstances of like trial, when they combated against the powers of a crown? They did not say that liberty was suspended; that men might be deprived of the right of trial by jury; that they might be torn from their homes by midnight intruders! (Tremendous and continued applause.) If you would save your country and your liberties, begin right; begin at the hearthstones, which are ever meant to be the foundations of American institutions; begin in your family circle; declare that your privileges shall be held sacred; and having once proclaimed your own rights, take care that you do not invade those of your neighbor. (Applause.) Claim for your own States that jurisdiction and that government which you, better than all others, can exercise for yourselves, for you best know your own interests, and that which will do the most to advance the happiness and prosperity of your country. All the lessons of political wisdom are very few and very simple; they are, for men to respect their own rights and those of others. (Great applause.) They are to declare that the great principles of government were not holiday affairs, meant merely for a period of calm; but that they are great truths that can battle a storm as well. When we have determined this, as I said before, we can hope that our country will be restored to its former greatness and former glory. Once more, then, you, my Republican friends—once more, this whole community, I invoke you to ask yourselves whether, in giving way to your passions and prejudices, you will not endanger your own safety and your own homes? Once more I ask those who are politically opposed to me, if I am honored with the attendance of one such, that they will inquire if, in attempting to strike down my liberties, they have not struck a blow at their own also? (Great applause.) I ask all such if they can hope to stop the mighty ball of revolution precisely at that point which may suit their passions, their prejudices, and their purposes, and if they declare that laws and constitutions have lost their virtue to defend us, have they not equally lost their virtue to def them?

The eloquent speech of Ex-Governor SEYMOUR, of Conn., we are obliged to omit, not being able to procure the manuscript in time.

Governor PARKER was called away by telegram during the first speech.

HON. GEORGE H. PENDLETON'S ADDRESS.

MR. PRESIDENT — FELLOW-CITIZENS: It is related of the Italian peasant who visited Rome in the days of its imperial splendor, that he fled to his country home, dismayed at his dwarfed proportions in comparison with the magnificence and magnitude of all about him. I can participate in his feelings to-day. I would shrink from addressing you in view of the comparison which will naturally arise between myself and the eminent gentlemen who speak with me, if I did not know that you intend to give to-day a practical demonstration of the equal rights of all citizens, and under the protecting wing of the sovereignty of your noble State, and in the presence of your Governor, to vindicate, even in behalf of the humblest, the right of free speech, and to declare in tones which will penetrate executive mansions, that, as Congress can not legally, so any other power shall not illegally abridge that right. (Cheers.) It has been said that the character of a people might be known by its ballads. I think, in this prosaic age, a surer test is to be found in their national fête-days. France celebrates the days which her great Napoleon has stamped on history because they minister to her quenchless thirst for military glory. England recalls to the memory of her sons the days illustrious in her ecclesiastical reforms, because she prefers beyond all the glories of Cressy, and Agincourt, and Waterloo, to be called the leader of Protestantism in Europe. We have but this one national day. I have been told that in New England homes they garner up the memories of past pleasures on Thanksgiving-days. We, in the West, do homage to the birth of Washington, and to the achievements of that grand old patriot, Andrew Jackson. This day alone, in all our history, commands general celebration, because we have been hitherto content to be known as the people who were willing to incur the perils of revolution to test the truth of a preamble, and its falsity being settled, to limit the aspirations and movements of our Federal Government to the written permissions of a written Constitution. (Applause.) It is indeed Independence Day, but custom has consecrated its festivities also in honor of the Constitution and the Union. We celebrate it, indeed, because it was the first step in our separate existence; but much more, I think, because succeeding years have vindicated the wisdom of that revolution, whose consummation was had in the establishment of our confederated government. You remember, gentlemen, full well the history of those times. We might learn from them lessons of wisdom for present use. The war waged against the Colonies by Great Britain produced the cohesion of the Colonies. When the war ceased, the cohesion relaxed, and was in danger of being entirely destroyed. The States met in convention as sovereign communities to adopt a form of confederation which should accomplish its purpose without interfering with their great duty of protection of the life, liberty and property of their citizens. Their wisdom evolved our federal Union; but their prudence induced them to reäffirm the great principles of personal liberty which had been incorporated in the organism of their State governments. They proclaimed aloud—and the declaration secured the adoption of the Constitution—that no man shall be deprived of life, liberty or property, without due process of law; that Congress shall make no law to abridge the freedom of speech or the press, or the right to bear arms, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble. (Applause.) These principles were the spirit of immortal life. The Union was the body in which and by which they were to be applied to the uses of men. Your Committee has well understood this. They have made it part of their celebration to read the guarantees of the Constitution—guarantees of personal liberty, of freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom of ballot; safety for life, liberty, and property. These, gentlemen, are essential to free government. There can be no free government without them. There can be no free government without free elections—there can be no free elections without deliberation—there can be no free deliberation without free speech; there can be no free speech if prison-bars and banishment are the rewards of its exercise. (Applause.) And yet we are told that it is necessary to violate these rights in order to preserve the national life. They constitute the national life; they mark its identity. Without them that life ceases to be. You might as well talk of saving a man's life by taking away his upright form, his living soul, and reducing him to a brute. You might as well talk of preserving the wise and bold and hopeful and vigorous man, when you reduce him to a raving maniac or a gibbering idiot. I speak warmly upon this subject. I have seen the operation of this doctrine. I have seen a citizen of my own State torn from his home at the dead hour of night—his house broken into—his family terrified; himself carried to Cincinnati to a military prison, and after a sham trial, before an illegal tribunal, sentenced to a punishment unknown to our law. His only offense was that he loved his country well, and was brave enough to stand even against the Administration, in hope of maintaining the Constitution as it is, and restoring the Union as it was. (Cheers.) He is to-day in exile, but he will have his reward. If to deserve success will secure it, we will place him in honor and power, alongside of your worthy Governor here, and of him who ought to have been Governor of Connecticut. (Immense cheering.) As your chairman has already told you, I am one of the representatives of the democracy of Ohio, accredited to Abraham Lincoln, and commanded to deliver this message: Obey the Constitution; respect the guarantees of personal liberty; restore our citizen to his home. If you have aught against him, try him by jury, on an indictment, and if he is convicted, punish him. And now, returning from that mission, I have this to say to you, that if the doctrines which are obstinately asserted by men in high place, who have their hand on the hilt of the drawn sword, are to prevail, the first question for you will be, not whether you will have peace or war, but whether you have a free government, whether you are free men; whether you have a right to an opinion, and to express it, by means of that free but silent ballot which "executes the freeman's will as lightnings do the will of God."

They tell us that the suppression of free speech and personal rights is necessary to a vigorous prosecution of the war. Is this true? The history of the war of 1812 and of the Mexican war disprove it. It would be a libel on the names of our fathers to assert that this Constitution, the child of revolution, the offspring of men who had just tried the perils of seven years of war, was intended to be for times of peace only, and not for times of war. But if it be true, and the suppression of personal liberty is necessary for the successful prosecution of the war, then I say, that the war ought to be instantly stopped. [Immense, long-continued applause.] Its most successful prosecution, the utmost benefits which its friends in their highest flights of fancy have ever claimed, can not compensate to any of us for the loss of personal liberty. And here I can not refrain from calling your attention to the fact that the men who assert this opinion now most warmly belong to one of two classes—those who two years and more ago said there would be no war; that we Union-savers were timid; that, to use the classic language of His Excellency, President Lincoln, "nobody is hurt," or those who agreed with the bloody and brutal doctrine of a Western Senator, that without a "little blood-letting the Union would not be worth a curse." The Union not worth a curse!!! What is the Union? Not a government antecedent to the existence of the States, as Mr. Lincoln asserted, but a confederation made by sovereign independent States, each one of which was endowed with all the powers of sovereignty, and charged with the duty of the care of its own citizens. The Union is only the representative in the family of nations of all these States. They retain their original powers, except as they have consented for a time to part with them. This Union has its counterpart in the vegetable world. There seems to be one perfect indivisible plant. Break the upper rind and there are many parts, each perfect in itself, having separate roots, which, though closely intertwined, may be easily separated, and thus present a perfect plant, ready in good time to produce another as sound, symmetrical, and compact as the former. So with the States. They delegated certain powers to secure a representation in the world of nations, but they retained all their other powers. They are held compactly together by the band of those delegated powers; but if it shall be broken, you will find the separated States perfect in their machinery of government, able to preserve order and secure the rights of their citizens, and abundantly able to renew the forms of the old Union, or to reconstruct it on the ancient foundation, or to build up a new confederation, as nearly like the old as possible, and able to rival its surpassing glories. [Cheers] And why may we not have now the benefit of this united wisdom and power applied to this great question of reconstruction? Why not now call a sovereign Convention to settle this question? I speak not for those whom my voice can not reach, who have erected just now between us and them a wall of glistening bayonets: I ask those who are in power here at home—our rulers in the Federal Government, and their adherents in the North—why not have now a sovereign Convention? Because they would not compromise with Rebels with arms in their hands. Not compromise! Compromise is the first law of combination—I had almost said of nature. It is the law of all society, all government, all united action. Partners in business compromise; the members of church societies compromise; members of political, religious, charitable, useful societies compromise. Kings compromise with each other; they compromise with their subjects or lose them. Wars end by compromise—the family circle is a compromise. Husbands compromise with their wives; fathers compromise with their disobedient children; and if our holy religion is true, God Almighty compromised with man when he accepted in his behalf the atonement of his Son; and shall we refuse to do what nature, reason, religion, and history all command, because our bad passions are aroused, and we are told it would be cowardly to treat with avowed traitors? [Cheers.] Our Government was all a compromise. Three times the Convention at Philadelphia was ready to give up in despair, and three times the pleading, warning voices of Washington, Franklin, and Madison urged them to compromise their differences. They did so. They formed the Constitution, which created the Union. This was the great compromise. Let us stand by it firmly, my friends, and to the end. I participate in the hope so beautifully expressed by Governor Seymour of Connecticut, that all will yet be well. It can only be by adhering to the great compromise: stand by it, adhere to it, faithfully perform it in all parts; you, this audience—every man in his sphere—do your duty by it, urge your neighbors, your city, your State—the Northern States—to do theirs. Do not look after the South until you have eradicated the doctrine that the Administration and the North will violate it in order to have power to compel the South to observe it; that the Administration will destroy our Constitutional rights that it may vigorously prosecute a war to enforce its unconstitutional policy. [Cheers.] But stand by it in all integrity. It is the ark of our safety now. Let us revere it as the Jews did the Ark of the Covenant of God. Let us trust to it now while we are in the shadow of the dark valley, as well as when we were in the full daylight of prosperity. And then I confidently hope, that in God's good time, when peace shall have prevailed and mourning shall have ceased, and widows' weeds shall have been laid aside, and orphans' tears shall be dried, and new-made graves shall have grown green, there shall arise from this whole land, without the loss of a single State, from all its people North and South in fraternal union, an anthem of joy the like of which has not been heard since on Judean plains, on the natal morn, angels announced the coming of the Great Messiah: "Glory to God in the highest, on earth peace, good-will to men."

ADDRESS OF RICHARD O'GORMAN, Esq.

It has been thought desirable, fellow-citizens, that, after the more important business of the day was done—after you had heard what counsel should be given you by the distinguished gentlemen who have visited you from other parts of this State, and from other States—some one, a resident of your own city, should say to you a few words at parting. Why I have been chosen for this duty it is hard to say; unless it be because I am, like yourselves, a mere simple citizen—wearing no party honors—wearing no party fetters—accustomed to speak my own mind—and whose sayings, if, by chance, wise, may do good to others; but if not wise, can do little hurt to any one but myself. (Applause.)

You have heard to-day, first of all, the proud voice from the brave days of old, the voice of your heroic fathers telling you what were the liberties for which they fought, and what were the liberties they bequeathed to you. You have heard the voice of the Governor of the State of New York, calm, prudent, bold, as becomes the first officer of a sovereign State of four millions of people, and a territory as large as Great Britain. (Cheers.) Next you heard the voice of the gentleman who is not, but ought to be Governor of Connecticut. (Loud cheers.) Gov. Parker, of New-Jersey, did not speak to you, but was present; and in the persons of these three gentlemen, these three States have taken hands, and here to-day vowed that there should be for them and their people one policy—to secure the Union as long as it is possible to secure the Union, but our liberties at all events and at all hazards. (Great applause.) Before the Union was, these liberties were inherent and inalienable. They were not given to us by the Union, not granted to us by any parchment, but God gave them to every brave and honest man upon the earth, and of these principles the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution were simply declaratory. (Applause.) You heard that the citizens of the State of Ohio had awakened to a sense of the deep injury and wrong done to each of them, in the person of Mr. Vallandigham, and the voice of Mr. Pendleton, their representative before you, reëchoing from here, will awaken among them a new sense of conviction that in the defense of the Constitution and the law, and the liberties they guarantee, New-York will be ready with her assistance. (Applause.) True, we are in great danger; the greater, therefore, should be our courage. We have not been awake to our danger. With what horror would it fill us to see a boat about being swept over the falls of Niagara, while the crew, blind to their danger, waste time in wrangling and quarreling and carouse; but to see a nation, great though young, bearing on its head the crown of unexampled prosperity, inheriting all European civilization, Law, Liberty, and Religion, to see that nation with its own insane hands tearing its own breast and glorying in the wounds it inflicts, is a sight to make the angels weep. There are very few really disloyal men in the nation, and the disloyal men are not always to be found in the places where we are mostly told to look for them. (Applause.) That man who, in an hour of peril like this, prefers the interests of himself or his party to the interests of the country, whether he be in the cabinet, the counting-house, or the field, is disloyal, (applause;) and the man who strives honestly, and to the extent of his intelligence, to do his duty as a citizen toward his country, and in the discharge of that duty tells publicly what he believes to be the truth, that man, though he be found in Fort Lafayette, is a loyal man. (Great applause.) Now, fellow-citizens, words ought to be used in their proper meanings. Do not suppose that you are dealing with an insurrection or rebellion—the movement at the South is no disorderly emeute of disaffected citizens. It has grown beyond that. It is the uprising of a whole people, and confronts us now in all the stature of civil war. Once it was a mere insurrection—there was very little Union in the South, but we made them united, and more shame for us. (Applause.)

We here at the North adopted the disgraceful policy of bringing home war to the doors of unarmed and defenseless citizens. There were many at the South who looked upon the old Union with love and reverence, and hoped again to see the old flag wave over them, but we have made that flag to them an emblem of pillage, havoc, and ruin, and implanted in their hearts a heritage of bitter and imperishable hatred. Though I should stand alone, I will, for the honor of this nation among nations, raise my voice in protest against this disgraceful and uncivilized warfare. (Great applause.) It is no apology to say that the Southern soldiers have done wrong in burning our fishing ships; let them be reproved for their wrong; but let us not lay the flattering unction to our souls that by denouncing them, our own sins can be kept hidden from the eyes of watchful nations—from my heart do I wish that they could be. The South is united, and their armies are marching upon us; who knows but their cannon are now hurling death among those dear to us on the soil of Pennsylvania! In what condition are we? disunited, discordant. The people not trusting the Government, and the Government not trusting the people, no two men agreeing as to what is or what ought to be the object for which we are fighting. If this continues there is nothing for us but disgraceful defeat. How are the people of the North to become united. The Government has its own plan, and it is exceedingly simple, if it could be carried into effect. It is simply this. That all the people in the North are to concur with the opinion of the Republican party, or retire to the Dry Tortugas. This plan of securing unanimity is expressed exceedingly well in the phrase of unconditional loyalty. It means that you must discuss no public question unless you discuss it in a tone favorable to the Government and the Republican party. When there is a discussion you must not remain silent, as the President says you must declare in favor of the Government and its actions, whether you like them or not. You must read just what papers the Government likes; you must get what telegrams from the war that the Government concocts; you must get so much and so little information about what is most dear to you, the success of your armies, and the fate of your own brethren, precisely as the Government chooses to give. The Government will be a father to you and you will be as little children—open your mouth and shut your eyes, and see if heaven won't send you a prize. (Great laughter.)

Now that little nursery plan was from time to time tried in Europe. There was a monarch who made that experiment in France some time ago, and he could not get his people to agree with him in every thing—they had one will, and he had another; and the plan that he adopted to secure unanimity was to send as many as he thought proper to a place called the Bastile. Now, possibly you remember that he continued that, until the people, long apathetic, were at last stung into resistance, and they walked up with their unarmed breasts to the Bastile, and tore it down, stone by stone, and swept the foul thing from the face of the earth. (Great cheering.) And that reminds me of a little story. (Laughter.) The key of the Bastile was sent by General Lafayette to General Washington, who accepted it as a token of the victory of freedom over despotism, and he hung it up in Mount Vernon. I have heard that that key is missing, (laughter,) and I am credibly informed that an experiment has been made in the depth of the midnight, and that it exactly fits the lock of Fort Lafayette. (Laughter and cheers.)

The experiment was once made also in England. There was once upon a time a king there who had a will of his own, and a minister who was disposed to help him. The king was Charles the First — the minister was Thomas Wentworth, Lord

Strafford. They inaugurated a system of unconditional loyalty that they called "Thorough." The king willed one thing and the people another, and there was no compromise between them; and the result was that the king lost the people, and the people lost the king, because they beheaded him. I can not help thinking that Mr. Seward had that transaction before his mind in the remarkable conversation he is reported to have had with Lord Lyons on the fourteenth of September, 1861. "My lord," he is reported to have said, "I can touch a bell on my right hand and order the arrest of a citizen of Ohio." He did it. (Laughter.) "I can touch the bell again and order the arrest of a citizen of New-York." He can not do it. (Tremendous and continued applause. A voice: "Three cheers for Governor Seymour; he can not do it," given enthusiastically.) "Can the Queen of England in her dominions do as much?" She can not do it. The English people love the royal lady that now occupies the throne of England, and they are a loyal people; but in spite of their loyalty she dare not attempt it, and they would not let her. Ah! that little bell! I think I hear it tinkling still, and the sound becoming louder and louder, until it begins to boom along and grows into a tocsin, at the sound of which the citizens of America shall awake and secure their liberties forever. (Tremendous applause.) It is useless for the Government to attempt to stifle discussion. Discussion must be had either in public or in secret, and secret discussion is dangerous, and leads to conspiracy. Open discussion makes patriots and heroes—it is secret whispering, dark plotting that makes traitors and cowards. Let our discussions of national questions be open and public, and kindly, too. Let all fair allowances be made for the difficulties of the Government. But let discussion be fearless. The sacred right to grumble should be defended at all hazards. Secrecy is unmanly. If any thing disgraces the American people, if any thing will unman them in the face of the enemy, it is their craven fear of Fort Lafayette. (Applause.) But what are we to discuss? Are we to question one another whether we are or are not for the "vigorous prosecution of the war, for the preservation of the Union"? I denounce that phrase as a delusion, a snare, a trap. I deny that there is any war for the preservation of the Union. Union does not come from war, but only subjugation, submission. We may subdue the South to the condition of Poland, but if we do, we must make of ourselves a Russia. Our talk of Union and liberty will be as hollow as the dispatch, "Order reigns in Warsaw," uttered when freedom lay in its death-agonies, bleeding, mangled, crushed, and hopeless. It is not possible, under the free form of our Government, to hold one half of it in subjection to another. If we mean that, we must get rid of the Constitution—if the South is to be subdued by our arms—it is the destruction of the republican government of this country. (Applause.) I do not like that talk about the vigorous prosecution of the war. I am not sure I know what it means. I heard a person the other day say he was in favor of a vigorous prosecution of the war, of hanging Northern "Copperheads," o carrying the war to the homes of the rebels—in fact, as he concluded with a climax of martial feeling, he would rather fight than eat. I ventured to suggest that the general preference of humanity was in favor of eating, (laughter,) whereupon he gave me an indignant scowl, and deigning no reply, he strode away. I asked a bystander to what regiment the gallant captain belonged. "Oh!" said he, "he is not a captain, he is not an officer in the army at all, he is a contractor." (Great laughter and applause.) In his case "vigorous prosecution of the war" means vigorous filling of his own pockets. So it is generally; you will find that those who are most eager for the prosecution of the war, are those who are making money by it, and those who talk most about fighting do the least of it. Some of you, perhaps, know that so far as I am concerned, I condemn this war, that I deplore it, that I consider it a reckless waste of heroic blood. (Loud applause.) I have lifted up my voice for peace when I thought peace possible, and I believe, that from time to time, during the last two years of war, an honorable peace, an honorable compromise, would have been possible; but now that the war is in its agony, that we are in the grip and struggle of the fight · now that the enemy is upon the soil of a neighboring State, it is no use to speak of peace. When this struggle is over, then will my voice again be heard for peace, for compromise; but to-day all I can say is: "God defend the right." (Continued applause.)

The Government of the United States has been to a great extent unfortunately a government of party, and the present Administration is particularly open to that objection. I have remarked in the policy of the Republican party a tendency, I believe, inconsistent with a republican form of government. This policy is centralization — taking away rights from municipalities, States, and individuals, and gathering them adroitly to one centre. Now, the principle on which the American Union is founded is precisely the reverse of that. The principle of the Union is diversity, State Sovereignty, State rights. (Great applause.) Centralization is Imperialism. Centralization is despotism: State rights is freedom. (Cheers.) And when I am asked to increase the power of the Government, and the party that governs it, by placing armies in their hands, over which they have complete and supreme control, I confess I fear much that under the pretext of restoring the Union, we are strengthening the hands of those whose policy tends to destroy our liberties. Do you ask what then is to be done? I say the first thing to be done is to arm the State of New-York. (Great applause.) Arm it, and arm it at once. The course is safe, and can harm nobody. The Governor will do his duty, and if he wants money, let him get it by free and voluntary subscription. Let the State be armed and the soldiers drilled and disciplined, (a voice: "And commanded by State rights men,") commanded by their constitutional and lawful Commander-in-Chief, the Governor of the State. (Loud applause.) Then we will be ready for our own protection. Then we will be ready to fulfill all our legal obligations to the Federal Government. The State of New-York has never proved recreant to its duty to the Federal Government, and it will not do so now. A few days ago the Governor of the State of Pennsylvania called for help to resist an invasion, and the Governor of New-York sent men to help them almost before the Pennsylvanians had awakened to a sense of their imminent danger. (Applause.) Let our soldiers be drilled, then, not merely for parades in the streets, but in camps of instruction, and let them be prepared as men to defend the rights of our State. When that is done we will need no longer provost-marshals in New-York; it will be no longer necessary for gallant officers to be fretting their glorious souls in contentions with old women, and testing the authenticity of cripples, (laughter,) while they might be winning fame with their swords in the field. It is a shame for the State of New-York to put the Federal Government to the expense and trouble of a conscription here. Let the State, as a State, raise such troops as the Federal Government has the right to ask of her. (Cheers.) There is no blinking the fact that the union of these States may possibly be destroyed. I do not believe it will be destroyed. I hope that God, who guided its discovery and settlement, and has thus far prospered us, will not desert us in the hour of our trial. But although the Union may fall, liberty may be preserved, and the State may be sovereign yet. (Cheers.) Have we not four millions of people, a great territory, bounded on one side by the vast ocean, and on another by the lakes, with harbors, railroads, and canals; and can we not lift this State high enough above the troubled waters to be a freehold for humanity forever? (Applause.) Do not suppose that a vast territory is necessary for freedom. Attica was scarce larger than this little island on which we stand, yet think how great and glorious, how rich and strong, was its life, and what it has done for the world. In the midst of despotic nations, rich in territories and in population, it was free, and has outlived them all. Where now are Nineveh, Carthage, and Tyre? They are gone; their language is forgotten, and almost their place upon the earth. Go to Athens, and there you will still see the old Acropolis lifting up to the sun its diadem of pillars, bidding mankind come there and learn how immortal are the fruits of liberty. I hear many men nowadays speak in favor of a "strong government." What do men mean by a strong government? a dictatorship, an oligarchy? These are the weakest forms of government; a dictatorship is sure to result in repeated revolution. This American people will not submit to the irresponsible government of one man. An oligarchy leads to socialism, to anarchy, and disorder. You have no ground-work here, on which to build an aristocracy, no prestige of antiquity supports it. It would be here an aristocracy of mere wealth, and such an aristocracy is in contradiction to all the traditions and habits of thought of the American People. It is folly to call these "strong governments." There is but one form of government, that is strong, that is permanent and secure. It is that which rests on the will of its citizens. (Great cheering.) As Athens was of old, let New-York be still. Let us protect to the last the inalienable rights of citizens; let us stand by ourselves, and God will stand by us. I think we have an official at the head of our State that is fit to lead our State and guide it aright; I, for one, have confidence in Horatio Seymour. (Applause.) Let us do our duty by him; let us remember that each State in its inherent sovereignty is independent in itself. Then we are for the Union as long as it can be supported, but we are for our liberties at all events, and in defense of those liberties, in defense of the Constitution, of Law and Order, "we pledge our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor." (Great applause.)

BIBLE VIEW OF SLAVERY.

THE word "slave" occurs but twice in our English Bible, but the term "servant," commonly employed by our translators, has the meaning of slave in the Hebrew and the Greek originals, as a general rule, where it stands alone. We read, however, in many places, of "hired servants," and of "bondmen and bondmaids." The first were not slaves, but the others were; the distinction being precisely the same which exists in our own day. Slavery, therefore, may be defined as servitude for life, descending to the offspring. And this kind of bondage appears to have existed as an established institution in all the ages of our world, by the universal evidence of history, whether sacred or profane.

This understood, I shall not oppose the prevalent idea that slavery is an evil in itself. A physical evil it may be, but this does not satisfy the judgment of its more zealous adversaries, since they contend that it is a moral evil—a positive sin to hold a human being in bondage, under any circumstances whatever, unless as a punishment inflicted on crimes, for the safety of the community.

Here, therefore, lies the true aspect of the controversy. And it is evident that it can only be settled by the Bible. For every Christian is bound to assent to the rule of the inspired Apostle, that "sin is the transgression of the law," namely, the law laid down in the Scriptures by the authority of God—the supreme "Lawgiver, who is able to save and to destroy." From his Word there can be no appeal. No rebellion can be so atrocious in his sight as that which dares to rise against his government. No blasphemy can be more unpardonable than that which imputes sin or moral evil to the decrees of the eternal Judge, who is alone perfect in wisdom, in knowledge, and in love.

With entire correctness, therefore, your letter refers the question to the only infallible criterion—the Word of God. If it were a matter to be determined by my personal sympathies, tastes, or feelings, I should be as ready as any man to condemn the institution of slavery, for all my prejudices of education, habit, and social position stand entirely opposed to it. But as a Christian, I am solemnly warned not to be "wise in my own conceit," and not to "lean to my own understanding." As a Christian, I am compelled to submit my weak and erring intellect to the authority of the Almighty. For then only can I be safe in my conclusions, when I know that they are in accordance with the will of Him, before whose tribunal I must render a strict account in the last great day.

I proceed, accordingly, to the evidence of the sacred Scriptures, which, long ago, produced complete conviction in my own mind, and must, as I regard it, be equally conclusive to every candid and sincere inquirer. When the array of positive proof is exhibited, I shall consider the objections, and examine their validity with all the fairness in my power.

The first appearance of slavery in the Bible is the wonderful prediction of the patriarch Noah: "Cursed be Canaan, a servant of servants shall he be to his brethren. Blessed be the Lord God of Shem, and Canaan shall be his servant. God shall enlarge Japhet, and he shall dwell in the tents of Shem, and Canaan shall be his servant. (Gen. 9 : 25.)

The heartless irreverence which Ham, the father of Canaan, displayed toward his eminent parent, whose piety had just saved him from the deluge, presented the immediate occasion for this remarkable prophecy; but the actual fulfillment was reserved for his posterity, after they had lost the knowledge of God, and become utterly polluted by the abominations of heathen idolatry. The Almighty, foreseeing this total degradation of the race, ordained them to servitude or slavery under the descendants of Shem and Japhet, doubtless because he judged it to be their fittest condition. And all history proves how accurately the prediction has been accomplished, even to the present day.

We come next to the proof that slavery was sanctioned by the Deity in the case of Abraham, whose three hundred and eighteen bond servants, born in his own house, (Gen. 14 : 14,) are mentioned along with those who were bought with his money, as proper subjects for circumcision. (Gen. 17 : 12.) His wife Sarah had also an Egyptian slave, named Hagar, who fled from her severity. And "the angel of the Lord" commanded the fugitive to return to her mistress and submit herself. (Gen. 16 : 9.) If the philanthropists of our age, who profess to believe the Bible, had been willing to take the counsel of that angel for their guide, it would have preserved the peace and welfare of the Union.

The third proof that slavery was authorized by the Almighty occurs in the last of the Ten Commandments, delivered from Mount Sinai, and universally acknowledged by Jews and Christians as THE MORAL LAW: "Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's house, thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's wife, nor his man-servant, nor his maid-servant, nor his ox, nor his ass, nor any thing that is thy neighbor's." (Exod. 20 : 17.) Here it is evident that the principle of property—"any thing that is thy neighbor's"—runs through the whole. I am quite aware, indeed, of the prejudice which many good people entertain against the idea of property in a human being, and shall consider it, in due time, amongst the objections. I am equally aware that the wives of our day may take umbrage at the law which places them in the same sentence with the slave, and even with the house and the cattle. But the truth is none the less certain. The husband has a real property in the wife, because she is bound, for life, to serve and to obey him. The wife has a real property in her husband, because he is bound for life to cherish and maintain her. The character of property is doubtless modified by its design. But whatever, whether person or thing, the law appropriates to an individual, becomes of necessity his property.

The fourth proof, however, is yet more express, as it is derived from the direct rule established by the wisdom of God for his chosen people, Israel, on the very point in question, namely:

"If thou buy a Hebrew servant, six years shall he serve, and in the seventh year he shall go out free for nothing.

if he came in by himself, he shall go out by himself. If he were married, then his wife shall go out with him. if his master have given him a wife, and she have borne him sons or daughters, the wife and the children shall be her master's, and he shall go out by himself." (Exod. 21 : 2–4.) Here we see that the separation of husband and wife is positively directed by the divine command, in order to secure the property of the master in his bond-maid and her offspring. But the husband had an alternative, if he preferred slavery to separation. For thus the law of God proceeds: "If the servant shall plainly say, I love my master, my wife, and my children; I will not go out free; then his master shall bring him unto the judges; he shall also bring him to the door or unto the door-post; and his master shall bore his ear through with an awl, and he shall serve him forever." (Exod. 21 : 5, 6.) With this law before his eyes, what Christian can believe that the Almighty attached immorality or sin to the condition of slavery?

The treatment of slaves, especially as it regarded the degree of correction which the master might administer, occurs in the same chapter, as follows: "If a man smite his servant or his maid with a rod, and he die under his hand, he shall be surely punished. Notwithstanding if he continue a day or two, he shall not be punished; for he is his money." (Exod. 21 : 20, 21.) And again, If a man smite the eye of his servant or the eye of his maid, that it perish, he shall let him go free for his eye's sake. And if he smite out his man-servant's tooth, or his maid-servant's tooth, he shall let him go free for his tooth's sake." (Exod. 21 : 26, 27.) Here we see that the master was authorized to use corporal correction toward his slaves, within certain limits. When immediate death ensued, he was to be punished as the judges might determine. But for all that came short of this, the loss of his property was held to be a sufficient penalty.

The next evidence furnished by the divine law appears in the peculiar and admirable appointment of the Jubilee. "Ye shall hallow the fiftieth year, and proclaim liberty throughout all the land to all the inhabitants thereof: it shall be a Jubilee unto you, and ye shall return every man unto his possession, and ye shall return every man to his family." (Lev. 25 : 10.) This enactment, however did not affect the slaves, because it only extended to the Israelites who had "a possession and a family," according to the original distribution of the land among the tribes. The distinction is plainly set forth in the same chapter, namely:

"If thy brother that dwelleth by thee be waxen poor, and be sold unto thee, thou shalt not compel him to serve as a bond servant, but as a hired servant and as a sojourner he shall be with thee, and shall serve thee unto the year of Jubilee, and then shall he depart from thee, both he and his children with him, and shall return unto his own family, and unto the possession of his fathers shall he return. For they are my servants which I brought forth out of the land of Egypt, they shall not be sold as bondmen. Both thy bondmen and bondmaids, which thou shalt have, shall be of the heathen that are round about you; of them shall ye buy bondmen and bondmaids. Moreover, of the children of the strangers that do sojourn among you, of them shall ye buy, and of their families that are with you, which they begat in your land, and they shall be your possession. And ye shall take them as an inheritance for your children after you, to inherit them for a possession; THEY SHALL BE YOUR BONDMEN FOR EVER; but over your brethren, the children of Israel, ye shall not rule one over another with rigor. For unto me the children of Israel are servants; they are my servants whom I brought forth out of the land of Egypt: I am the Lord your God." (Lev. 25 : 40–46, with v. 55.)

The distinction here made between the temporary servitude of the Israelite and the perpetual bondage of the heathen race, is too plain for controversy. And this express and positive law furnishes the true meaning of another passage which the ultra abolitionist is very fond of repeating: "Thou shalt not deliver unto his master the servant which is escaped from his master unto thee: he shall dwell with thee, even among you, in that place which he shall choose, in one of thy gates where it liketh him best: thou shalt not oppress him." (Deut. 23 : 15, 16.) This evidently must be referred to the case of a slave who had escaped from a foreign heathen master, and can not, with any sound reason, be applied to the slaves of the Israelites themselves. For it is manifest that if it were so applied, it would nullify the other enactments of the divine Lawgiver, and it would have been an absurdity to tell the people that they should "buy bondmen and bondmaids of the heathen and the stranger, to be their possession and the inheritance of their children for ever," while, nevertheless, the slaves should be at liberty to run away and become freemen when they pleased. It is the well-known maxim, in the interpretation of all laws, that each sentence shall be so construed as to give a consistent meaning to the whole. And assuredly, if we are bound to follow this rule in the legislation of earth, we can not be less bound to follow it in the legislation of the Almighty. The meaning that I have adopted is the only one which agrees with the established principle of legal construction, and it has invariably been sanctioned by the doctors of the Jewish law, and every respectable Christian commentator.

Such, then, is the institution of slavery, laid down by the Lord God of Israel for his chosen people, and continued for fifteen centuries, until the new dispensation of the Gospel. What change did this produce? I grant, of course, that we, as Christians, are bound by the precepts and example of the Saviour and his apostles. Let us now, therefore, proceed to the all-important inquiry, whether we are authorized by these to presume that the Mosaic system was done away.

First, then, we ask what the divine Redeemer said in reference to slavery. And the answer is perfectly undeniable: HE DID NOT ALLUDE TO IT AT ALL. Not one word upon the subject is recorded by any of the four Evangelists who gave His life and doctrines to the world. Yet slavery was in full existence at the time, throughout Judea; and the Roman empire, according to the historian Gibbon, contained sixty millions of slaves, on the lowest probable computation! How prosperous and united would our glorious republic be at this hour, if the eloquent and pertinacious declaimers against slavery had been willing to follow their Saviour's example!

But did not our Lord substantially repeal the old law, by the mere fact that he established a new dispensation? Certainly not, unless they were incompatible. And that he did not consider them incompatible is clearly proved by his own express declaration. "Think not," saith he, "that I am come to destroy the law or the prophets. I am not come to destroy, but to fulfill." (Matt. 5: 17.) On that point, therefore, this single passage is perfectly conclusive.

It is said by some, however, that the great principle of the Gospel, love to God and love to man, necessarily involved the condemnation of slavery. Yet how should it have any such result, when we remember that this was no new principle, but, on the contrary, was laid down by the Deity to his own chosen people, and was quoted from the Old Testament by the Saviour himself? And why should slavery be thought inconsistent with it? In the relation of master and slave, we are assured by our Southern brethren that there is incomparably more mutual love than can ever be found between the employer and the hireling. And I can readily believe it, for the very reason that it is a relation for life, and the parties, when rightly disposed, must therefore feel a far stronger and deeper interest in each other.

The next evidence which proves that the Mosaic law was not held to be inconsistent with the Gospel occurs in the statement of the apostles to St. Paul, made some twenty years, at least, after the establishment of the first Christian church in Jerusalem. "Thou seest, brother," said they, "how many thousands of Jews there are who believe, and they are all zealous of the law." (Acts 21: 20.) How could this have been possible, if the law was supposed to be abolished by the new dispensation?

But the precepts and the conduct of St. Paul himself, the great apostle of the Gentiles, are all sufficient, because he meets the very point, and settles the whole question. Thus he saith to the Ephesians: "Servants, (in the original Greek, bond servants or slaves) "be obedient to them that are your masters, according to the flesh, with fear and trembling, in singleness of your hearts, as unto Christ. Not with eye service, as men-pleasers, but as the servants of Christ, doing the will of God from the heart, with good will doing service, as to the Lord, and not unto men, knowing that whatsoever good thing any man doeth, the same shall he receive of the Lord, whether he be bond or free. And ye masters, do the same things unto them, forbearing threatening, knowing that your Master also is in heaven, neither is there any respect of persons with him." (Eph. 6: 5–9.)

repeats the same commandments. "Servants," (that is, bond servants or slaves) "obey in all things your masters according to the flesh, not with eye service, as men-pleasers, but in singleness of heart, fearing God." (Col. 3 : 22.) "Masters, give unto your servants that which is just and equal, knowing that ye also have a Master in heaven." (Col. 4 : 1.)

Again, the same inspired teacher lays down the law in very strong terms, to Timothy, the first Bishop of Ephesus : "Let as many servants as are under the yoke," (that is, the yoke of bondage,) "count their own masters worthy of all honor, that the name of God and his doctrine be not blasphemed. And they that have believing masters, let them not despise them because they are brethren, but rather do them service because they are faithful and beloved, partakers of the benefit. These things teach and exhort. If any man teach otherwise, and consent not to wholesome words, even the words of our Lord Jesus Christ, and to the doctrine which is according to godliness, he is proud, knowing nothing, but doting about questions and strifes of words, whereof cometh envy, strife, railings, evil surmisings, perverse disputings of men of corrupt minds and destitute of the truth, supposing that gain is godliness. From such withdraw thyself. But godliness with contentment is great gain. For we brought nothing into this world, and it is certain we can carry nothing out. And having food and raiment, let us be therewith content." (1 Tim. 6 : 1–8.)

Lastly, St. Paul, in his Epistle to Philemon, informs him that he had sent back his fugitive slave, whom the apostle had converted to the Christian faith during his imprisonment, asking the master to forgive and receive his penitent disciple. "I beseech thee for my son Onesimus," saith he, "whom I have begotten in my bonds, which in time past was to thee unprofitable, but now profitable to thee and to me, whom I have sent again : thou therefore receive him that is mine own bowels, whom I would have retained with me, that in thy stead he might have ministered unto me in the bonds of the gospel. But without thy mind would I do nothing, that thy benefit should not be as it were of necessity, but willingly. For perhaps he therefore departed for a season, that thou shouldst receive him forever, not now as a servant, but above a servant, a brother beloved, specially to me, but how much more to thee, both in the flesh and in the Lord. If thou countest me therefore a partner, receive him as myself. If he hath wronged thee or oweth thee aught, put that on mine account. I Paul have written it with mine own hand. I will repay it ; albeit I do not say to thee how thou owest unto me thine own soul besides." (Ep. to Philemon 5 : 10, 19.)

The evidence of the New Testament is thus complete, plainly proving that the institution of slavery was not abolished by the Gospel. Compare now the course of the ultra abolitionist with that of Christ and his inspired apostle. The divine Redeemer openly rebukes the sanctimonious Pharisees, "who made void the law of God by their traditions." He spares not the wealthy, infidel Sadducees. He denounces the hypocritical Scribes, who "loved the uppermost rooms at feasts and to be called of men, Rabbi, Rabbi." He calls the royal Herod "that fox," entirely regardless of the king's displeasure. He censures severely the Jewish practice of divorcing their wives for the slightest cause, and vindicates the original sanctity of marriage. He tells the deluded crowd of his enemies that they are "the children of the devil, and that the lusts of their fathers they would do." He makes a scourge of small cords, and drives the buyers and sellers out of the temple. And while he thus rebukes the sins of all around him, and speaks with divine authority, he proclaims himself the special friend and patron of the poor — preaches to them his blessed doctrine, on the mountain, by the seaside, or in the public streets, under the open canopy of heaven — heals their diseases, partakes of their humble fare, and, passing by the rich and the great, chooses his apostles from the ranks of the publicans and the fishermen of Galilee. Yet he lived in the midst of slavery, maintained over the old heathen races, in accordance with the Mosaic law, and uttered not one word against it! What proof can be stronger than this, that he did not regard it as a sin or a moral evil? And what contrast can be more manifest than this example of Christ on the one hand, and the loud and bitter denunciations of our anti-slavery preachers and politicians, calling themselves Christians, on the other? For they not only set themselves against the Word of God in this matter, condemning slavery as the "monster sin," the "sum of all villainies," but—strange to say—they do it in the very name of that Saviour whose whole line of conduct was the very opposite of their own!

Look next at the contrast afforded by the inspired Apostle of the Gentiles. He preaches to the slave, and tells him to be obedient to his master for Christ's sake, faithful and submissive, as a main branch of religious duty. He preaches to the master and tells him to be just and equal to his slave, knowing that HIS Master is in heaven. He finds a fugitive slave, and converts him to the Gospel, and then sends him back again to his old home, with a letter of kind recommendation. Why does St. Paul act thus? Why does he not counsel the fugitive to claim his right to freedom, and defend that right, if necessary, by the strong hand of violence, even unto death? Why does he not write to his disciple, Philemon, and rebuke him for the awful sin of holding a fellow-man in bondage, and charge it upon him, as a solemn duty, to emancipate his slaves, at the peril of his soul.

The answer is very plain. St. Paul was inspired, and knew the will of the Lord Jesus Christ, and was only intent on obeying it. And who are we, that in our modern wisdom presume to set aside the Word of God, and scorn the example of the divine Redeemer, and spurn the preaching and the conduct of the apostles, and invent for ourselves a "higher law" than those holy Scriptures which are given to us as "a light to our feet and a lamp to our paths," in the darkness of a sinful and polluted world? Who are we, that virtually blot out the language of the sacred record, and dictate to the Majesty of heaven what he shall regard as sin, and reward as duty? Whoare we, that are ready to trample on the doctrine of the Bible, and tear to shreds the Constitution of our country, and even plunge the land into the untold horrors of civil war, and yet boldly pray to the God of Israel to bless our very acts of rebellion against his own sovereign authority? Woe to our Union when the blind become the leaders of the blind! Woe to the man who dares to "strive against his Maker!"

Yet I do not mean to charge the numerous and respectable friends of this popular delusion with a willful or conscious opposition to the truth. They are seduced, doubtless, in the great majority of cases, by the feelings of a false philanthropy, which palliates, if it can not excuse, their dangerous error Living far away from the Southern States, with no practical experience of the institution, and accustomed, from their childhood, to attach an inordinate value to their personal liberty, they are naturally disposed to compassionate the negro race, and to believe that the slave must be supremely wretched in his bondage. They are under no special inducement to "search the Scriptures" on this particular subject, nor are they in general, I am sorry to say, accustomed to study the Bible half as much as they read the newspapers, the novel and the magazine. There they find many revolting pictures of slavery, and they do not pause to ask the question whether they are just and faithful. Perhaps a fugitive comes along, who has fled from his master, and who, in justification of himself, will usually give a very distorted statement of the facts, even if he does not invent them altogether. And these good and kind-hearted people believe it all implicitly, without ever remembering the rule about hearing both sides before we form our opinion. Of course, they sympathize warmly with the poor, oppressed African, and are generously excited to hate the system of slavery with all their heart. Then the eloquent preacher chooses it for the favorite topic of his oratory. The theme is well adapted to rouse the feelings, and it is usually by no means difficult to interest and gratify the audience when the supposed sins of others, which they are under no temptation to commit, are made the object of censure. In due time, when the public mind is sufficiently heated, the politician lays hold of the subject, and makes the anti-slavery movement the watchword of party. And finally the Press follows in the wake of the leaders, and the fire is industriously fanned until it becomes a perfect blaze; while the admiring throng surround it with exultation, and fancy its lurid light to be from heaven, until the flames begin to threaten their own security.

Such has been the perilous course of our Northern sentiment on the subject of slavery. The great majority, in every community, are the creatures of habit, of association and of impulse, and every allowance should be made for those errors which are committed in ignorance, under a generous sympathy for what they suppose to be the rights of man. I can not, however, make the same apology for those who are professionally pledged to understand and inculcate the doctrines of the Bible. On that class of our public instructors, the present perilous crisis of the nation casts a fearful responsibility. Solemnly bound by their sacred office to preach the Word of God, and to follow Christ and his apostles, as the heralds of "peace and goodwill to men," they seem to me strangely regardless, on this important subject, of their highest obligations. But it is not for me to judge them. To their own Master, let them stand or fall.

I have promised, however, to notice the various objections which have been raised in the popular mind to the institution of Southern slavery, and to these I shall now proceed.

First on this list stand the propositions of the far famed Declaration of Independence, "that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." These statements are here called "self-evident truths." But with due respect to the celebrated names which are appended to this document, I have never been able to comprehend that they are "truths" at all. In what respect are men "created equal," when every thoughtful person must be sensible that they are brought into the world with all imaginable difference in body, in mind, and in every characteristic of their social position? Notwithstanding mankind have all descended from one common parent, yet we see them divided into distinct races, so strongly marked, that infidel philosophers insist on the impossibility of their having the same ancestry. Where is the equality in body between the child born with the hereditary taint of scrofula or consumption, and the infant filled with health and vigor? Where is the equality in mind between one who is endowed with talent and genius, and another whose intellect borders on idiocy? Where is the equality in social position between the son of the Esquimaux or Hottentot, and the heir of the American statesman or British peer?

Neither am I able to admit that all men are endowed with the unalienable right to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness, because it is manifest that since "sin entered into the world and death by sin," they are all alienated, forfeited and lost, through the consequences of transgression. Life is alienated not only by the sentence of the law, but by innumerable forms of violence and accident. Liberty is alienated not only by imprisonment, but by the irresistible restraints of social bondage to the will, the temper, the prejudices, the customs, or the interests of others; so that there is hardly an individual to be found, even in the most favored community, who has really the liberty of word and action so confidently asserted as the unalienable right of all men. And as regards the "pursuit of happiness," alas! what multitudes alienate their right to it, beyond recovery, not only in the cells of the penitentiary, but in the reckless indulgence of their appetites and passions, in the disgust arising from ill-chosen conjugal relations, in their associations with the profligate and the vile, in the pain and suffering of sickness and poverty as the results of vice, in the ruin of the gambler, the delirium of the drunkard, the despair of the suicide, and in every other form of moral contamination!

If it be said, however, that the equality and unalienable rights of all men, so strongly asserted by this famous Declaration, are only to be taken in a political sense, I am willing to concede that this may be the proper interpretation of its intended meaning, but I can not see how it removes the difficulty. The statement is that "all men are created equal," and that "the CREATOR has endowed them with these unalienable rights." Certainly if the authors of this celebrated document designed to speak only of political rights and political equality, they should not have thus referred them to the act of creation, because it is perfectly obvious that, since the beginning of human government, men have been created with all imaginable inequality, under slavery, under despotism, under aristocracy, under limited monarchy, under every imaginable form of political strife and political oppression. In no respect whatever, that I can discover, has the Almighty sent our race into the world with these imaginary rights, and this fanciful equality. In his sight the whole world is sinful, rebellious, and lying under the just condemnation of his violated laws. Our original rights, whatever they might have been, are all forfeited and gone. And since the fall, mankind have no rights to claim at the hand of the Creator. Our whole dependence is on his mercy and compassion. And he dispenses these according to his sovereign will and pleasure, on no system of equality that any human eye can discover, and yet, as every Christian must believe, on the eternal principles of perfect benevolence, in union with impartial justice, and boundless knowledge, and wisdom that can not err.

Where, then, I ask, did the authors of the Declaration of Independence find their warrant for such a statement? It was probably judicious enough to call their propositions "self-evident truths," because it seems manifest that no man can prove them. To estimate aright the vast diversity among the races of mankind, we may begin with our own, the highly privileged Anglo-Saxon, which now stands at the head, although our ancestors were heathen barbarians only two thousand years ago. From this we may go down the descending scale through the Turks, the Chinese, the Tartars, the Japanese, the Egyptians, the Hindoos, the Indian tribes, the Laplanders, the Abyssinians, the Africans, and how is it possible to imagine that God has made them all equal! As truly might it be said that all the trees of the forest are equal—that all the mountains, and seas, and rivers are equal—that all the beasts of the fields are equal—that all the birds of the air are equal. The facts rather establish the very contrary. The Deity seems to take pleasure in exhibiting a marvelous wealth of power through the rich variety of all his works, so that no two individuals of any species can be found in all respects alike. And hence we behold a grand system of order and GRADATION, from the thrones, dominions, principalities and powers in heavenly places, rank below rank, to man. And then we see the same system throughout our earth displayed in the variety of races, some higher, some lower in the scale—in the variety of governments, from pure despotism to pure democracy—in the variety of privilege and power among the subjects of each government, some being born to commanding authority and influence, while others are destined to submit and obey. Again, we behold the system continued in the animal creation, from the lordly lion down to the timid mole, from the eagle to the humming bird, from the monsters of the deep to the sea-star in its shell. The same plan meets us in the insect tribes. Some swift and powerful, others slow and weak, some marshaled into a regular government—monarchy in the bee-hive, aristocracy in the ant-hill, while others, like the flies, have no government at all. And in perfect harmony with this divine arrangement, the inanimate creation presents us with the same vast variety. The canopy of heaven is studded with orbs of light, all differing in magnitude, all differing in radiance, and all yielding to the sovereign splendor of the sun. The earth is clothed with the most profuse diversity of vegetation, from the lofty palm down to the humble moss. The mineral kingdom shines with gold, silver, iron, copper, and precious stones, in all conceivable forms and colors. From the mammoth cave down to the minutest crystal—from mountains of granite down to the sand upon the shore, all is varied, multiform, unequal, yet each element has its specific use and beauty, and the grand aggregate unites in the sublime hymn of praise to the wisdom, the goodness, and the stupendous resources of that ineffable Power which produced the whole.

This brief and most inadequate sketch of the order of creation may serve at least to show that the manifest inequality in the condition of mankind is no exception to the rule, but is sustained by all analogy. It is the will of God that it should be so, and no human sagacity or effort can prevent it. And the same principle exists in our political relations. We may talk as we please of our equality in political rights and privileges, but in point of fact, there is no such thing. Amongst the other civilized nations it is not even pretended. None of the great galaxy of European governments can have a better title to it than England, yet who would be so absurd as to claim political equality in a land of monarchy, of hereditary nobles, of time-honored aristocracy? The best approach to political equality is confessedly here, and here only. Yet even here, amidst the glories of our universal suffrage, where is it to be found? Political equality, if it means any thing, must mean that every man enjoys the same right to political office and honor; because the polity of any government consists in its system of administration, and hence it results, of necessity, that those who can not possibly be admitted to share in this administration, have no political equality with those who can. We do, indeed, say that the people are sovereign. But every one knows, full well, that the comparative few who are qualified to take the lead, by talent, by education, by natural tact, and by a conjunction of favoring circumstances, are practically sovereigns over the people. The man who carries a hod gives his vote for the candidate. The candidate himself can do no more, so far as it concerns the mere form of election. Are they therefore politically equal? Who formed the party to which the candidate belongs? Who ruled the convention by which his name was put upon the list? Who arranged the orators for the occasion? Who subsidized the Press? Had the poor hodman any share in the operation, any influence, any voice whatever? No more than the hod which he carries. Can any human power ever manufacture a candidate out of him? The notion would be preposterous. Where then is his political equality? Even here, in our happy land of universal suffrage, how does it appear that "all men are born equal"? The proposition is a sheer absurdity. All men are born unequal, in body, in mind, and social privileges. Their intellectual faculties are unequal. Their education is unequal. Their associations are unequal. Their opportunities are unequal. And their freedom is as unreal as their equality. The poor are compelled to serve the rich, and the rich are compelled to serve the poor by paying for their services. The political party is compelled to serve the leaders, and the leaders are compelled to scheme and toil, in order to serve the party. The multitude are dependent on the few who are endowed with talents to govern. And the few are dependent on the multitude for the power, without which all government is impossible. From the top to the bottom of the social fabric, the whole is thus seen to be inequality and mutual dependence. And hence, although they are free from that special kind of slavery which the Southern States maintain over the posterity of Ham, yet they are all, from the highest to the lowest, in bondage quite as real, from which they can not escape—the slavery of circumstances, called, in the ordinary language of the world, NECESSITY.

I have been, I fear, unreasonably tedious in thus endeavoring to show why I utterly discard these famous propositions of the Declaration of Independence. It is because I am aware of the strong hold which they have gained over the ordinary mind of the nation. They are assumed by thousands upon thousands, as if they were the very doctrines of divine truth. And they are made the basis of the hostile feeling against the slavery of the South, notwithstanding their total want of rationality. Yet I do not wonder that such maxims should be popular. They are admirably calculated to gratify the pride and ambition so natural to the human heart, and are therefore powerful incentives in the work of political revolution. It was for this purpose, I presume, that they were introduced in that famous document, which publicly cast off the allegiance of the colonies to the British crown. And the same doctrines were proclaimed a few years later, in a similar service, by the French Directory, in the midst of a far more terrible revolution. Liberty, equality, and fraternity—THE RIGHTS OF MAN, were then the watchwords of the excited populace, while their insane leaders published the decree of Atheism, and a notorious courtesan was enthroned as the goddess of reason, and the guillotine daily massacred the victims of democratic fury, till the streets of Paris ran with blood.

I do not state this fact because I desire to place the revolutions in the Colonies and in France on the same foundation, with respect to the spirit or the mode in which they were conducted. God forbid that I should forget the marked features of contrast between them! On the one side, there was religious reverence, strong piety, and pure disinterested patriotism. On the other, there was the madness of atheism, the brutality of ruffianism, and the "reign of terror" to all that was good and true. In no one mark or character, indeed, could I deem tha there was any comparison between them, save in this: that the same false assumption of human equality and human rights was adopted in both. Yet how widely different was their result on the question of negro slavery! The American revolution produced no effect whatever on that institution; while the French revolution roused the slaves of their colony in St. Domingo to a general insurrection, and a scene of barbarous and cruel butchery succeeded, to which the history of the world contains no parallel.

This brings me to the last remarks which I have to present on this famous Declaration. And I respectfully ask my readers to consider them maturely.

First, then, it seems manifest, that when the signers of this document assumed that "all men were born equal," they did not take the negro race into account at all. It is unquestionable that the author, Mr. Jefferson, was a slaveholder at the time, and continued so to his life's end. It is certain that the great majority of the other signers of the Declaration were slaveholders likewise. No one can be ignorant of the fact that slavery had been introduced into all the colonies long before, and continued to exist long after, in every State save one. Surely then, it can not be presumed that these able and sagacious men intended to stultify themselves by declaring that the negro race had rights, which nevertheless they were not ready to give them. And yet it is evident, that we must either impute this crying injustice to our revolutionary patriots, or suppose that the case of the slaves was not contemplated.

Nor is this a solitary example, for we have a complete parallel to it in the preamble to the Constitution, where the important phrase, "We, the people of the United States," must be understood with the very same limitation. Who were the people? Undoubtedly the free citizens who voted for the Constitution. Were the slaves counted as a part of that people? By no means. The negro race had no voice, no vote, no influence whatever in the matter. Thus, therefore, it seems perfectly plain that both these instruments must be understood according to the same rule of interpretation. The slaves were not included in the Declaration of Independence, for the same reason precisely that they were not included amongst the "people" who adopted the Constitution of the United States.

Now it is the established maxim of the law, that every written document must be understood according to the true intent of the parties when it was executed. The language employed may be such that it admits of a different sense; but there can be only one just interpretation, and that is fixed unalterably by the apparent meaning of its authors at the time. On this ground alone, therefore, I respectfully contend that the Declaration of Independence has no claim whatever to be considered in the controversy of our day. I have stated, at some length, my reasons for rejecting its famous propositions, as being totally fallacious and untenable. But even if they were ever so "self-evident," or capable of the most rigid demonstration, the rule of law utterly forbids us to appeal to them in a sense which they were not designed to bear.

In the second place, however, it should be remembered that the Declaration of Independence, whether true or false, whether it be interpreted legally or illegally, forms no part of our present system. As a great historical document, it stands, and must ever stand, prominent before the nations of the world. But it was put forth more than seven years anterior to the Constitution. Its language was not adopted in that Constitution, and it has no place whatever in the obligatory law of the United States. When our orators, our preachers, and our politicians, therefore, take its propositions about human rights and human equality, and set them up as the supreme law, overruling the Constitution and the acts of Congress, which are the real law of the land, I can not wonder enough at the absurdity of the proceeding. And I doubt whether the annals of civilized mankind can furnish a stronger instance of unmitigated perversity.

Thirdly, and lastly, I am utterly opposed to those popular propositions, not only because I hold them to be altogether fallacious and untrue, for the reasons already given, but further, because their tendency is in direct contrariety to the precepts of the Gospel, and the highest interests of the individual man. For what is the unavoidable effect of this doctrine of human equality? Is it not to nourish the spirit of pride, envy, and contention? To set the servant against the master, the poor against the rich, the weak against the strong, the ignorant against the educated? To loosen all the bonds and relations of society, and reduce the whole duty of subordination to the selfish cupidity of pecuniary interest, without an atom of respect for age, for office, for law, for government, for Providence, or for the word of God?

I do not deny, indeed, that this doctrine of equality is a doctrine of immense power to urge men forward in a constant struggle for advancement. Its natural operation is to force the vast majority into a ceaseless contest with their circumstances, each discontented with his lot, so long as he sees any one else above him, and toiling with unceasing effort to rise upon the social scale of wealth and importance, as fast and as far as he can. There is no principle of stronger impulse to stimulate ambition in every department. And hence arises its manifold influence on the business, the enterprise, the commerce, the manufactures, the agriculture, the amusements, the fashions and the political strifes of our Northern people, making them all restless, all aspiring, and all determined, if possible, to pass their rivals in the race of selfish emulation.

But how does it operate on the order, the stability, and the ultimate prosperity of the nation? How does it work on the steadfast administration of justice, the honor and purity of our public officers, the quiet subordination of the various classes in the community, the fidelity and submission of domestics, the obedience of children, and the relations of family and home? Above all, how does it harmonize with the great doctrines of the Bible, that the Almighty Ruler appoints to every man his lot on earth, and commands him to be satisfied and thankful for his portion — that we must submit ourselves to those who have the rule over us — that we should obey the laws and honor the magistrates — that the powers that be are ordained of God, and he that resisteth the power shall receive condemnation — that we may not covet the property of others — that having food and raiment, we should be therewith content — that we must avoid strife, contention and railing accusations, and follow peace, charity, and good will, remembering that the service of Christ is the only perfect freedom, and that our true happiness depends not on the measure of our earthly wealth, on social equality, on honor, or on our relative position in the community, but on the fulfillment of our personal duty according to our lot, in reliance on His blessing?

I have no more to add, with respect to this most popular dogma of human equality, and shall therefore dismiss it, as fallacious in itself, and only mischievous in its tendency. As it is the stronghold of the ultra-abolitionist, I have devoted a large space to its examination, and trust that the conclusion is sufficiently plain. Happily it forms no part of our Constitution or our laws. It never was intended to apply to the question of negro slavery. And it never can be so applied without a total perversion of its historical meaning, and an absolute contrariety to all the facts of humanity, and the clear instruction of the Word of God.

The next objection to the Slavery of the Southern States, is its presumed cruelty, because the refractory slave is punished with corporal correction. But our Northern law allows the same in the case of children and apprentices. Such was the established system in the army and the navy, until very lately. The whipping-post was a fixed institution in England and Massachusetts, and its discipline was administered even to free citizens during the last century. Stripes, not exceeding forty, were appointed to offenders in Israel by divine authority. The Saviour himself used a scourge of small cords when he drove the money-changers from the temple. Are our modern philanthropists more merciful than Christ, and wiser than the Almighty?

But it is said that the poor slaves are treated with barbarity, and doubtless it may sometimes be true, just as soldiers and sailors, and even wives and children, are shamefully abused amongst ourselves, in many instances. It is evident, however, that the system of slavery can not be specially liable to reproach on this score, because every motive of interest as well as moral duty must be opposed to it. The owner of the horse and the ox rarely treats his brutes with severity. Why should he? The animals are his property, and he knows that they must be kindly and carefully used, if he would derive advantage from their labor. Much more must the master of the slave be expected to treat him with all fairness and affection, because here there are human feelings to be influenced, and if the servant be not contented and attached, not only will he work unwillingly, but he may be converted into an enemy and an avenger. When the master is a Christian, the principles of the Gospel, as laid down by St. Paul, will operate, of course, in favor of the slave. But even when these are wanting, the motives of interest and prudence remain. And hence I can not doubt that the examples of barbarity must be exceedingly few, and ought to be regarded, not as the general rule, but as the rare exceptions. On the whole, indeed, I see no reason to deny the statement of our Southern friends, that their slaves are the happiest laborers in the world. Their wants are all provided for by their master. Their families are sure of a home and maintenance for life. In sickness they are kindly nursed. In old age they are affectionately supported. They are relieved from all anxiety for the future. Their religious privileges are generously accorded to them. Their work is light. Their holidays are numerous. And hence the strong affection which they usually manifest toward their master, and the earnest longing which many, who were persuaded to become fugitives, have been known to express, that they might be able to return.

The third objection is, that slavery must be a sin, because it leads to immorality. But where is the evidence of this? I dispute not against the probability and even the certainty that there are instances of licentiousness enough among slaveholders, just as there are amongst those who vilify them. It would be a difficult, if not an impossible task, however, to prove that there is more immorality amongst the slaves themselves, than exists amongst the lower class of freemen. In Sabbath-breaking, profane cursing and swearing, gambling, drunkenness and quarreling — in brutal abuse of wives and children, in rowdyism and obscenity, in the vilest excesses of shameless prostitution — to say nothing of organized bands of counterfeiters, thieves and burglars — I doubt whether there are not more offenses against Christian morality committed in the single city of New-York than can be found amongst the slave population of all the fifteen States together. The fact would rather seem to be that the wholesome restraints of slavery, as a general rule, must be, to a great extent, an effectual check upon the worst kinds of immorality. And therefore this charge, so often brought against it, stands entirely unsupported either by positive proof or by rational probability.

The fourth objection is advanced by a multitude of excellent people, who are shocked at the institution of slavery, because it involves the principle of property in man. Yet I have never been able to understand what it is that so disgusts them. No slaveholder pretends that this property extends any farther than the right to the labor of the slave. It is obvious to the slightest reflection that slavery can not bind the intellect or the soul. These, which properly constitute the MAN, are free, in their own nature, from all human restraint. But to have a property in human labor, under some form, is an essential element in all the work of civilized society. The toil of one is pledged for the service of another in every rank of life; and to the extent thus pledged, both parties have a property in each other. The parent especially has an established property in the labor of his child to the age of twenty-one, and has the further power of transferring this property to another, by articles of apprenticeship. But this, it may be said, ends when the child is of age. True; because the law presumes him to be then fitted for freedom. Suppose, however, that he belonged to an inferior race which the law did not presume to be fitted for freedom at any age, what good reason could be assigned against the continuance of the property? Such, under the rule of the Scriptures and the Constitution of the United States, is the case of the negro. God, in his wisdom and providence, caused the patriarch Noah to predict that he should be the servant of servants to the posterity of Japhet. And the same almighty Ruler, who alone possesses the power, has wonderfully adapted the race to their condition. For every candid observer agrees that the negro is happier and better as a slave than as a free man, and no individual belonging to the Anglo-Saxon stock would acknowledge that the intellect of the negro is equal to his own.

There have been philosophers and physiologists who contended that the African race were not strictly entitled to be called men at all, but were a sort of intermediate link between the baboon and the human being. And this notion is still maintained by some at the present day. For myself, however, I can only say that I repudiate the doctrine with my whole heart. The Scriptures show me that the negro, like all other races, descends from Noah, and I hold him to be a MAN AND A BROTHER. But though he be my brother, it does not follow that he is my equal. Equality can not be found on earth between the brothers even in one little family. In the same house, one brother usually obtains a mastery over the rest, and sometimes rules them with a perfect despotism. In England, the elder brother inherits the estate, and the younger brothers take a lower rank, by the slavery of circumstances. The eldest son of the royal family is in due time the king, and his brothers forthwith become his subjects. Why should not the same principle obtain in the races of mankind, if the Almighty has so willed it? The Anglo-Saxon race is king, why should not the African race be subject, and subject in that way for which it is best adapted, and in which it may be more safe, more useful, and more happy than in any other which has yet been opened to it, in the annals of the world?

I know that there may be exceptions, now and then, to this intellectual inferiority of the negro race, though I believe it would be very difficult to find one, unless the intermixture of superior blood has operated to change the mental constitution of the individual. For all such cases the master may provide by voluntary emancipation, and it is notorious that this emancipation has been cheerfully given in thousands upon thousands of instances, in the majority of which the gift of liberty has failed to benefit the negro, and has, on the contrary, sunk him far lower, in his social position. But no reflecting man can believe that the great mass of the slaves, amounting to nearly four millions, are qualified for freedom. And therefore it is incomparably better for them to remain under the government of their masters, who are likely to provide for them so much more beneficially than they could provide for themselves.

The difference then, between the power of the Northern parent and the Southern slaveholder, is reduced to this, namely, that the master has a property in the labor of his slave for life, instead of having it only to the age of twenty-one, because the law regards the negro as being always a child in understanding, requiring a superior mind to govern and direct him. But, on the other hand, the slave has just as really a property for life in his master's support and protection, and this property is secured to him by the same law, in sickness and in health, in the helplessness of old age, as well as in the days of youthful vigor, including, besides, a comfortable maintenance for his wife and family. Can any rational judgment devise a fairer equivalent?

The fifth objection, which often meets the Northern ear, proceeds from the overweening value attached, in our age and country, to the name of liberty, since it is common to call it the dearest right of man, and to esteem its loss as the greatest possible calamity. Hence we frequently find persons who imagine that the whole argument is triumphantly settled by the question: "How would you like to be a slave?"

In answer to this very puerile interrogatory, I should say that whether any condition in life is to be regarded as a loss or an advantage, depends entirely on circumstances. Suppose, for example, that the Mayor of New-York should ask one of its merchant princes: "How would you like to be a policeman?" I doubt whether the question might not be taken for an insult, and some words of indignation would probably be uttered in reply. But suppose that the same question were addressed to an Irish laborer, with what feelings would he receive it? Assuredly with those of gratitude and pleasure. The reason of the difference is obvious, because the employment which would be a degradation to the one, offers promotion and dignity to the other. In like manner, slavery, to an individual of the Anglo-Saxon race, which occupies so high a rank in human estimation, would be a debasement not to be thought of with patience for a moment. And yet, to the Guinea negro, sunk in heathen barbarism, it would be a happy change to place him in the hands of a Southern master. Even now, although the slaves have no idea of the pagan abominations from which their forefathers were taken, it is notorious that they usually value their privileges as being far superior to the condition of the free negroes around them, and prefer the certainty of protection and support for life to the hazards of the liberty on which the abolitionist advises them to venture. How much more would they prize their present lot, if they understood that, were it not for this very institution of slavery, they would be existing in the darkest idolatry and licentiousness among the savages of Africa, under the despotic King of Dahomey, destitute of every security for earthly comfort, and deprived of all religious hope for the world to come!

If men would reflect maturely on the subject, they would soon be convinced that liberty is a blessing to those, and only those, who are able to use it wisely. There are thousands in our land, free according to law, but so enslaved to vice and the misery consequent on vice, that it would be a mercy to place them, supposing it were possible, under the rule of some other will, stronger and better than their own. As it is, they are in bondage to Satan, notwithstanding their imaginary freedom; and they do his bidding, not merely in the work of the body, but in the far worse slavery of the soul. Strictly speaking, however, the freest man on earth has no absolute liberty, for this belongs alone to God, and is not given to any creature. And hence it is the glory of the Christian to be the bond servant of the divine Redeemer who "bought us to himself with his own precious blood." The service of CHRIST, as saith the Apostle, is "the only perfect freedom." All who refuse that service, are slaves of necessity to other masters; slaves to Mammon; slaves to ambition; slaves to lust; slaves to intemperance; slaves to a thousand forms of anxious care and perplexity; slaves at best to pride and worldly decorum, and slaves to circumstances over which they have no control. And they are compelled to labor without ceasing under some or all of these despotic rulers, at the secret will of that spiritual task-master, whose bondage does not end at death, but continues to eternity.

The sixth objection arises from the fact that slavery separates the husband from the wife and the parents from the children. Undoubtedly it sometimes does so, from necessity. Before we adopt this fact, however, as an argument against slavery, it is only fair to inquire whether the same separation do not take place, perhaps quite as frequently, amongst those who call themselves free. The laboring man who has a large family is always obliged to separate from his children, because it is impossible to support them in his humble home. They are sent to service, therefore, one to this master and another to that, or bound as apprentices, as the case may be, and thus the domestic relations are superseded by strangers, for the most part beyond recovery. So among the lower orders, the husbands are separated from their wives by the same necessity. How many, even of the better classes, have left their homes to seek their fortune in the gold regions! How many in Europe have abandoned their families for Australia, or the United States, or the Canadas! How many desert them from pure wickedness — a crime which can hardly happen under the Southern system! But above all, how constantly does this separation take place amongst our soldiers and sailors, so that neither war nor foreign commerce could be carried on at all without it! All these are borne by freemen, under the slavery of circumstances. Is it wise to declaim against this necessity in one form, when we are forced to submit to it in so many other kinds of the same infliction?

There is only one other argument which occurs to me, requiring notice, and that is based upon the erroneous notion that the laws of God, under the Mosaic dispensation, allowed polygamy as well as slavery; and, therefore, it is inferred that the legislation of the Old Testament is of no authority upon the subject, but as the Gospel did away the first, so also it should do away the other.

The facts here are misunderstood, and the inference is without any real foundation. Let us look at the matter as it is explained by the Saviour himself. "The Pharisees came to him, tempting him, and saying unto him: Is it lawful for a man to put away his wife for every cause? And he answered and said unto them: Have ye not read that he which made them at the beginning made them male and female; and said, for this cause shall a man leave father and mother and shall cleave to his wife, and they twain shall be one flesh? Wherefore they are more twain, but one flesh. What therefore, God hath joined together let no man put asunder. They say unto him: Why did Moses then command to give a writing of divorcement, and put her away? He saith unto them: Moses, because of the hardness of your hearts, suffered you to put away your wives, but from the beginning it was not so. And I say unto you, Whosoever shall put away his wife, except it be for fornication, and shall marry another, committeth adultery, and whoso marrieth her that is put away, doth commit adultery." (Matt. 19: 3–9.)

Now, here our Lord plainly lays down the original law of marriage, referring expressly to Adam and Eve, one man and one woman, declared to be one flesh, and adding the command, What God hath joined together let no man put asunder. But it is evident that polygamy must, of necessity, interfere with this divine union. The twain can no longer be one flesh, when another wife is brought between them, because the new wife must deprive the former one of her exclusive rights and privileges, and the husband destroys the very unity which God designed in joining them together. The doctrine of our Saviour, therefore, restores the law of marriage to its original sanctity, and the apostles, accordingly, always speak of the wife in the singular number, in no instance appearing to contemplate the possibility of the Christian having more wives than one, while, in the case of a bishop, St. Paul specifies it as an essential condition that he shall be "the husband of one wife." (1 Tim. 3 : 2.)

But how had the chosen people been allowed for so many centuries to practice polygamy, and divorce their wives for the slightest cause? Our Lord explains it by saying that Moses suffered them to put away their wives "because of the hardness of their hearts." The special questions addressed to him by the Pharisees, did not, indeed, refer to polygamy, but only to the liberty of divorce, for at that time it should seem that the practice of polygamy had well nigh ceased in Judea, and it is certainly not countenanced by the Jewish laws at this day. The principle, however, is precisely the same in the two cases. Dissatisfaction with the present wife and desire for another, were the cause of action in both; and when the husband did not wish to be burdened by the murmurs or the support of his old companion, he would naturally prefer to send her away, in order to make room for her successor. We see, then, how readily this facility of divorce became the mode in which the Jews of that day sought for the gratification of their capricious attachments, instead of the more expensive and troublesome system of polygamy. And hence our Lord applied the remedy, where it was specially required, by forbidding divorces unless for the weightiest cause, such as adultery. Yet this was no change in the divine arrangement, which had been the same from the beginning. He expressly declares, on the contrary, that the latitude assumed by the Israelites was an indulgence granted by Moses, on account of "the hardness of their hearts." And this is a very different thing from an authoritative decree of the Almighty.

It is surely therefore manifest, from this language of our Saviour, that God had never given any direct sanction to polygamy. Doubtless, as we must infer from many parts of the Old Testament, it had become common among the Israelites, who, supposing themselves justified by the case of Jacob, had probably adopted it in so many instances that Moses did not think it safe or prudent to put it down, lest worse evils might follow, unless he was constrained to do so by the positive command of the Almighty. All that can be truly stated, therefore, is, that no such positive command was given, and the Deity left the human law-giver to use his own discretion in the matter.

Such is the aspect of this question, according to the statement of our Lord, which must be conclusive to every Christian. And hence we may perceive, at once, that the case is in no respect parallel to that of slavery. For here the Almighty caused his favored servant Noah to predict that the posterity of Ham should be the servants of servants, under the descendants of Shem and Japhet. He recognized the bondman and the bondmaid in the ten commandments. He laid down the positive law to Israel that they should buy the children of the heathen that were round about them, and of the strangers who dwelt in their land, to serve them and their families forever. The Saviour, when he appeared, made no allusion to the subject, but plainly declared that he had not come to destroy the law. The first church of believers in Jerusalem were all "zealous" for the law. And St. Paul preached obedience to the slaves among the Gentile churches, and sent a converted slave back to his Christian master.

Where, then, is the resemblance between these cases? In the matter of divorce and polygamy, the Deity is silent, leaving them to the discretion of Moses, until the Messiah should come. But in regard to the slavery of Ham's posterity, he issues his commands distinctly. And the Saviour disclaims the intention to repeal the laws of his heavenly Father, while he asserts the original design of marriage, and his inspired Apostle gives express sanction to slavery, and speaks of the one husband and the one wife, in direct accordance with the word of his divine Master. Here, therefore, it is plain that the cases are altogether unlike, and present a contrast, rather than a comparison.

We know that the doctrine of the primitive church was in harmony with this, for polygamy was never permitted, nor divorces for trifling causes, while slavery was allowed, as being perfectly lawful, so long as the slave was treated with justice and kindness. The ancient canons sometimes advert to the mode in which slaves might be corrected. Bishops and clergy held slaves. In later times, bondmen and bondmaids were in the service of convents and monasteries. And no scruple was entertained upon the subject until the close of the last century, when the new light burst forth which now dazzles the eyes of so many worthy people, and blinds them not only to the plain statements of Scriptures, but to the interests of national unity and peace.

Thus, then, I have examined the various topics embraced in your inquiry, and the conclusion which I have been compelled to adopt must be sufficiently manifest. The slavery of the negro race, as maintained in the Southern States, appears to me fully authorized both in the Old and the New Testament, which, as the written Word of God, afford the only infallible standard of moral rights and obligations. That very slavery, in my humble judgment, has raised the negro incomparably higher in the scale of humanity, and seems, in fact, to be the only instrumentality through which the heathen posterity of Ham have been raised at all. Out of that slavery has arisen the interesting colony of Liberia, planted by slaveholders, to be a place of refuge for their emancipated bondmen, and destined, as I hope, to be a rich benefit, in its future growth and influence, to Africa and to the world. I do not forget, and I trust that I do not undervalue, the missionary work of England and our own land, in that benighted continent. But I believe that the number of negroes Christianized and civilized at the South, through the system of slavery, exceeds the product of those missionary labors, in a proportion of thousands to one. And thus the wisdom and goodness of God are vindicated in the sanction which his word has given, and the sentence originally pronounced on Canaan as a curse has been converted into a blessing.

I have now gone over the whole ground covered by your kind application, and would only here repeat that on the question of slavery, which lies at the root of all our present difficulties, I have obeyed the rule of conscience and of duty, in opposition to my habits, my prejudices, and my sympathies, all of which would tend strongly to the other side. I need hardly say that I am no politician. More than forty years have elapsed since I ceased even to attend the polls. But as a Christian, I am bound to accept the doctrine of the apostles for my guide. And as a citizen, I am bound to sustain the Constitution of the United States, and defend those principles of law, and order, and friendly comity, which every State should faithfully regard in its relations to the rest. Nor is this the first time that I have expressed my opinions. In a lecture at Buffalo, published in 1850, and again in a volume entitled The American Citizen, printed by Pudney & Russell, in 1857, I set forth the same views on the subject of slavery; adding, however, a plan for its gradual abolition, whenever the South should consent, and the whole strength of the Government could aid in its accomplishment. Sooner or later, I believe that some measure of that character must be adopted. But it belongs to the slave States themselves to take the lead in such a movement. And meanwhile, their legal rights and their natural feelings must be respected, if we would hope for unity and peace.

In conclusion, I would only say, that I am perfectly aware how distasteful my sentiments must be, on this very serious question, to the great majority of my respected fellow-citizens, in the region where divine Providence has cast my lot. It would assuredly be far more agreeable if I could conscientiously conform to the opinions of my friends, to whose ability, sincerity, and zeal I am ready to give all just commendation. But it would be mere moral cowardice in me to suppress what I believe to be the truth, for the sake of popularity. It can not be long before I shall stand at the tribunal of that Almighty and unerring Judge, who has given us the inspired Scriptures to be our supreme directory in every moral and religious duty. My gray hairs admonish me that I may soon be called to give an account of my stewardship. And I have no fear of the sentence which He will pronounce upon an honest though humble effort to sustain the authority of His Word, in just alliance with the Constitution, the peace, and the public welfare of my country.

With the fervent prayer that the Spirit of Wisdom, unity, and fraternal kindness may guide our National Congress, the Legislatures of the several States, and the sovereign will of our whole people, to a happy accommodation of every existing difficulty,

I remain, with great regard,

Your faithful servant in Christ,

JOHN H. HOPKINS,

Bishop of the Diocese of Vermont.

SPEECH OF MR. PUGH

TO 50,000 VOTERS,

WHO NOMINATED VALLANDIGHAM,

AND RESOLVED TO ELECT HIM

GOVERNOR OF OHIO.

Henry Laurens was President of the Continental Congress in 1779. In 1780 he was sent as Minister to Holland. On his way he was captured, and imprisoned in the Tower of London for fourteen months. When Lord Shelburne became Premier, Laurens was brought up, on Habeas Corpus, and released. After his release, he was treated with great kindness and respect by the British authorities. He dined with Lord Shelburne. After dinner, the conversation turned on the separation of the two countries. Lord Shelburne remarked:

"I AM SORRY FOR YOUR PEOPLE." "WHY SO?" ASKED LAURENS. "THEY WILL LOSE THE HABEAS CORPUS," WAS THE REPLY. "LOSE THE HABEAS CORPUS!" SAID LAURENS. "YES," SAID LORD SHELBURNE. "WE PURCHASED IT WITH CENTURIES OF WRANGLING, MANY YEARS OF FIGHTING, AND HAD IT CONFIRMED BY AT LEAST FIFTY ACTS OF PARLIAMENT. ALL THIS TAUGHT THE NATION ITS VALUE; AND IT IS SO INGRAINED INTO THEIR CREED, AS THE VERY FOUNDATION OF THEIR LIBERTY, THAT NO MAN OR PARTY WILL EVER DARE TRAMPLE ON IT. YOUR PEOPLE WILL PICK IT UP, AND ATTEMPT TO USE IT; BUT, HAVING COST THEM NOTHING, THEY WILL NOT KNOW HOW TO APPRECIATE IT. AT THE FIRST GREAT INTERNAL FEUD THAT YOU HAVE, THE MAJORITY WILL TRAMPLE UPON IT, AND THE PEOPLE WILL PERMIT IT TO BE DONE, AND SO WILL GO YOUR LIBERTY!"

SPEECH OF MR. PUGH.

Fellow-Citizens: For some weeks, and until the execution of his sentence of banishment, I discharged the duty of counsel to the gentleman you have just nominated for Governor of Ohio. I did not agree with him, and do not now agree, as to some questions of policy or expediency connected with the civil war in which we are engaged; I have not thought it possible to conclude terms of peace by which our difference with the people of the Southern States could be reconciled or satisfactorily adjusted; but I regard the alternative of war or peace as the highest problem of statesmanship—a problem which can not be solved wisely, or even understandingly, without absolute freedom in its discussion. Not only as partisans, therefore, but as citizens, we need and must insist upon liberty of speech. That liberty has been denied to Clement L. Vallandigham; for attempting to exercise what was, in the circumstances, my right as well as his own, he has been ruthlessly seized, imprisoned, and, at length, forced into exile. His right, I say, was your right and mine; his injury is our injury; the outrage committed on him was and is an outrage committed on every one of us. I implore you thus to regard it. ("We do!" "we do!")

I exhort you to make his cause—the cause of a brave, honest, persecuted, heroic man—your cause also. ("We will!" "We will!") In the many hours during which it was my duty to be with him, and to consult of the probabilities of his fate, I never saw his cheek blanch nor his eye quail; I never knew him to swerve for one instant from a resolution to maintain, so far as it depended on him, that essential doctrine of all free governments, the right of every citizen to express his opinion respecting public affairs, without hindrance or fear of military dictation. (Cheers.)

The question of prosecuting this war, or concluding peace, can not be decided intelligently until the people have heard both sides. I am not prepared, for one, to say whether war or peace. ("Peace!" "Peace!") You may be wiser than I am; but I never will undertake to decide a question of that magnitude without hearing it fully discussed. And as to any idea of public discussion, or of exercising any right as freemen, while under the dominion of martial law—while General Burnside's Order No. 38 can be enforced upon us—that is utterly ridiculous. I know not the character of the resolutions to be brought before the Convention; but if my advice should be taken, they will be very short, and simple, and to this effect: That we can decide no question of war or peace until we have regained our liberty. The right of the people to debate the affairs of their government, is paramount in importance to all other questions. If Mr. Vallandigham can satisfy me that tendering an armistice to the Confederate States will result in terms of honorable peace—in terms by which the union of the North and the South may be restored—I am ready to join him with heart and with hand; but how can I pronounce any opinion until I have heard his argument and his presentation of facts and circumstances? Therefore, when the President or any military officer, general or corporal, declares that Mr. Vallandigham shall not speak—shall not tell me what he knows, or what he thinks best for the interest of the repub dic—I say, at once, it is farcical to pretend that we live under a free government.

The Democratic party of the North is not responsible for this unhappy division and this most disastrous war. Our adversaries of the Republican party, now in office, are responsible. I know that slaves and suppliants, pretending once to have been with us, give themselves to the task of asserting that the South would not accept any reasonable terms of compromise; but I know, upon the other hand, that war might have been avoided—that all difficulties might have been adjusted—that the Union might have been maintained in its original integrity—had not Abraham Lincoln and the leaders of the Republican party refused—constantly, persistently, stubbornly refused—any terms whatsoever. It is no matter of opinion with me; for I was a member of Congress at that time, and familiar with the transactions of which I speak. Mr. Lincoln and his supporters were entreated, earnestly entreated, as well as warned, not to launch this country into the vortex of civil war; but they scorned all entreaties and laughed at all advice, distinctly declaring that they could and would maintain the Union by virtue of the sword alone. They challenged that responsibility—not with doubt or even hesitation, but with supreme complacency, and with the utmost confidence in themselves. For one, therefore, I hold them to the responsibility so challenged and assumed; and I will not do, as I have not done, any act, nor utter any word, to release them from it. They have had their own way, and without opposition. No man at the North has resisted them, or thwarted them, or staid them in any manner. They have had money and men, whenever, and as largely as they demanded; they have controlled the State government as well as the Federal government; and here, in the midst of a third campaign, after infinite sorrow, and misery, and shame—while carnage fills the air, and rivers roll with blood—when mourning dwells in every homestead, and desolation stalks on every highway—they call for new hundreds of thousands of men, and for incalculable millions of treasure. These, also, they must have, and will have; I could not prevent them if I would, and inasmuch as war exists—whether properly or improperly commenced—I would not if I could. But when they fail at last, as fail they will, let them not approach us with any excuse for their failure, or any plea with which to put off responsibility and punishment. I say that they will fail: whatever the Democratic party might have done, in similar circumstances, it is now obvious that the leaders of the Republican party can succeed in nothing but mischief and ruin. They are incapable of conducting war; they are equally incapable of concluding an honorable peace. (Applause.) Nevertheless, the Republican party is now in administration; it is entitled to exercise the authority of the Federal government; and, whilst I hold its leaders responsible for what they have done, and may do, I will submit, as patiently as possible, to every exaction which they have a constitutional right to impose.

But I will not submit to the exercise of arbitrary, absolute, and unlimited power. They have no right to that; and their exercise of it ought to be opposed, and, if need be, resisted. The Northern Democracy have submitted, and submitted tamely; they have experienced, in the past two years, more flagrant tyranny than the people of any nation in Europe would have tolerated. But there is a limit of all human endurance. If our political opponents continue to declare and maintain martial law, as they call it, in the States where no rebellion has existed—if we, in Ohio, are henceforth to hold our property, our lives, and the security of our families at the whim of General Burnside, or of any other officer—it is high time for us to attend another convention than this—a convention which never will adjourn until our liberties are achieved and our constitutional rights thoroughly vindicated. (Tremendous applause.) I say this in full view of General Burnside's Order No. 38. Man dies but once; and life is a debt which all must repay at some time. It matters not whether in the agony of battle, or by reason of the mock-trial and sentence of a military commission; the debt is gloriously paid by death whenever and wherever that death is in the cause of liberty. I scorn your Order No. 38. (Cheers.) I execrate, I trample under foot, the decree of any military officer extending the crime of treason, or proscribing freedom of speech. (Renewed applause.) Come what may—come death, or exile, or imprisonment; or hard labor, or even stripes—I defy General Order No. 38. (Immense applause.) We are not—we can not be — so abject as to yield our liberty, without a struggle, at the dictation of any man, President, General, corporal, or civilian. (Cheers.)

If you submit you deserve to be slaves. ("Yes!" "Yes!" "We will never submit!" Great excitement, which did not subside for several minutes.)

I may not agree with Mr. Vallandigham in all his opinions respecting the prosecution or the conclusion of this war, so unhappily and needlessly begun; but I will maintain his right to express those opinions, whether I agree or not—maintain it as my own right. I exhort you, fellow-citizens, to postpone every other question, and to think of nothing else, until you have secured liberty of speech. I will utter my sentiments respecting public affairs—utter them, if that be necessary, at the cost or the hazard of my life. God grant me the courage, at least, with Cato, as not to live a slave, to die a freeman!

I implore you, my Democratic friends, to put aside all other engagements, and devote yourselves to this great question.

Let this be your business, and all your business, until the second Tuesday in October next! Don't hallo to-day and repent to-morrow. Say it, and mean it! Let each man take counsel in his own heart, and then come to the resolution that arbitrary arrests and imprisonments shall be stopped—peaceably if possible, but stopped at all events! (Applause.) The best security to a people for their liberty, is the conviction that they will defend it. That induces a general to think; yes, think before he undertakes to trifle with it. Some man must make the issue for us, in Ohio, upon this subject of arbitrary arrests. It may be your lot, Mr. President, or it may be mine. If mine, God help me! I will abide the consequences. ("We'll stand by you.) If we had an honest man in the Governor's office, to-day, our rights would be intact; but, instead of such a man, we have one who glories in licking the very dust at the feet of Presidential domination. We have no Governor in truth; we have only a being. (Groans for Tod.) And yet this renegade had the audacity to say, in Cincinnati, that he would return to the Democratic party, at the end of the war, and would, in our State Convention, put such men as Vallandigham and Olds to the wall. I tell him, or I tell you, that if he ever appears in any Democratic convention in which I happen to be a delegate, I will move to suspend all business until he has been expelled. (Prolonged cheers, and cries of "We'll kick him out!") I can pardon a man who has erred in judgment, or been misled by the clamor of these unwonted times, but never the man who sold his birthright in the Democratic party, and then proffered to become its worst and shameless oppressor. Tod has gained an office, but he has gained infamy also. (Prolonged groans for Tod.) If I am arrested, as I may be to-morrow, or before sundown, and dragged into the presence of a military commission, as Vallandigham was, will you act? ("We will!" "We will!") I have considered the possibility that you will not. ("But we will!" "We will!") I say that I have considered the possibility of your not acting. ("We will," "we will," repeated by the whole assembly several times, and with great enthusiasm.)

I see that our liberty is safe. (Cheers and laughter.) But, whether you act or not, I am resolved to maintain my constitutional rights; and if it be at the cost of life, I shall thank God that he has counted me worthy to suffer in the cause of human freedom. (Applause.) When I heard that my fellow-citizen and friend, Mr. Vallandigham, for expressing his opinion with regard to public affairs, had been violently seized in his own house, in the presence of his family, and thence hurried to Cincinnati, and imprisoned in the Bastile on Columbia street, my indignation at the conduct of the military officers knew no bounds; but afterward, when a judge of the United States, knowing his duty, and sworn to discharge that duty without fear or favor of any man—whether from the instigation of cowardice, or a desire of transient popularity—violated his duty and his oath, trampling to death the Constitution of which he was an especial guardian, and betraying the liberty of all his fellow-citizens, I almost forgave the soldier in my detestation of the faithless civilian. It has now become a question of the impeachment of Humphrey H. Leavitt, and, if he should act in like manner, of Noah H. Swayne. We need an example of that sort for the benefit of posterity in all coming time.

Fellow-citizens: Nothing less than a sense of imminent danger to my own liberty and the liberty of my children, would have brought me to this Convention as a delegate. I am not a politician in the ordinary use of that word. I served the people of Ohio in various offices, and as well as I could, for ten years: the contract between them and me has expired; and, although grateful for the confidence reposed in me while it continued, I have not the slightest disposition to renew it. I desire only, for the rest of my days, the rank and office of a private citizen. I have duties toward my wife and children, duties which I would fain be spared to perform; but I can perform no duty except as a free man. Life is an intolerable burthen under such despotism as we have endured for the last two years. I would sooner face a platoon of soldiers, at once, than to be in constant terror of the iniquities threatened by General Order No. 38. The question for you to decide, this day, is whether you will suffer such despotism any longer. ("No!" "No!" "Never!" "Never!") If we should fail at the election, in October next, a majority of the people of Ohio will have sanctioned a tyranny as monstrous as ever prevailed; and I counsel you, in that event, to sell your property as soon as possible, your goods and chattels, your lands and tenaments, and emigrate with your families to some other country—no matter how distant—in which you can enjoy, as citizens, the liberty which you will no longer be able to enjoy here. (Immense applause.) If our enemies do not give us a fair opportunity of declaring our wishes, at the ballot-box, in that election; if, as in Indiana, they train artillery to bear upon our unarmed assemblies; or, as in Kentucky, disperse them at the point of the bayonet, then, looking right into your eyes, and speaking directly to your hearts, I ask you, once more, will you act? ("We will!" "We will!") Then let us have that Convention which will not adjourn without securing our liberty, and securing it too, by the aid of whatever weapons we can command. And I say with Patrick Henry, "If THIS be treason, make the most of it!" (Tremendous cheers.)

Now, Governor Medill, you may announce the nomination of Mr. Vallandigham; for, if he was rightly convicted, I have violated General Order No. 38 long enough. (Cheers and laughter.)

I have a message, and had almost forgotten it. As soon as I heard that President Lincoln had altered the sentence of the military commission, from imprisonment in Fort Warren to banishment, I sought an interview with Mr. Vallandigham; it was on board the gunboat by which he was taken to Louisville, and in the presence of several gentlemen, I asked him, distinctly, whether Mr. Lincoln had offered him a choice between going to Fort Warren or going to the confederate States. Mr. Vallandigham said that he had not been allowed any choice. I asked: "Which do you prefer, and which alternative, in case you should have a choice, will you accept?" He answered: "I would go to Fort Warren, a thousand times, before I would go to the Southern Confederacy." I then said: "As soon as you have gone, the Abolition liars in charge of the telegraph will report that you had a choice, and that you exercised it." He replied: "I authorize you and request you to tell my friends, and especially at Columbus, that I am not allowed any choice, and that I would go to Fort Warren, if I could, rather than to the confederate States." I have expressed my opinion, fellow-citizens, in regard to the subject of arbitrary arrests and imprisonment. If you have the spirit of freemen, you will not only adopt it, but render it effectual. If you have not that spirit, it matters little what you say or do, for you could not long remain free, in ever such favorable circumstances.

I call upon you, as representing one hundred and eighty thousand Democratic electors in Ohio, not to separate until you have demanded of Abraham Lincoln the person of your nominee for Governor. (Great applause.) Do not talk or even think of prosecuting the war, or of concluding peace, or of any other question, until our standard-bearer has been restored to us.

In view of the circumstances that have brought us together, we hereby resolve:

1. That the will of the people is the foundation of all free government. That to give effect to this will, free thought, free speech, and a free press are absolutely indispensable. Without free discussion, there is no certainty of sound judgment, without sound judgment there can be no wise government.

2. That it is an inherent and constitutional right of the people to discuss all measures of their government, and to approve or disapprove as to their best judgment seems right. That they have a like right to propose and advocate that policy which in their judgment is best, and to argue and vote against whatever policy seems to them to violate the Constitution, to impair their liberties, or to be detrimental to their welfare.

3. That these and all other rights, guaranteed to them by their Constitutions, are their rights in time of war as well as in times of peace, and of far more value and necessity in war than in peace. For, in peace, liberty, security, and property are seldom endangered; in war, they are ever in peril.

4. That we now say to all whom it may concern, not by way of threat, but calmly and firmly, that we will not surrender these rights, nor submit to their forcible violation. We will obey the law ourselves, and all others must obey them.

5. That there is a manifest difference between the administration of the Government and the Government itself. The Government consists of the civil and political institutions created by the Constitution, and to it the people owe allegiance. The Administration are but the agents of the people, subject to their approval or condemnation, according to the merit or demerit of their acts.

6. That in the exercise of the right to differ with the Federal Executive, we enter our solemn protest against the proclamation of the President of the United States, dated the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-three, by which he assumes to emancipate slaves in certain States, holding the same to be unwise, unconstitutional, and void.

7. That we declare our determined opposition to a system of emancipation by the States upon compensation to be made out of the treasury of the United States, as burdensome upon the people, unjust in its very nature, and wholly without warrant of the Constitution.

8. That we declare that the power which has recently been assumed by the President of the United States whereby, under the guise of military necessity, he has proclaimed and extended—or asserts the right to proclaim or extend—martial law over States where war does not exist, and has suspended the writ of habeas corpus, is unwarranted by the Constitution, and its tendency is to subordinate civil to military authority, and to subvert our system of free government.

9. That we deem it proper further to declare that we, together with the truly loyal people of the State, would hail with pleasure and delight any manifestation of a desire on the part of the seceded States to return to their allegiance to the Government of the Union, and in such event we would cordially and earnestly coöperate with them in the restoration of peace and the procurement of such proper guarantees as would give security to all their interests and rights.

10. That the soldiers composing our armies merit the warmest thanks of the nation. Their country called, and nobly did they respond. Living, they shall know a nation's gratitude; wounded, a nation's care; and dying, they shall live in our memories, and monuments shall be raised to teach posterity to honor the patriots and heroes who offered their lives at their country's altar. Their widows and orphans shall be adopted by the nation, to be watched over and cared for as objects truly worthy a nation's guardianship.

11. That Ohio will adhere to the Constitution and the Union as the best, it may be the last hope of popular freedom; and for all wrongs which may have been committed, or evils which may exist, will seek redress, under the Constitution and within the Union, by the peaceful but powerful agency of the suffrages of a free people.

12. That we hail with pleasure and hope the manifestations of conservative sentiment among the people of the Northern States in their elections, and regard the same as the earnest of a good purpose upon their part to coöperate with all other loyal citizens in giving security to the rights of every section and maintaining the Union and the Constitution as they were ordained by the founders of the Republic.

13. That whenever it becomes practicable to obtain a convention of all or of three fourths of the States, such body should be convened for the purpose of proposing such amendments to the Federal Constitution as experience has proved to be necessary to maintain that instrument in the spirit and meaning intended by its founders, and to provide against future convulsions and wars.

14. That we will earnestly support every constitutional measure tending to preserve the Union of the States. No men have a greater interest in its preservation than we have—none desire it more; there are none who will make greater sacrifices, or endure more, than we will to accomplish that end. We are, as we ever have been, the devoted friends of the Constitution and the Union, and we have no sympathy with the enemies of either.

15. That the arrest, imprisonment, pretended trial, and actual banishment of Clement L. Vallandigham, a citizen of the State of Ohio, not belonging to the land or naval forces of the United States, nor to the militia in actual service, by alleged military authority, for no other pretended crime than that of uttering words of legitimate criticism upon the conduct of the Administration in power, and of appealing to the ballot-box for a change of policy — (said arrest and military trial taking place where the courts of law are open and unobstructed, and for no act done within the sphere of active military operations in carrying on the war) — we regard as a palpable violation of the following provisions of the Constitution of the United States:

1. "Congress shall make no law . . . abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances."

2. "The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated; and no warrants shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched and the persons or things to be seized."

3. "No person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia when in actual service in time of war or public danger."

4. "In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law."

And we furthermore denounce said arrest, trial, and banishment, as a direct insult offered to the sovereignty of the people of Ohio, by whose organic law it is declared that "no person shall be transported out of the State for any offense committed within the same."

16. That Clement L. Vallandigham was, at the time of his arrest, a prominent candidate for nomination by the Democratic party of Ohio to the office of Governor of the State; that the Democratic party was fully competent to decide whether he was a fit man for that nomination; and that the attempt to deprive them of that right, by his arrest and banishment, was an unmerited imputation upon their intelligence and loyalty, as well as a violation of the Constitution.

17. That we respectfully but most earnestly call upon the President of the United States to restore C. L. Vallandigham to his home in Ohio; and that a committee of one from each Congressional district of the State, to be selected by the presiding officer of this Convention, is hereby appointed to present this application to the President.

18. That the thanks of this Convention are hereby tendered to Horatio Seymour, Governor of the State of New-York, for his noble letter in relation to the arrest of Mr. Vallandigham; and the President of the Convention is hereby directed to communicate a copy of this resolution to Governor Seymour.

19. That the establishment of a military government over loyal States, where war does not exist, to supersede the civil authorities, and suppress the freedom of speech and of the press, and to interfere with the elective franchise, is not only subversive of the Constitution and the sovereignty of the States, but the actual inauguration of revolution.

20. That it is the sworn duty of the Governor of the State to protect her citizens in the enjoyment and exercise of all their constitutional rights; and we have beheld with deep humiliation and regret not only the failure of David Tod, Governor of Ohio, to perform that duty, but—what is still worse—his active participation in the violation of those rights.

21. That we denounce, as traitors to the country, the Abolition Jacobins who are seeking to bring about civil war in the loyal States, with the view of turning, if possible, the bayonets of the army against the breasts of the fathers, brothers, and friends of the soldiers, and subjecting those States to a military surveillance and dominion.

22. That we denounce, as libelers of the Democratic party, and enemies of their country, the men who are engaged in representing the Democratic party as wanting in sympathy with our soldiers in the field. It is a base slander upon human nature to assert that Democrats, who have hundreds of thousands of brothers and sons in the army, do not sympathize with them—and it is an outrage upon the Democratic party, that has always stood by the country, to assert that it is not the friend of its gallant defenders.

23. That the conduct of Brigadier-General Mason, the military commandant at Columbus, and of the officer commanding the provost-guard, in preventing all appearance of military restraint upon the proceedings of this Convention, shows that they have a just appreciation of the Constitution of their country and the rights of the people—and that they are wise and patriotic officers; and that their conduct on this occasion is in striking contrast with the contrary conduct of the military authorities upon the occasion of the late Democratic meeting at Indianapolis. And we take pleasure in expressing our confidence in General Mason, and the officers and soldiers under his command.

OF 12TH JUNE, 1863.

Henry Laurens was President of the Continental Congress in 1779. In 1780 he was sent as Minister to Holland. On his way he was captured, and imprisoned in the Tower of London for fourteen months. When Lord Shelburne became Premier, Laurens was brought up, on Habeas Corpus, and released. After his release, he was treated with great kindness and respect by the British authorities. He dined with Lord Shelburne. After dinner, the conversation turned on the separation of the two countries. Lord Shelburne remarked:

"I AM SORRY FOR YOUR PEOPLE." "WHY SO?" ASKED LAURENS. "THEY WILL LOSE THE HABEAS CORPUS," WAS THE REPLY. "LOSE THE HABEAS CORPUS!" SAID LAURENS. "YES," SAID LORD SHELBURNE. "WE PURCHASED IT WITH CENTURIES OF WRANGLING, MANY YEARS OF FIGHTING, AND HAD IT CONFIRMED BY AT LEAST FIFTY ACTS OF PARLIAMENT. ALL THIS TAUGHT THE NATION ITS VALUE; AND IT IS SO INGRAINED INTO THEIR CREED, AS THE VERY FOUNDATION OF THEIR LIBERTY, THAT NO MAN OR PARTY WILL EVER DARE TRAMPLE ON IT. YOUR PEOPLE WILL PICK IT UP, AND ATTEMPT TO USE IT; BUT, HAVING COST THEM NOTHING, THEY WILL NOT KNOW HOW TO APPRECIATE IT. AT THE FIRST GREAT INTERNAL FEUD THAT YOU HAVE, THE MAJORITY WILL TRAMPLE UPON IT, AND THE PEOPLE WILL PERMIT IT TO BE DONE, AND SO WILL GO YOUR LIBERTY!"

READ—DISCUSS—DIFFUSE.

REPLY TO PRESIDENT LINCOLN'S LETTER.

To His Excellency Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States:

SIR: Your answer, which has appeared in the public prints, to the resolutions adopted at a recent meeting in the city of Albany, affirming the personal rights and liberties of the citizens of this country, has been referred to the undersigned—the Committee who prepared and reported those resolutions. The subject will now receive from us some further attention, which your answer seems to justify, if not to invite. We hope not to appear wanting in the respect due to your high position, if we reply with a freedom and earnestness suggested by the infinite gravity and importance of the questions upon which you have thought proper to take issue at the bar of public opinion.

You seem to be aware that the Constitution of the United States, which you have sworn to protect and defend, contains the following guarantees to which we again ask your attention: (1) Congress shall make no law abridging the freedom of speech or of the press. (2) The right of the people to be secure in their persons against unreasonable seizures, shall not be violated, and no warrant shall issue but upon probable cause supported by oath. (3) No person except soldiers and mariners in the service of the Government shall be held to answer for a capital or infamous crime, unless on presentment or indictment of a grand jury, nor shall any person be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. (4) In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right of a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the State or District in which the crime shall have been committed, and to be confronted with the witnesses against him.

You are also, no doubt, aware that on the adoption of the Constitution, these invaluable provisions were proposed by the jealous caution of the States, and were inserted as amendments for a perpetual assurance of liberty against the encroachments of power. From your earliest reading of history, you also know that the great principles of liberty and law which underlie these provisions were derived to us from the British Constitution. In that country they were secured by Magna Charta more than six hundred years ago, and they have been confirmed by many and repeated statutes of the realm. A single palpable violation of them in England would not only arouse the public indignation, but would endanger the throne itself. For a persistent disregard of them, Charles the First was dethroned and beheaded by his rebellious subjects.

The fact has already passed into history, that the sacred rights and immunities which were designed to be protected by these constitutional guarantees, have not been preserved to the people during your administration. In violation of the first of them, the freedom of the press has been denied. In repeated instances newspapers have been suppressed in the loyal States, because they criticised, as constitutionally they might, those fatal errors of policy which have characterized the conduct of public affairs since your advent to power. In violation of the second of them, hundreds and, we believe, thousands of men, have been seized and immured in prisons and bastiles, not only without warrant upon probable cause, but without any warrant, and for no other cause than a constitutional exercise of freedom of speech. In violation of all these guarantees, a distinguished citizen of a peaceful and loyal State has been torn from his home at midnight by a band of soldiers, acting under the order of one of your generals, tried before a military commission, without judge or jury, convicted and sentenced without even the suggestion of any offense known to the Constitution or laws of this country. For all these acts you avow yourself ultimately responsible. In the special case of Mr. Vallandigham, the injustice commenced by your subordinate was consummated by a sentence of exile from his home, pronounced by you. That great wrong, more than any other which preceded it, asserts the principles of a supreme despotism.

sions of constitutional liberty and private right, have occasioned profound anxiety in the public mind. The apprehension and alarm which they are calculated to produce have been greatly enhanced by your attempt to justify them, because in that attempt you assume to yourself a rightful authority possessed by no constitutional monarch on earth. We accept the declaration that you prefer to exercise this authority with a moderation not hitherto exhibited. But believing as we do, that your forbearance is not the tenure by which liberty is enjoyed in this country, we propose to challenge the grounds on which your claim of supreme power is based. While yielding to you as a constitutional magistrate the deference to which you are entitled, we can not accord to you the despotic power you claim, however indulgent and gracious you may promise to be in wielding it.

We have carefully considered the grounds on which your pretensions to more than regal authority are claimed to rest; and if we do not misinterpret the misty and clouded forms of expression in which those pretensions are set forth, your meaning is, that while the rights of the citizen are protected by the Constitution in time of peace, they are suspended or lost in time of war, when invasion or rebellion exist. You do not, like many others in whose minds reason and the love of regulated liberty seem to be overthrown by the excitements of the hour, attempt to base this conclusion upon a supposed military necessity existing outside of and transcending the Constitution, a military necessity behind which the Constitution itself disappears in a total eclipse. We do not find this gigantic and monstrous heresy put forth in your plea for absolute power, but we do find another equally subversive of liberty and law, and quite as certainly tending to the establishment of despotism. You claim to have found not outside, but within the Constitution, a principle or germ of arbitrary power, which in time of war expands at once into an absolute sovereignty, wielded by one man; so that liberty perishes, or is dependent on his will, his discretion, or his caprice. This extraordinary doctrine you claim to derive wholly from that clause of the Constitution which, in case of invasion or rebellion, permits the writ of habeas corpus to be suspended. Upon this ground your whole argument is based.

You must permit us to say to you, with all due respect, with the earnestness demanded by the occasion, that the American people will never acquiesce in this doctrine. In their opinion the guarantees of the Constitution which secure to them freedom of speech and of the press, immunity from arrest for offenses unknown to the laws of the land, and the right of trial by jury before the tribunals provided by those laws, instead of military commissions and drum-head courts-martial, are living and vital principles IN PEACE AND IN WAR, at all times and under all circumstances. No sophistry or argument can shake this conviction, nor will the people require its confirmation by logical sequences and deductions. It is a conviction deeply interwoven with the instincts, the habits, and the education of our countrymen. The right to form opinions upon public measures and men, and to declare those opinions by speech or writing, with the utmost latitude of expression; the right of personal liberty, unless forfeited according to established laws, and for offenses previously defined by law; the right, when accused of crime, to be tried where law is administered, and punishment is pronounced only when the crime is legally ascertained—all these are rights instantly perceived without argument or proof. No refinement of logic can unsettle them in the minds of freemen; no power can annihilate them, and no force at the command of any chief magistrate can compel their surrender.

So far as it is possible for us to understand, from your language, the mental process which has led you to the alarming conclusions indicated by your communication, it is this: the habeas corpus is a remedial writ, issued by courts and magistrates, to inquire into the cause of any imprisonment or restraint of liberty; on the return of which and upon due examination, the person imprisoned is discharged, if the restraint is unlawful, or admitted to bail if he appears to have been lawfully arrested, and is held to answer a criminal accusation. Inasmuch as this process may be suspended in time of war, you seem to think that every remedy for a false and unlawful imprisonment is abrogated; and from this postulate you reach, at a single bound, the conclusion that there is no liberty under the Constitution which does not depend on the gracious indulgence of the Executive only. This great heresy once established, and by this mode of induction, there springs at once into existence a brood of crimes or offenses undefined by any rule, and hitherto unknown to the laws of this country; and this is followed by indiscriminate arrests, midnight seizures, military commissions, unheard-of modes of trial and punishment, and all the machinery of terror and despotism. Your language does not permit us to doubt as to your essential meaning, for you tell us, that "arrests are made not so much for what has been done, as for what probably would be done." And, again: "The man who stands by and says nothing when the peril of his government is discussed, can not be misunderstood. If not hindered, (of course by arrest,) he is sure to help the enemy, and much more if he talks ambiguously, talks for his country with 'buts' and 'ifs' and 'ands.'" You also tell us that the arrests complained of have not been made "for the treason defined in the Constitution," nor "for any capital or otherwise infamous crimes, nor were the proceedings following, in any constitutional or legal sense, criminal prosecutions." The very ground, then, of your justification is, that the victims of arbitrary arrest were obedient to every law, were guiltless of any known and defined offense, and therefore were without the protection of the Constitution. The suspension of the writ of habeas corpus, instead of being intended to prevent the enlargement of arrested criminals until a legal trial and conviction can be had, is designed according to your doctrine, to subject innocent men to your supreme will and pleasure. Silence itself is punishable according to this extraordinary theory, and still more so the expression of opinions, however loyal, if attended with criticism upon the policy of the Government. We must respectfully refuse our assent to this theory of constitutional law. We think that men may be rightfully silent if they so choose, while clamorous and needy patriots proclaim the praises of those who wield power; and as to the "buts," the "ifs," and the "ands," these are Saxon words, and belong to the vocabulary of freemen.

We have already said that the intuition of a free people instantly rejects these dangerous and unheard-of doctrines. It is not our purpose to enter upon an elaborate and extended refutation of them. We submit to you, however, one or two considerations, in the hope that you will review the subject with the earnest attention which its supreme importance demands. We say, then, we are not aware that the writ of habeas corpus is now suspended in any of the peaceful and loyal States of the Union. An act of Congress, approved by you on the third of March, 1863, authorized the President to suspend it during the present rebellion. That the suspension is a legislative, and not an executive act, has been held in every judicial decision ever made in this country, and we think it can not be delegated to any other branch of the Government. But passing over that consideration, you have not exercised the power which Congress attempted to confer upon you, and the writ is not suspended in any part of the country where the civil laws are in force. Now, inasmuch as your doctrine of the arbitrary arrest and imprisonment of innocent men, in admitted violation of express constitutional guarantees, is wholly derived from a suspension of the habeas corpus, the first step to be taken, in the ascent to absolute power, ought to be to make it known to the people that the writ is in fact suspended, to the end that they may know what is their condition. You have not yet exercised this power, and therefore, according to your own constitutional thesis, your conclusion falls to the ground. It is one of the provisions of the Constitution, and of the very highest value, that no ex post facto law shall be passed the meaning of which is, that no act which is not against the law when committed, can be made criminal by subsequent legislation. But your claim is, that when the writ of habeas corpus is suspended, you may lawfully imprison and punish for the crimes of silence, of speech, and opinion. But as these are not offenses against the known and established law of the land, the constitutional principle to which we now refer plainly requires that you should, before taking cognizance of such offenses, make known the rule of action, in order that the people may be advised in due season, so as not to become liable to its penalties. Let us turn your attention to the most glaring and indefensible of all the assaults upon constitutional liberty, which have marked the history of your administration. No one has ever pretended that the writ of habeas corpus was suspended in the State of Ohio, where the arrest of a citizen at midnight, already referred to, was made, and he placed before a military court-martial for trial and sentence, upon charges and specifications which admitted his innocence according to the existing laws of this country. Upon your own doctrine, then, can you hesitate to redress that monstrous wrong?

But, sir, we can not acquiesce in your dogmas that arrests and imprisonment, without warrant or criminal accusation, in their nature lawless and arbitrary, opposed to the very letter of constitutional guarantees, can become in any sense rightful, by reason of a suspension of the writ of habeas corpus. We deny that the suspension of a single and peculiar remedy for such wrongs brings into existence new and unknown classes of offenses, or new causes for depriving men of their liberty. It is one of the most material purposes of that writ, to enlarge upon bail persons who, upon probable cause, are duly and legally charged with some known crime; and a suspension of the writ was never asked for in England or in this country, except to prevent such enlargement when the supposed offense was against the safety of the government. In the year 1807, at the time of Burr's alleged conspiracy, a bill was passed in the Senate of the United States, suspending the writ of habeas corpus for a limited time in all cases where persons were charged on oath with treason or other high crime or misdemeanor, endangering the peace or safety of the government. But your doctrine undisguisedly is, that a suspension of this writ justifies arrests without warrant, without oath, and even without suspicion of treason or other crime. Your doctrine denies the freedom of speech and of the press; it invades the sacred domain of opinion and discussion; it denounces the "ifs" and the "buts" of the English language, and even the refuge of silence is insecure.

We repeat, a suspension of the writ of habeas corpus merely dispenses with a single and peculiar remedy against an unlawful imprisonment; but if that remedy had never existed, the right to liberty would be the same, and every invasion of that right would be condemned not only by the Constitution, but by principles of far greater antiquity than the writ itself. Our common law is not at all indebted to this writ for its action of false imprisonment, and the action would remain to the citizen if the writ were abolished forever. Again, every man when his life or liberty is threatened, without the warrant of law, may lawfully resist, and if necessary, in self-defense, may take the life of the aggressor. Moreover, the people of this country may demand the impeachment of the President himself for the exercise of arbitrary power. And when all these remedies shall prove inadequate for the protection of free institutions, there remains, in the last resort, the supreme right of revolution. You once announced this right with a latitude of expression which may well be considered dangerous in the present crisis of our national history. You said: "Any people anywhere, being inclined and having the power, have the right to rise up and shake off the existing government, and form a new one that suits them better. Nor is this right confined to cases where the people of an existing government may choose to exercise it. Any portion of such people that can may revolutionize and make their own of so much of the territory as they inhabit. More than this, a majority of any portion of such people may revolutionize, putting down a minority intermingled with or near about them, who may oppose their movements." (Vol. XIX., Congressional Globe, p. 94.) Such were your opinions, and you had a constitutional right to declare them. If a citizen now should utter sentiments far less dangerous in their tendency, your nearest military commander would consign him to a dungeon, or to the tender mercies of a court-martial, and you would approve the proceeding.

In our deliberate judgment, the Constitution is not open to the new interpretation suggested by your communication now before us. We think every part of that instrument is harmonious and consistent. The possible suspension of the writ of habeas corpus is consistent with freedom of speech and of the press. The suspension of that remedial process may prevent the enlargement of the accused traitor or conspirator, until he shall be legally tried and convicted or acquitted, but in this we find no justification for arrest and imprisonment without warrant, without cause, without the accusation or suspicion of crime. It seems to us, moreover, too plain for argument that the sacred right of trial by jury, and in courts where the law of the land is the rule of decision, is a right which is never dormant, never suspended, in peaceful and loyal communities and States. Will you, Mr. President, maintain, that because the writ of habeas corpus may be in suspense, you can substitute soldiers and bayonets for the peaceful operation of the laws, military commissions and inquisitorial modes of trial for the courts and juries prescribed by the Constitution itself? And if you can not maintain this, then let us ask, where is the justification for the monstrous proceeding in the case of a citizen of Ohio, to which we have called your attention? We know that a recreant judge, whose name has already descended to merited contempt, found the apology on the outside of the supreme and fundamental law of the Constitution. But this is not the foundation on which your superstructure of power is built.

We have mentioned the act of the last Congress professing to authorize a suspension of the writ of habeas corpus. This act now demands your special attention, because, if we are not greatly in error, its terms and plain intention are directly opposed to all the arguments and conclusions of your communication. That act, besides providing that the habeas corpus may be suspended, expressly commands that the names of all persons theretofore or thereafter arrested by authority of the President, or his cabinet ministers, being citizens of states in which the administration of the laws has continued unimpaired, shall be returned to the courts of the United States for the districts in which such persons reside, or in which their supposed offenses were committed; and such return being made, if the next grand jury attending the courts does not indict the alleged offenders, then the judges are commanded to issue an order for their immediate discharge from imprisonment. Now, we can not help asking whether you have overlooked this law, which most assuredly you are bound to observe, or whether it be your intention to disregard it? Its meaning certainly can not be mistaken. By it the national Legislature has said that the President may suspend the accustomed writ of habeas corpus, but at the same time it has commanded that all arrests under his authority shall be promptly made known to the courts of justice, and that the accused parties shall be liberated, unless presented by a grand jury according to the Constitution, and tried by a jury in the ancient and accustomed mode. The President may possibly, so far as Congress can give the right, arrest without legal cause or warrant. We certainly deny that Congress can confer this right, because it is forbidden by the higher law of the Constitution. But, waiving that consideration, this statute, by its very terms, promptly removes the proceeding in every case into the courts where the safeguards of liberty are observed, and where the persons detained are to be discharged, unless indicted for criminal offenses against the established and ascertained laws of the country.

Upon what foundation, then, permit us to ask, do you rest the pretension that men who are not accused of crime may be seized and imprisoned or banished at the will and pleasure of the President or any of his subordinates in civil and military positions? Where is the warrant for invading the freedom of speech and of the press? Where the justification for placing the citizen on trial without the presentment of a grand jury and before military commissions? THERE IS NO POWER IN THIS COUNTRY WHICH CAN DISPENSE WITH ITS LAWS. The President is as much bound by them as the humblest individual. We pray you to bear in mind, in order that you may duly estimate the feeling of the people on this subject, that for the crime of dispensing with the laws and statutes of Great Britain, our ancestors brought one monarch to the scaffold, and expelled another from his throne.

This power which you have erected in theory is of vast and illimitable proportions. If we may trust you to exercise it mercifully and leniently, your successor, whether immediate or more remote, may wield it with the energy of a Cæsar or Napoleon, and with the will of a despot and a tyrant. It is a power without boundary or limit, because it proceeds upon a total suspension of all the constitutional and legal safeguards which protect the rights of the citizen. It is a power not inaptly described in the language of one of your Secretaries. Said Mr. Seward to the British Minister in Washington: "I can touch a bell on my right hand, and order the arrest of a citizen of Ohio. I can touch the bell again, and order the imprisonment of a citizen of New-York, and no power on earth but that of the President can release them. Can the Queen of England, in her dominions, do as much?" This is the very language of a perfect despotism, and we learn from you, with profound emotion, that this is no idle boast. It is a despotism unlimited in principle, because the same arbitrary and unrestrained will or discretion which can place men under illegal restraint or banish them, can apply the rack or the thumb-screw, can put to torture or to death. Not thus have the people of this country hitherto understood their Constitution. No argument can commend to their judgment such interpretations of the Great Charter of their liberties. Quick as the lightning's flash, the intuitive sense of freemen perceives the sophistry and rejects the conclusion.

Some other matters which your Excellency has presented demand our notice.

In justification of your course as to Mr. Vallandigham, you have referred to the arrest of Judge Hall, at New-Orleans, by order of General Jackson; but that case differs widely from the case of Mr. Vallandigham. New-Orleans was then, as you truly state, under "martial or military law." This was not so in Ohio, where Mr. Vallandigham was arrested. The administration of the civil law had not been disturbed in that Commonwealth. The courts were open, and justice was dispensed with its accustomed promptitude. In the case of Judge Hall, General Jackson in a few days sent him outside of the line of his encampments and set him at liberty; but you have undertaken to banish Mr. Vallandigham from his home. You seem also to have forgotten that General Jackson submitted implicitly to the judgment of the court which imposed the fine upon him; that he promptly paid it; that he enjoined his friends to assent, "as he most freely did, to the decision which had just been pronounced against him."

More than this, you overlook the fact that the then administration (in the language of a well-known author) "mildly but decidedly rebuked the proceedings of General Jackson," and that the President viewed the subject with "surprise and solicitude." Unlike President Madison, you, in a case much more unwarranted, approve the proceedings of your subordinate officer, and in addition, justify your course by a carefully considered argument in its support.

It is true that after some thirty years, Congress, in consideration of the devoted and patriotic services of General Jackson, refunded the amount of the fine he had paid! But the long delay in doing this proved how reluctant the American people were to do any thing which could be considered as in any way approving the disregard shown to the majesty of the law, even by one who so eminently enjoyed their confidence and regard.

One subject more, and we shall conclude. You express your regret that our meeting spoke "as Democrats," and you say that "in this time of national peril you would have preferred to meet us upon a level, one step higher than any party platform." You thus compel us to allude to matters which we should have preferred to pass by. But we can not omit to notice your criticism, as it casts at least an implied reproach upon our motives and our proceedings. We beg to remind you that when the hour of our country's peril had come; when it was evident that a most gigantic effort was to be made to subvert our institutions and to overthrow the Government; when it was vitally important that party feelings should be laid aside, and that all should be called upon to unite most cordially and vigorously to maintain the Union; at the time you were sworn into office as President of the United States, when you should have urged your fellow-citizens in the most emphatic manner to overlook all past differences, and to rally in defense of their country and its institutions; when you should have enjoined respect for the laws and the Constitution, so clearly disregarded by the South—you chose, for the first time under the like circumstances in the history of our country, to set up a party platform, called "the Chicago platform" as your creed, to advance it beyond the Constitution, and to speak disparagingly of that great conservative tribunal of our country, so highly respected by all thinking men who have inquired into our institutions —THE SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Your administration has been true to the principles you then laid down. Notwithstanding the fact that several hundred thousand Democrats in the loyal States cheerfully responded to the call of their country, filled the ranks of its armies, and by "their strong hands and willing arms" aided to maintain your Excellency and the officers of Government in the possession of our national capital—notwithstanding the fact that the great body of the Democrats of the country have, in the most patriotic spirit, given their best efforts, their treasure, their brothers and their sons to sustain the Government and to put down the rebellion, you, choosing to overlook all this, have made your appointments to civil office from your cabinet officers and foreign ministers, down to the persons of lowest official grade among the tens of thousands engaged in collecting the revenues of the country, exclusively from your political associates.

Under such circumstances, virtually proscribed by your administration, and while most of the leading journals which supported it approved the sentence pronounced against Mr. Vallandigham, it was our true course, our honest course, to meet as "Democrats," that neither your Excellency nor the country might mistake our antecedents or our position.

In closing this communication, we desire to reäffirm our determination, and, we doubt not, that of every one who attended the meeting which adopted the resolutions we have discussed, expressed in one of those resolutions, to devote "all our energies to sustain the cause of the Union."

Permit us, then, in this spirit, to ask your Excellency to reëxamine the grave subjects we have considered, to the end that, on your retirement from the high position you occupy, you may leave behind you no doctrines and no further precedents of despotic power to prevent you and your posterity from enjoying that constitutional liberty which is the inheritance of us all, and to the end, also, that history may speak of your administration with indulgence, if it can not with approval.

We are, sir, with great respect, yours very truly, JOHN V. L. PRUYN, Chairman of Committee.

THE ELECTION IN IOWA.

BY HON. CHARLES MASON.

FELLOW-CITIZENS OF IOWA: The candidates of the Democratic party are now before you, and the time is at hand when, in the manner provided by law, you will be called upon to decide between the principles of which they are the exponents and those presented by the opposite party. We invite attention to some of those principles.

The great question now presented for your consideration is that of peace or war. Not that we propose immediate, unconditional peace. We contend that the war should continue so long as it is necessary "to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution, and to preserve the Union with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired; and that as soon as these objects are accomplished, the war ought to cease."

On this point our antagonists take a clear and distinct issue. They intend to overthrow slavery in the States, if not the States themselves, by the military power of the Federal government, and insist that peace should not be granted on any terms until that object is attained. Upon the former basis the war might be ended in ninety days, and without endangering our republican liberties. Upon the latter, it must continue for years, and finally end in lasting separation, or in military despotism, or in both.

We do not assert that all the members of the Republican party insist as a sine qua non upon the sudden emancipation of these 4,000,000 slaves, but we do say that if such is not their purpose, they are in a false position, and that their duty to themselves, to their country, and to the momentous interests of civil liberty, require that they should take a careful "observation" for the purpose of ascertaining whither they have been unconsciously drifting; and that they should now change their course accordingly.

It is true that some of the presses and leading men of the party advocate different notions, but no one can deny that the extremists of the party control its action, and that the President himself—however reluctantly—has at length been brought into entire subserviency to their extreme projects, and has made emancipation paramount to peace.

But, whatever may be the views and opinions of the republican party elsewhere, it is certain that in this State they are as is above represented. Their candidate for governor has openly taken that ground. He has stated in one of his public speeches since his nomination, that this is "an abolition war, and that it will be continued as such as long as there is one slave in the South to be made free—that peace can never be made, nor is peace desirable, until the last link of slavery is abolished."

Thus then we see that while the Democrats in their State convention have solemnly resolved that they are opposed to the prosecution of the war for the purpose of carrying out the emancipation proclamation of the President, the Republicans, by their acts and declarations, have not only sustained that policy, but have made it paramount to all other considerations. This is the most important point of difference between us. If in the coming election they are successful, it will amount to a decision by the people of this State, that in their opinion peace ought not, under any circumstances, to be restored until all the slaves in the Southern States are emancipated. All those, therefore, who would be willing to obtain peace on any other terms, should support the Democratic candidates.

Under "Republican" policy, we should be at once overrun with hordes of this black population, who as a class are indolent and vicious. These would not only crowd our poor-houses and prisons, but they would occupy the places which would otherwise be filled by white laborers, and thus exclude from among us a more industrious, enterprising, and thrifty class of immigrants. The fact that they are now excluded from Illinois and Indiana would greatly increase the number who would make their way to Iowa.

An analysis of the census returns of 1850 and 1860 fully shows that among the free blacks in the Northern States there are nearly twelve times as many convicts as among the whites, in proportion to their respective numbers. Are we anxious to make our State a moral pest-house, to be crowded with these colored subjects of crime?

The history of the West-India Islands is replete with evidence showing the utter indolence and want of thrift of the manumitted slave. Have we not already sufficient pauperism with which to be burdened, but must we desire more?

The immigration of the free black is objectionable on other grounds. To the reasons for excluding the convict and pauper the still greater one is to be added, that the negro and his posterity must always remain a distinct class, never bound to the country by the same tie of allegiance as the white, and therefore the proper instrument to be used by those who would create riots and tumults or any other violation of the laws of the land.

But a still greater injury, of a different character, will result to us of the West, from the immediate and entire abolition of slavery. We shall lose our only reliable market for our great staple commodities. The slaves on the Southern plantations are fed chiefly on bacon and corn. It is found to be the best economy to employ these laborers in the culture of cotton and sugar and rice, and to supply them with provisions from regions farther North. Not less than $50,000,000 annually has heretofore thus been paid for food for slave on the Southern plantations, a very large portion of which came from the valley of the Upper Mississippi. The inconveniences we have sustained, and the losses which have resulted from the closing of the Mississippi River for the past two years, will enable us in some degree to appreciate the value of this market.

The emancipation policy will deprive us of this market entirely, and will serve as a perpetual blockade of the Mississippi River, so far as our great staples are concerned. We can still send them South; but there will be no one to consume them, and therefore no one to buy.

But will not the emancipated slave still have the same appetite as now? Doubtless; but he will gratify it in a different way. Instead of the large fields of cotton which have heretofore supplied the market of the world, and furnished the means of purchasing the products of our North-western prairies, each "free American citizen of African descent" will have his little patch of sweet-potatoes and of corn, his pigs and his chickens, and that is all. He will raise just what is necessary to support life, and nothing more.

Do you want proof of this? Look to Hayti and Jamaica, where the experiment now proposed here has already been tried. Emancipation took place in Hayti in 1790. At that time the annual exports from the Island were as follows:

Sugar,	163,405,220 lbs.
Coffee,	68,151,180 "
Cotton,	6,286,120 "

The value of all these exports was $27,828,000 annually.

In 1826 these exports were as follows:

Sugar,	32,864 lbs.
Coffee,	32,189,784 "
Cotton,	620,972 "

In 1849 they were reduced to Sugar—none.

Coffee,	30,608,343 lbs.
Cotton,	544,516 "

Mr. Sumner, in a recent speech in Congress, only claimed that the present exports of the island amounted to $2,673,000 annually, which is less than one tenth of what they were in 1790; and even this is probably much greater than the real amount.

In Jamaica emancipation was inaugurated in 1833, and consummated in 1838. The products in 1834 were as follows:

Sugar,	84,756 hhds.
Rum,	32,111 punch.
Pimento,	3,605,400 lbs.
Coffee,	17,725,731 "

In 1856 they had decreased to the following amount

Sugar,	25,920 hhds.
Rum,	14,470 punch.
Pimento,	6,848,622 lbs.
Coffee,	3,328,147 "

The pimento (or allspice) tree grows wild, and to a certain extent the coffee-tree, at present, also. The women and children gather the berries without previous cultivation, which accounts for the large quantities of those commodities still exported. The sugar-plantations are constantly going to decay, when they are neglected and abandoned. No new ones are opened, and the exports of sugar are constantly diminishing. The free negro basks in the sun, and only works to supply his immediate and most pressing wants. When freed from restraint, he surrenders himself to the indolence of his nature, leaving the future to take care of itself.

Such are the results which it is now sought to reproduce here as the great end and aim of the present civil war—a war which has already cost the nation the loss of at least six hundred thousand of her best and bravest sons, and plunged her in debt (reckoning only that of the loyal States) of more than $2,000,000,000, which, considering the high rate of interest paid, is more than twice as great, in proportion to our means of payment, as that of any nation on earth. And what is of still more consequence, it has placed in most extreme jeopardy—almost beyond hope—the free institutions which we have prized above all price. And yet we are told that the emancipation policy must still be pursued at whatever cost and sacrifice. Are we prepared for national suicide, rather than abandon this one fanatical idea?

It will be said that this is a question of justice to others, and not of mere advantage to ourselves. We reply, the course proposed will be still more detrimental to the black race than to the white.

We have already seen that the effect of sudden emancipation has always been to render them idle, and consequently vicious and unhappy. The boon of indolence is slight in comparison with the evils it engenders. This will be corroborated by another important fact.

The census of 1860 shows that for the previous twenty years the free blacks in the United States had increased in numbers less than one third as fast as the whites, and less than one half as fast as the slaves. And yet their numbers had been augmented by emancipation more than they had been diminished by emigration. No surer test of the comforts possessed by any people can be found than this. The slaves as a class are in a much better condition than the free blacks, as is shown by the rate of increase.

Besides, all experience shows that two free uncommingling races can never long coëxist in the same country. The weaker, like our Indian tribes, will soon become annihilated.

Whatever may be said to the contrary, the line between the black and the white race in this country can never be erased. Voluntary emigration can not be relied upon; and forced emigration will be both expensive and inhuman. Nothing remains but annihilation, or their continuance for the present in slavery.

But we shall be told that this is not a question of profit or advantage, but one of principle and duty, and that slavery is so heinous a sin that nothing must be allowed to prevent its immediate extirpation, though injury and ruin to either or both the races concerned should be the result.

And who comes to us with authority to speak thus dogmatically upon this subject? Has any new revelation of the Divine Will been now authoritatively promulgated? Has an institution which is as old as history, which was countenanced by the Mosaic law, which was widely prevalent in the time of Christ and his Apostles, without receiving any special reprobation, which existed in full force in every one of the States after the declaration of American independence, which is not only recognized and protected by our Federal Constitution, but is made the subject of one of its extraordinary provisions—has such an institution, by wiser and purer men than have ever before appeared on earth, been all at once ascertained to be "the sum of all villainy"? Must no truce be made, no faith be kept with it? Must fire and sword, impelled by hate and fury, be invoked for its extirpation, and all this in the name of duty, and religion, and patriotism? We do not believe it. They who teach thus are surely impostors. They will lead you to ruin if you continue to follow them.

We admit that the spirit of Christianity is opposed to the continuance of slavery; but is it not still more opposed to rapine and butchery, and all the other atrocities of civil war? It acts not by violence, but by its silent influences, which are more efficacious than the sword. Its "still small voice" is mightier than the whirlwind. Fire and fagot and tortures and dungeons, and all the other gross contrivances of men's brute instincts, were never an aid, but always a hindrance to its progress. The history of slavery furnishes another illustration of the same great truth.

In 1776 slavery existed in each of the thirteen States, and all the territory then owned by them. Within sixty years it had been voluntarily abolished in seven of their number. Without commotion or violence in one half the States, including the new ones formed from original slave territory, slavery had ceased to exist. Virginia had also in her constitutional convention only failed by one vote to adopt measures for prospective emancipation, and in the Legislature of Kentucky a like strength of opinion was manifested in the same direction. The progress of emancipation was constant, and there was no good reason why it should not continue.

In 1833 the Act of Parliament emancipating all the slaves in the British West India Islands was passed. The enemies of our peace and prosperity, under the garb of philanthropy, then turned their attention in this direction. They sent their emissaries hither to stir up dissensions, upon the pretext of hastening on the change which was then proceeding with such rapidity.

Many of the uneasy enthusiasts of the North weakly or wickedly fell into the snare. Unwilling "to let well enough alone," they commenced a system of intermeddling in the concerns of their Southern neighbors. This was done in such an obtrusive and impertinent manner as to create indignation, and at length obstinate hostility.

Since then not one foot of slave territory has become free, if we except the results of the acts of legislative robbery which have been witnessed within the past two years. Had it not been for this impertinent intermeddling several of the slave States would already have been voluntarily far advanced in their career of emancipation.

But it has been urged on high authority that there is an "irrepressible conflict" between free and slave labor, and that a country can not exist part slave and part free. If this is really true, every principle of equity and fair dealing dictates that the free and the slave States should voluntarily separate. Neither has a right to become a robber of the other.

But it is not true. Slavery has existed since the earliest times; and in most countries where it has prevailed, free and slave labor have been found side by side. No such irreconcilable incompatibility as is now pretended was ever before observed, for the simple reason that it did not exist.

For a still stronger reason, no such incompatibility will produce any great practical inconvenience where the two kinds of labor, either simple or mixed, exist in separate States united under one Federal head.

So far from producing discord or weakness, this very difference is a source of union and strength. It causes diversity of production, and thus prevents rivalry; gives rise to commerce, increases intercourse, renders each section useful and necessary to the other, and secures union and harmony. Blacks can not be profitably employed in manufacturing, except it be of the coarser kinds. They can be more usefully engaged in producing the great staples for export than in the production of food. The South, therefore, receives its manufactures from the North-east, and its provisions from the North-west, while it furnishes the great staples which pay the foreign debt of all, and thus preserves the balance of trade between ours and all other countries. The system is thus rendered complete. If we had had all the ordering of it ourselves, could we have made it to suit us better, so far as its harmonious operation is concerned?

But the "slave power" is growing, encroaching, grasping, dangerous, and must be overturned in order to secure our own safety. These are expressions which, parrot-like, have been repeated till they are widely believed. Let us inquire into their truth.

The number of representatives from what are now the free and the slave States, under the six last apportionments, have been as follows:

Free States,	93	123	141	135	143	156
Slave States,	78	89	99	87	90	85
Difference,	15	34	42	48	53	71

From having a majority of only fifteen in the House of Representatives in 1811, we now have a majority of seventy-one, so that our strength in that body has been steadily increasing until it is now nearly two to one in comparison with theirs. This certainly does not look as though the influence of the slave States was likely to become so overpowering as to call for extraordinary measures for its suppression.

As to the alleged propensity to encroach upon the more powerful States of the North, it is not only contrary to nature, but is not sustained by facts, when honestly examined. Not one acre of soil originally free has ever been made slave territory. The old North-western Territory, where slavery was once legalized, was consecrated to freedom by one of the present slaveholding States. In the whole Louisiana purchase, which included our own State, slavery was not only indigenous, but was protected by treaty. And yet the admission of a slave State carved out of that very territory was fiercely resisted until by far the larger portion of that whole purchase had been grasped and retained by the free States. Let us confess the truth. The stronger party has here also manifested the chief disposition toward encroachment upon the weaker. More recent occurrences have greatly corroborated this truth.

But we hear it often asserted that slavery was the cause of the present civil war, and that to avoid such effects hereafter we must remove this cause.

It is true that if there had been no slavery the war now raging might have been avoided. So if there was no property, there would be neither theft nor robbery. Shall the institution of property be abolished in order to prevent these crimes in future?

The object of an offense is very different from its cause. Among men disposed to be honest and just, property does not occasion crime, nor slavery war. It is only when a disposition to intermeddle with or encroach upon the rights of others is manifested that such results are witnessed. That disposition, then, is the cause of these evils. Extirpate this cause if you would avoid its effects.

We often hear it asserted as a reason for the inveterate hostility with which this institution is regarded by so many in the North, that it has governed the country most of the time since the organization of the Government. If that is true, it certainly deserves the credit of having well governed it. The Presidents and other high officers of State who have been selected from the South have not, in general, been unworthy of their exalted position. Whether the remedy we have now been administering is not likely to prove worse than the disease, we are fast becoming qualified to judge.

But admitting that undue advantages of this kind have been enjoyed by the South, have not preponderating benefits been received from the Government by the people of the North? Our revenue, navigation and fishery laws have all operated decidedly in favor of the North, until bleak and sterile New-England has become a country of palaces, from means derived from States more favored by nature both as to soil and climate. Immigration, also — one of our chief sources of wealth and power—has been encouraged in the North, and, in effect, prohibited in the South. Have we not had our full share of the substantial benefits of the Government? If the Southern people are satisfied with their portion in this distribution, ought not we to be so?

Such would have been the opinion of every impartial mind. So would have thought the people of this country if they could fairly have understood all the facts of the case. But so thought not the politicians of the Abolition order—they who, from fanaticism or some sinister motive, had become the willing instruments of the pseudo-philanthropists of Great Britain in striking perhaps a fatal blow at the prosperity, the unity, the very existence of their native country.

For the accomplishment of their purposes they resolved to build up a great anti-slavery party at the North, and, aided by circumstances, they at length fatally succeeded. They well understood that this would necessarily lead to the organization of parties divided by geographical lines; but they set at naught the maxims of wisdom as enunciated by Washington, and resolved to hazard the experiment.

They knew, too, that success could only be attained through civil war; but this did not deter these conspirators from their fell purpose. They determined to seek their own advantage, though ruin should result to their country and all its cherished institutions.

In pursuance of this determination, the doctrine of the "irrepressible conflict" was promulgated, and afterward sanctioned by placing its chief apostles in the highest seats of power. This was nothing less than a prospective declaration of hostilities against the South and its institutions.

The success of a purely sectional party upon such a platform, produced the result which every sagacious mind expected. State after State declared its formal withdrawal from the Union. Then was the time when every sentiment of patriotism in the American heart was stirred to its lowest depths; but, careless and unmoved, the Republican party looked on and smiled. They derided our apprehensions. In mockery they termed us "Union-savers," professed a willingness to be rid of the Southern States, insisted that they could not be "kicked out of the Union," and declared that a few companies of "wide-awakes" would be sufficient to suppress all infraction of the laws at any rate.

The lamented Crittenden proposed his resolutions in the Senate; and the same, in substance, were presented in the House by Mr. Clemens of Virginia. The most conclusive evidence was given that their cordial adoption would restore peace and union; but they received not one single Republican vote in either House. A like fate awaited the resolutions of the Peace Conference and many other similar propositions presented from other sources. They all failed. The Republicans seemed doggedly determined to take no step to ward off the danger which was evidently now so imminent.

The vital principle of the Crittenden proposition, and nearly all the others that were presented, was the restoration of the Missouri Compromise by a constitutional amendment. The Republicans had always professed great veneration for this compromise, and for several years after its repeal had taken high ground in favor of its restoration. They had now an opportunity of accomplishing their purpose, and at the same time preserving the Union and preventing civil war. That they refused to do this is to our minds conclusive proof that they desired war.

We will refer to one other single class of facts corroborative of the same conclusion. The war has not been prosecuted with the prime design of bringing it to an early and successful termination.

At its commencement, while there was union in the North there was great division of opinion in the South. In each of those States (except perhaps South-Carolina) a strong party always opposed secession. Good policy dictated that this feeling should be cherished and strengthened, that nothing should be done to enrage or exasperate, but every thing to mollify the public feeling until the mass of the people, convinced that we were their true friends, should voluntarily return to their duty.

No such course was ever attempted. With some creditable exceptions, a system of indiscriminate wrong and outrage of pillage and robbery was commenced and continued. This naturally excited feelings of vengeance, extinguished every sentiment of loyalty, gave undisputed predominance to the disunionists, and rendered the prospect of voluntary reconstruction hopeless.

Measures were urged through Congress in hot haste having a like but still more decisive tendency in the same direction. Projects of wholesale confiscation, of dividing the States, treating them as conquered provinces, depriving them of their separate sovereign existence; the arming of the slaves against their masters, emancipation in the District of Columbia, the appropriation of means from the Federal treasury in aid of emancipation in the States and subsequent colonization, and finally the general immediate uncompensated emancipation of the great body of the slaves by the bare proclamation of the President — these were the series of measures which were specially favored by the party in power, and which did more to unite and invigorate the confederates than all they could do for themselves; whilst the North was greatly distracted by a system of unconstitutional aggression upon the public liberty, both formidable and alarming.

Among men devoted to the Union, idolizing the Constitution, and jealous of their rights, these and other acts of a like character were calculated to raise a well-grounded doubt whether there was not a settled purpose on the part of the party in power to subvert our institutions and bring about results worse even than separation—thus greatly weakening the power of the Federal government.

Finally when by such a course they had aroused a formidable opposition to such illegal acts; when great and patriotic States had one after another pronounced against the Administration, such opposition was declared to be sympathy with rebellion, not only by partisan presses and orators, but even by high officers of the government themselves.

This was, in effect, saying to those in rebellion: "A great and growing party in the North are your friends and sympathizers. Persevere for a short time longer, and they will openly aid you." Could any thing be better calculated to give them comfort and encouragement.

But why should they desire thus to strengthen the hands of their enemies and protract the contest? Simply for the reason already mentioned. They wished to convert the war into an engine of emancipation, and they took the only practicable way of attaining that end.

In July, 1861, both Houses of Congress, by a nearly unanimous vote, had declared the purpose of the war to be the preservation of the Union, and not the overthrow of slavery. While such was the public feeling, had the war ended, it could not have been made an instrument of abolition.

To give it such a character it must be long protracted. We must meet with great reverses. Immense sacrifices of life and property must be witnessed. National ruin and bankruptcy must stare us in the face. The bitterness of hate, the fury of exasperation, must be aroused until urged on by animosity and desperation, the public feeling would sanction any measure which promised success.

In this manner has the cherished purpose been pursued, until the nation now stands on the brink of ruin. Our resources have been recklessly lavished—a large proportion upon public plunderers—until the energies of the people are borne down by a hopeless burden of debt. Hundreds of thousands of our young men have been consigned to Southern graves, until we are fast becoming a nation of mourners and cripples. The efforts of the bravest armies that ever trod the earth, commanded by some of the ablest generals, have been thwarted by measures emanating from Washington, and all for the purpose of carrying out the original great design of those who control the party in power.

How has the mind of this people been led on from step to step in the prescribed direction! At first the arming of the negroes was felt to be abhorrent to every instinct of humanity; but it was alleged to be necessary for the suppression of the rebellion, and by degrees the people acquiesced.

Emancipation was attempted under the military power, but was at first quickly suppressed. Public sentiment had not as yet been sufficiently educated and fashioned upon such a model; but the matter was agitated, and the proper appliances made. The people were made to believe that slavery—which had always before been represented as the source of supreme weakness—was possessed of such vitality and power, that it must be extirpated before we could hope for success, and they seemingly have yielded to necessity.

Having accomplished thus much, the mask begins to be openly thrown off. It is proclaimed that the abolition of slavery is the prime object of the war, and that peace must never be known until that object is attained. The Republican candidate for Governor in this State did not speak without authority.

The second officer in the confederate government, bearing a message of peace, has been turned back at the threshold without a hearing, because it is well known that whatever the purport of that message, in other respects it would not admit of immediate emancipation. Delegations from great States inquire whether they can be allowed to return quietly to their old places in the Union, and are coldly repelled. A convenient legal adviser gives an official opinion that whole States which, as we insist, have all the while remained in the Union, can now be treated as conquered countries — be re-colonized and governed from the central government. All these are looking to the one great end—immediate emancipation. A brave and proud people are thus to be driven to desperation, while they still control large armies, and while subtle and powerful despots are watching us with no friendly eye, ready to take advantage of every opportunity that presents itself to do us harm. Has fanaticism made us mad?

Fellow-citizens, the question is broadly before you. The issue is fully made up, and will be tried in October. Shall we have peace as soon as it can be attained, with safety and honor, on the the basis of a restored Union and a preserved Constitution, or shall we still continue this sanguinary and destructive war for the single purpose of suddenly turning loose four millions of semi-barbarians to prey upon mankind, and in the end to be exterminated themselves. Choose ye now on which side of this great issue your votes shall be cast.

ARGUMENT.

To the politician, (by which term I do not mean a placeman, but one who makes political science a study,) my argument may seem to take the color rather of an ethical, than a political disquisition. I beg him, however, to reflect that, from the very nature of the subject, and the class of minds whom I would address, I can not reach the political, except through the proved positions of the ethical question; and when it is considered that so many of the clergy, as well as lay Christians, of various denominations, have taken such a zealous and prominent part in the political strifes of these troublous times, and that to their teachings and influence can be traced many of the lessons, and much of the moral support, of opinions in the public mind which have ripened into bloody war, it will not be considered altogether out of place to suggest to minds of this class a careful and serious revision of the fundamental principles on which they base their opinion and action.

Without intending to impeach the honesty or conscientiousness of the convictions of those who deem Slavery our great national sin, and the cause of our civil war, I may venture, nevertheless, to question the soundness of their convictions, and charge their unsoundness on their adoption of false premises, defective notions of human nature, of the social system, and of true philanthropy.

Nothing in these times of excitement is so calculated to pain and to perplex a benevolent and patriotic heart as the witnessing the constant outbursts of an intolerant, nay, an almost inhuman spirit, manifested in the conversations, in the writings, in the speeches, in the sermons, even in the prayers, of so many who hold a high position as Christians, whenever the subject of Slavery is broached. On all other topics, they will converse and write, and speak and preach, and pray with calmness, sobriety, and intelligence; but no sooner do they touch upon the subject of Slavery, than a sudden metamorphosis takes place, and symptoms of monomania are manifested. The calm and gentle man is all at once fierce, denunciatory, proscriptive; the tone of the humble and cautious has become positive, loud, and bold; the rational and logical argues has changed to the dogmatical and sophistical rhapsodist; the reverential habit of bowing to the teachings of Scripture has given place to a proud opinionativeness, which sits in judgment upon the allotments of Providence, and threatens even to reject the Bible altogether, if its teachings do not square with his preconceived notions of the method which God should adopt in ordaining the conditions of human society.

That there should be obliquity of vision in examining ethical questions, confusing and distorting the mind of the mere man of the world, and the self-seeking politician, is not so surprising, but it is indeed a marvel that men of Christian principle and education, and especially that men occupying the high and responsible position of teachers of the religion of the Prince of Peace, should use the influence of their talents and position to give consistency and lend support to the loose, anarchical ideas of a godless fanaticism. Where has the sense of decency fled, when the Sabbath is made the day, and the Church the place for partisan orgies; when flags flaunt in solemn mockery above the pulpits; and the Psalms of David, overflowing with the elevating praises of God, are exchanged for the vain-glorious, self-flattering gasconade of heathenish songs to a miscalled liberty, and on the plea of a vaunting patriotism; while the Gospel of Peace has been cast out of its proper temples, to give place to a religion, whose Bible is the Declaration of Independence, whose blood-stained God is Human Freedom, whose Saviour is the National Flag, and whose Devil is Slavery?

"The time is out of joint;" so complete a dislocation must have a cause commensurate with the direful effect. Nor can we greatly err in asserting that so deep a stirring of the depths of human society must derive its force from serious disturbance, lying far back in fundamental principles. "What error leads must err." In circumstances so grave, it will not be deemed out of place narrowly and critically to examine the fundamental principles of Society.

Civil institutions have, of necessity, a theological basis. If our theology is wrong, we can not discover nor understand the true system of human society, a social system which will meet the wants and necessities of man as he is. Hence, we must begin at the beginning.

When a physician is called to a case of disease, how does he proceed to accomplish a cure? If he be a wise man, will he not consider it essential to make himself acquainted with the nature both of the constitution of his patient and the diagnosis of the disease, before he can prescribe judiciously? A knowledge of the nature of the human constitution in a state of health, and the general regimen necessary to keep it in that state, must lie at the foundation of all right practice. We should have little confidence in a physician who should prescribe rich and exciting food in the delirium of a fever, because such food is deemed proper in health.

What is the nature of man? Before proceeding another step, however, I wish it distinctly understood I shall assume that this question can be satisfactorily answered only by an appeal to the Bible. I shall go into no argument with any one to prove the paramount authority of the Bible in a question of this nature. If any reject this authority, they need go no further with this argument. It is not addressed to them. I assume at once the Bible to be an umpire from which there is no appeal. It is not the "higher law," but the highest Law; the court of last appeal. And if my argument stands not the test of this Court, reject it.

We can have no just notions of a political or civil system adapted to man, without acquainting ourselves with the nature of the being for whom the system is constructed. All writers, ancient as well as modern, heathen as well as Christian, who have treated of Government, concede this fundamental truth, in a greater or less degree; and we can have no just notions of the nature of man, aside from the revelations respecting man, which God has made in his Word.

Experience and observation, without Bible light, may indeed reveal to us certain traits of human character, particularly those which lie upon the surface, and these may lead to plausible theories and glittering speculations respecting the proper arrangements of society; but without the light of revelation, we can never dive into the actual inner life of man, and learn the secret springs of his actions; and so can have no solid basis upon which to found any comprehensive or harmonious social system. We witness every day the bursting of the unsubstantial bubbles of the so-called social reformers, who, rejecting the only true source of knowledge on a subject of all others grave and profound, and requiring the knowledge found only in the Bible, have theorized in vain, or only to expose themselves to ridicule from the shallowness of their philosophy, and the narrowness of scope as well as grossness of their socialistic dreams. If the reader desires to learn what crotchety conceit has been exhibited to the intellectual world and carried out into futile and fatal experiment, he will find in the visionary schemes of Fourier, of the Count Henri de St. Simon, of Emile de Girardin, and of Prudhon and others of the impracticable school of socialistic dreamers of the old world, enough ad nauseam to turn him away with utter disgust, and prepare him the more cordially to welcome the profound yet simple system of society, ordained by Him, who alone has the vastness of intellect to grasp so mighty a question, in all its length and breadth and height and depth, combined with the wisdom to devise, and the authority to establish, a social system perfectly adapted to man.

In answering, then, the first question to be resolved, What is the nature of man? we learn that man at his creation was the loftiest creature of the universe; of no other intelligent creature is it declared that he was created in the "image of God;" but of man it is so affirmed, not once, nor twice, nor even thrice, but four times, at his very birth, as if by a quadruple affirmation the great fact was intended to be made impressive in the strongest possible degree. "And God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness. So God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him." This, then, was the original nature of man; he was partaker of the Divine nature; he was of the royal family of heaven, possessing in his original constitution, therefore, all those moral attributes and properties of his Creator that by possibility could be imparted to him as a created being. If such a fact has been so clearly and impressively announced, it should have its proper weight in our thoughts, and it is a great fact which bears most importantly on what follows in this argument.

We have now learned from the highest authority what was the Nature of Man. Is that his nature now? From the same high source we receive the sad answer that man has lost that nature, and all human experience throughout the long ages of the past confirms this fearful truth. Man was no sooner created than his loyalty, to the supreme will of Him who created him, was put to the test. It was to be made manifest to the universe of intelligent beings whether this exalted being, created with a will to choose, had determined to act in accord with the Will of his Creator, or preferred to act in opposition to that Will. God commanded, "Thou shalt not;" Man replied: "I will." He listens to the Tempter, and thus Disobedience was grafted into man's nature; and so man lost the image in which he was created, and voluntarily took the image of Satan, whose whole nature is opposition to the will of God. This is the Bible account of Man in health and of Man diseased. Was Man left unpitied in this his lost condition? Was there no physician with skill to understand his disease, and to apply a remedy? To a community who have been taught from childhood in the Christian system, it is hardly necessary to say that no sooner had the disease appeared, than the great Physician also appeared. In the Councils of Heaven, Redemption, or the restoration of man to his lost position, becomes the great absorbing enterprise of Heaven, and He, man's "elder brother," appears on earth, whose name emphatically is Saviour, and whose voluntary office is to eradicate the disease and to restore to Man his former health.

Knowing the disease of human nature, Disobedience, the parent of that countless brood of evils which afflict humanity, we are prepared to look into the philosophy of the remedy devised for him, and this can not be better understood than by studying the prescriptions of the great Physician. Yet reason at once suggests that as Disobedience is the disease, so Obedience, in some manner, was to be the remedy. Since resistance to the will of God was the fatal poison permeating the whole nature of man, how natural that the antidote should be the reïnstating in man's nature of Obedience or Submission to the will of God. Indeed there could be no restoration of the lost image of God in man but by the dethronement of Disobedience and the reënthronement of Obedience. We, therefore, should expect that a perfect system of instrumentalities, put in operation to accomplish man's restoration, would include the restoration of obedience in the human soul as the dominant idea. The Saviour, who devised the remedy, and came to earth to apply it, will show both what that remedy is and its manner of application.

Listen then to some of the passages from the Bible, which disclose the object of his great mission. Heb. 10 : 5 : "Wherefore, when He cometh into the world, he saith, Sacrifice and offering thou wouldest not, but a body hast thou prepared for me. In burnt-offerings and sacrifices for sin thou hast had no pleasure. Then said I, Lo, I come to do thy will, O God. Above, when he said, sacrifices and offering, and burnt-offerings, and offering for sin, thou wouldest not, neither hadst pleasure therein; which are offered by the law, then said he, Lo, I come to do thy will, O God. He taketh away the first, that he may establish the second, by the which Will we are sanctified," etc.

In this passage nothing can be clearer than that the chief mission of the Saviour, previous to his death, was to illustrate and enforce by his own example perfect submission or Obedience to the Will of God, declaring that the sacrifices and offerings of the ritual law were of no avail, and so discarding these, he declares that obedience to the Will of God reëstablished in the heart of man, is that which sanctifies, that which restores man, or casts out the Great Sin of human nature, Disobedience, by implanting Obedience. On one occasion, when urged to eat, he says, John 4 : 34, "My meat is to do the will of him that sent me;" and 5 : 30, "I seek not mine own will, but the will of the Father, which hath sent me;" and again, 6 : 38, "For I came down from heaven not to do my own will, but the will of him that sent me."

In these passages he distinctly announces to his disciples the object of his mission. Man, lost by the disobedience of the original Head of humanity, is recovered by the obedience of Him who came to be the new head of humanity, the second Adam. Rom. 5 : 19 : "For as by one man's disobedience many were made sinners, so by the obedience of one shall many be made righteous."

Observe, in some of the incidents of his life, how the great object of his mission was constantly before his mind. When informed, for example, that his mother and brethren were seeking for him, he replies, (Mark 3 : 33, 35 :) "Who is my mother or my brethren? whosoever shall do the will of God, is my brother, and my sister, and my mother." And again, (Matt. 7 : 21 :) "Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven, but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven." But it was not by precept alone that he taught the great lesson of obedience; he is consistently true to his mission. If he declared he came not to do his own will, but the will of the Father who sent him, he is about to give to the universe the most astounding example of obedience, of subjection to the will of God under circumstances so inconceivably appalling that the human mind is foiled in the attempt to imagine them, and can only feebly comprehend the fact from the agonizing attempts which he made to change, if it were possible, his Father's will. Luke 22 : 42. "Father, if thou be willing, remove this cup from me : nevertheless not my will but thine be done;" and Matt. 26 : 39, "O my Father, if be possible, let this cup pass from me : nevertheless, not my will but thine be done;" and Matt. 26 : 42 : "O my Father, if this cup may not pass away from me except I drink it, thy will be done."

But he also taught a prayer to man which still ascends as it has ascended for more than eighteen hundred years, from the lips of uncounted millions in daily petition : "Thy will be done on earth as in heaven." When this petition is consummated, when that will is done in earth, man will again be restored to his original nature, but not till all the instrumentalities for operating upon him and training him shall have been completely successful in the subduing of man's will to obedience to the will of God. This great extreme lesson of obedience, shown by the Saviour, was specially designed for man's imitation. The apostle Peter (1st Peter 4 : 1) alludes to this same great lesson for the purpose of enforcing it, "Forasmuch then as Christ hath suffered for us in the flesh, arm yourselves likewise with the same mind," (with that implicit obedience to the will of God under the most trying circumstances,) "for he that hath suffered in the flesh hath ceased from sin, that he no longer should live the rest of his time to the lusts of men, but to the will of God."

Is there not a profound significance, too, in the sublimely eloquent words of Paul with which he closes his epistle to the Hebrews in that beautiful benediction, concentrating in one glowing sentence this same great leading object and aim of the Saviour? "Now the God of Peace that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus Christ, make you perfect in every good work to do his will, working in you that which is well pleasing in his sight through Jesus Christ." I am confident Christians recognize the great truths which I have here feebly eliminated, since through their Christian education they have been early indoctrinated into the belief of them as fundamental doctrines of the Bible. It is not new doctrine to them. They need not be told that Disobedience, or opposition to the will of God, was the sin that cast man down from his original and exalted position, and they as fully accept the truth that the great object of the mission of the Saviour of the world was to recover man from the sin of Disobedience, and by his own perfect obedience to the will of God, to lead the way and set the example, and ordain the instrumentalities by which Obedience to the will of God, by Faith in his Son, shall be reinstated in the soul of man.

I am fully aware that these views will not be acceptable to those who deny the degeneracy of man, who look upon "human nature with unmingled feelings of pride and satisfaction, and represent all who speak of mankind as degenerate, as being the greatest enemies of the race."

I pause a moment simply to ask whether to this fundamental theological difference of views on the nature of man leading to the preaching of two opposite gospels, may not be logically traced the great physical strife now enacting before our eyes? It would not be difficult, I think, to show that the fierce anti-slavery element, which is the true cause of our sectional strife, and not Slavery, as so many have falsely been taught to believe, is the legitimate fruit of humanitarian doctrines.

Indeed, it is the boast of some eminent disciples of Channing, that to those who teach their gospel is the honor due of this anti-slavery war. "Honor to whom honor." If they find a satisfaction in this result of their zeal, it is a satisfaction which I confess I do not covet. The ruin of the noblest country of the world, the hecatomb of corpses of fathers and brothers murdered by fathers and brothers, the fearful chorus of widows' and orphans' cries wafted on every breeze from thousands of desolate homes, fields wasted, States depopulated—these, and such as these, are the boasted trophies of humanitarian philanthropy. And all for what? Oh! to enthrone human Freedom! Great is the Goddess of Freedom!

Commending this phase of the subject to the serious reflection and examination of Christians, I shall proceed on the assumption that the theological basis of the argument has thus far been proved, to wit, that the Saviour's mission to fallen man was to restore the lost image of God to man's soul, by the implanting therein of Obedience in place of Disobedience. We are now prepared to look into the Social System ordained for man as he is; and to inquire whether God in the Bible has not so organized human society, as to make its various relations coöperative to the same great end of man's restoration. I have alluded to the efforts of Socialistic dreamers to reform Society, prompted thereto by their observing the inequalities, the oppressions, the corruptions, the miseries, which the mass of men suffer under all known Governments and Social institutions, whatever their form. I have called their efforts folly, for in comparison with that Social System which God has clearly ordained, they are eminently foolish, for all of them have this fundamental and characteristic defect, that their tendency is rather to keep alive and to invigorate the great primal sin of our nature, Disobedience, and destroy its antidote, Obedience.

Man from his very nature dislikes restraint; he would have his own way, at all hazards, and hence it is that no appeal takes deeper hold of all his passions and instincts than an appeal to his love of freedom; it was the original bait of the Tempter, which lured man to his ruin, for he had not the forecast to scan the consequences, nor to discriminate between a true and false freedom; he did not, in his short-sightedness, comprehend that Slavery to God was Man's highest Freedom. The very word Freedom carries a thrill of ecstasy through his frame, whenever it is pronounced, and he rushes madly forward, regardless of all impediments, with uncontrollable frenzy, through the most appalling dangers, even to death itself, under the infatuation of this war-cry of freedom.

How shall such a nature, set on fire by a word that kindles at once all its fierceness, be curbed and repressed within the bounds of reason? We all know that those qualities in that noble animal, the horse, which, under due restraint, and with proper control, under the bit and rein, fit him best for the uses to which his nature adapts him, would, without this restraint, make him a scourge to man, and bring swift destruction upon himself. So man, having qualities which, rightly directed, fit him for society, is yet by his present nature under the control of a proud self-will; he needs, therefore, a system of restraints, and God has wisely and benevolently ordained a Social System for him, perfectly adapted to that nature.

What, then, is the Social System which God has ordained?

It consists of four distinct, clearly defined, but cooperative relations, thus laid down in the New Testament:

First. CIVIL GOVERNMENT, in which the relation of Ruler and Ruled is ordained.* (See proofs in Appendix.)

Second. The MATRIMONIAL; in which the relation of Husband and Wife is ordained. (See Appendix.)

Third. The PARENTAL; in which the relation of Parent and Child is ordained. (See Appendix.) And

Fourth. The SERVILE; in which the relation of Master and Slave is ordained. (See Appendix.)

Now, here we have drawn out by the Pen of Inspiration a perfect Social System, the Divine plan adapted to man as a fallen being, in his disciplinary state; that is to say, to man as he is. Let us examine its structure.

In these four relations we discover several significant traits. They are seen to be coöperative, they each perform an essential part in the discipline of man, and act conjointly, each in its own sphere, to produce the same great result, which the mission of the Saviour was intended to produce, to wit, the establishment of Obedience in the soul of man. There is a unity of purpose in this arrangement which reveals the mind and hand of the same Divine Author.

Each relation, it will also be seen, is a duality; it consists of two parties—one a superior, the other an inferior, and Obedience is the significant lesson taught in each relation.

A. In the relation of Civil Government, the Ruler is superior, and the ruled are inferior, and obedience to the Ruler is commanded from the ruled.

B. In the Matrimonial Relation, the Husband is superior, "the head," and the Wife the inferior, "the weaker vessel," and obedience to the Husband is commanded from the Wife.

C. In the Parental Relation, the Parent is superior, and the Child is inferior, and obedience to the Parent is commanded from the Child.

D. In the Servile Relation the Master is superior, and the Slave the inferior, and obedience to the Master is commanded from the Slave.

* The quotations from the Bible, establishing these relations, are (for the convenience of reference) given in full in the Appendix, under their appropriate heads.

Can this unity of purpose, this arrangement of correlatives, be accidental? each and all enforcing one and the same idea, and that the one great central idea in Man's Redemption, to wit, Obedience, the natural antidote to Disobedience? We think it dangerous for a novice to tamper with the arrangements of a machine contrived by a skillful inventor to accomplish a definite purpose, and to venture to remove a wheel which, to his untutored mind, seems superfluous, or which he fancies is antagonistic to that purpose. How much more dangerous to tamper with the plans of God, and to arraign his wisdom in so deep and mysterious a design as the restoration of man's nature, and presumptuously to strike out from the Divine System of Human Society one of its four great regulators, and declare it to be not merely superfluous, not merely useless, but arrogantly to pronounce it sinful?

Have those who pronounce Slavery to be sin actually considered the fearful responsibility they incur by the utterance of such a reckless, and, we will say, such a sacrilegious dogma? Will the advocates of this dogma tell us on what principle they endeavor to sustain the validity of Civil Government, the Matrimonial Relation, and the Parental Relation, as ordinances of God, in each of which the essential idea of Slavery, Obedience to a superior, is inherent, and then single out the fourth relation—the Servile Relation—which, by divine command, is as distinctly and unqualifiedly regulated and made as much a component part of the Social System as the others, and not only deny it to be an ordinance of God, but declare it to be sinful?*

By what course of reasoning, then, or by what authority of the Bible, do they venture upon this glaring mutilation? Oh! it will be answered, and is answered: "It is revolting to all the instincts of humanity; nature cries out against it." Well, what then? Are the instincts of human nature, of fallen Human nature, our guide? We know that human nature, as it is, chafes under restraint, it writhes under the infliction of the penalties that check its purpose to act as it pleases in all things.* But why single out the fourth relation, which regulates the relative duties of Master and Slave, for denunciation as sin, and not include the other three relations?

* It is worthy of note, that the Etymology of our English word Obedient readily discovers its derivation from the Hebrew root "Ebed," a slave; Ebed, however compounded, in the Hebrew always carries into its derivatives the idea of Slavery; so that the command to obey, which is the central idea in all the Social relations, carries with it the inherent idea of Slavery.

To be consistent, all the other ordained relations must be denounced, for each one has the essential idea of Slavery in it, to wit, Obedience to authority. Remove that, and the relation has no soul. The ultra abolitionists are more consistent in this respect than those who concentrate their objurgations upon the Servile relation alone. Making Freedom their starting-point, they do denounce Civil Government, because in commanding Obedience to Rulers, it restrains man's natural freedom. They do denounce the Matrimonial relation, because it binds woman in the bonds of marriage, commands obedience to her husband, and so restrains the free-love propensities of both. And there are women, we blush to say it, so inoculated with the ultra free notions of the day, as shamelessly to violate the proprieties and reserve of their Social position, and, aping the habits of men, have aspired to be political brawlers, to the destruction of that delicate unobtrusiveness which is their charm in their proper sphere, and which gives them, in their homes, their real power over man—a power which they foolishly sacrifice to grasp a shadow. If these dreamers seem more reserved, on the third relation, in their writings and speeches, it is more seeming than real, since our youth we find early indoctrinated into the notion that all restraint is tyranny, that Obedience is oppression and an infringement of their natural rights, and so are preparing to act their part in their day and generation in the great millennium of indiscriminate freedom.

How can we account for this monomania in regard to Slavery which has seized upon so many otherwise sane minds? It must be that most, if not all, of those so fierce in denouncing Slavery are deceived by an imaginary monster, dressed up by their imaginations with every attribute that is hideous and revolting, and which can excite disgust and horror; to them, slavery, tyranny, and oppression are synonymous, and in their speeches, sermons, and prayers they are convertible terms, and are thus indiscriminately used. They have made a man of straw, and with all the visionary enthusiasm of a Quixote, are fiercely bent on a valiant encounter with this phantom, the creation of their own heated fancy. Is it possible to reason with men thus exalted? Will they calmly, as well as boldly, look this phantom full in the face? If they will, they can not but perceive that those traits which have excited their horror, seen through the mist with which a proud infidel philosophy has enveloped them are altogether extrinsic and accidental, it is not the slavery of the Bible, nor of the Southern States, but a creature of their own imagination, clothed in a frightful livery, which has, studiously and persistently for years, been made up for it, from the abuses of the system. What then is Slavery? Slavery is the state of subjection which an individual, or a number of individuals, holds to authority, whether that authority be in a person, persons, sentiments, or things. That which compels Obedience is his Master, and to that, be it a person, a sentiment, or a thing, he is a slave. Nowhere is Slavery denounced in the Bible as sin per se. It is denounced when it is connected with that which is sinful, whether it be with a person, or sentiment, or thing, and it invariably receives its moral complexion from the moral character of the master. The slave of Sin is doubtless a Sinner; but how is it with the "Slave of righteousness," the "Slave of God," the "Slave of Jesus Christ"! for this is the phraseology used in the New Testament, a phraseology which of itself disproves the sinfulness of Slavery *per se.

* No culprit feels the halter draw
With good opinion of the law.—Hudibras.

* In the passages quoted I have given the Greek word (δουλος, doulos) its true meaning in English. It is "slave, bondman, strictly one born so."

The Greek text is our guide, not a translation, however excellent. Many English words, since the times of the King James translation of the Bible, have changed their meaning. Our word "servant" is one of these. It has come to mean "one who serves," whether a bondman or a hired servant, thus confounding two distinct classes of domestics. The only way, therefore, of knowing the true

I can not, therefore, but think that to a false and exaggerated conception of the nature of Slavery, conjured up in the imaginations of men, unnaturally excited by dwelling upon extreme instances of the abuse of the relation, may be attributed that excessive vehemence against the relation itself which has warped the judgments, intensified the hate, and perverted the zeal of so many good men. That there is a relation expressed in the Bible by the terms Master and Slave, clearly ordained by God, is as certain as that he has ordained the cognate relations of Ruler and Ruled—Husband and Wife—Parent and Child; and it is quite as easy to dress up a hideous monster from the abuses in all and each of these cognate relations, by collecting together the instances of abuse of the power inherent in all of them, and dwelling upon their enormity till indignation is excited to fever heat, and then, instead of rightly directing that indignation to correct these abuses, which are abuses of administration, and not inherent in the system, adroitly pervert it to destroy the relation itself.

We say it is easy thus to call up a hideous phantom, and present it as the embodiment of each and all these relations, and so raise an outcry against the relation itself—this has already been done to our hand. There are sects of "No Government" enthusiasts, who have taken this very method to denounce all Government. There are sects of "Free lovers," who would abolish the matrimonial relation by the same method, attributing the ill-treatment, outrages, and murders of wives, details of which they find in abundance in every day's journals, to the restraint imposed by the bonds of matrimony. And if in respect to the Parental relation, no direct organization has been formed to abolish it, its power has been interfered with, and its machinery remodeled to suit the impracticable whims of those who would abolish the Matrimonial relation, on which the Parental relation so directly depends.

In view of the fact that Slavery or the Servile relation is proved to be one of the indispensable regulators of the Social system, divinely ordained for the discipline of the human race in this world, and that it is in perfect harmony not only with the cognate relations of Civil Government, the Matrimonial relation, and the Parental relation, but also with the great declared object of the Saviour's mission to earth, what influence should such a fact have upon some of the political questions of the day? If the Servile relation is an essential and indispensable divinely arranged part of the Social system, is not the attempt to blot it out altogether by force in any community, under the plea that it is sin, an evil, a wrong, and an outrage on humanity, or, indeed, on any other plea, sacrilegious? Let me not be misunderstood. I do not say that the relation may not be modified, indeed, like all the others, by those who have the legal control of it, by loosening or drawing tighter, according to circumstances, the restraints imposed on the inferior, even to that degree that sense of the original text, is to recur to the original words; and in this case, the word in our version translated servant, wherever the original word in Greek is δουλος, (doulos,) or any of its derivatives, is slave or bondman, and I have, therefore, given in all instances where doulos is in the original, its true translation slave.

Another example of the change in the sense of English words, is in the word prevent. If we had not recourse to the original, our translation of the passage, "in the morning shall my prayer prevent thee," would seem to imply that our prayer hindered God from doing something; because, now, prevent means to hinder. But the meaning of prevent, at the time of our translation, was to come before. Recurring to the original then, to clear up the difficulty, it is readily done by giving the original meaning: "In the morning shall my prayer come before thee."

A few passages in which the word slave occurs, (doulos, δουλος,) will amply confirm the truth that Slavery receives its moral complexion from the moral character of the Master. Paul, in the Epistle to Romans and, in numerous other places, styles himself the "Slave of Jesus Christ." In Colossians he calls "Epaphras a Slave of Jesus Christ." Peter, and James, and Jude, as well as Paul, style themselves "Slaves of Jesus Christ," and the latter, in Romans 6:16, holds this language: "Know ye not that to whom ye yield yourselves slaves to obey, his slaves ye are to whom ye obey, whether of sin unto death or of obedience unto righteousness. But, God be thanked, that ye, having been the slaves of sin, (but ye) have obeyed from the heart that form of doctrine which was delivered you. Being, then, made free from sin, ye became enslaved [edoulothete, εδουλωθητε] to righteousness; for as ye have yielded your members slaves to uncleanness and to iniquity unto iniquity, even so now yield your members slaves to righteousness unto holiness. For when ye were slaves to sin, ye were free from righteousness, but now being made free from sin, and become slaves of God, ye have your fruit," etc.

restraints shall in effect disappear; but I do say that, in the present condition of humanity, no modification can legitimately obliterate the relation altogether, nor absolve the inferior from the duty of rendering obedience to the superior. Civil Government is modified by different forms throughout the world, from the most despotic to the most republican. There are evils in every form, because of the natural tendency of man to abuse his power. But because these evils, these accidents of the relation exist, is it a sound position to attempt with the "No Government" fanatics to put down all government? Yet with regard to Slavery, this is precisely the position of abolitionists. Government is modified in the severity of its restrictions just so far as the people, by their training to obedience to law, make it politic and wise; and a people intelligent, just, self-controlled, and truly religious, require none of the severities which are necessary to a people of the opposite character—ignorant, unjust, restive, factious, and irreligious. These changes from severe to mild, or vice versa, in proportion as a people or a race are prepared for them, will be inaugurated, whether man wills it or not; and the form of government will be imposed by a mightier hand than man's, according to the necessities of the case, in spite of all opposition; for man can not abrogate what God has ordained. Government will never be abandoned in this world till by its operation on character all men shall have bowed their own wills to the Supreme will. Government, says Herbert Spencer, "is an institution originating in man's imperfection—to the bad it is essential, to the good not. It is the check which national wickedness makes to itself, and exists only to the same degree that wickedness exists. Its continuance is proof of still existing barbarism. What a cage is to the wild beast, law is to the selfish man. Restraint is for the savage, the rapacious, the violent; not for the just, the gentle, the benevolent. All necessity for external force implies a morbid state. Dungeons for the felon; a strait-jacket for the maniac; crutches for the lame; stays for the weak-backed; for the infirm of purpose a master; for the foolish a guide; but for the sound mind, in a sound body, none of these. Were there no thieves and murderers, prisons would be unnecessary. Magisterial force is the sequence of social vice, and the policeman is the complement of the criminal. Therefore it is we call Government a necessary evil. Is it not the offspring of evil, bearing about it all the marks of its parentage? Does it not exist because crime exists? Is there not more liberty, that is, less Government, as crime diminishes?"

There is profound truth in all this, met with, it is true, in a field abounding with both flowers and nettles; yet this truth is sustained by coincident truth in the Bible. "The law is not made for a righteous man, but for the lawless and disobedient, for the ungodly and for sinners." (1 Tim. 1:19.) And again: "If ye be led of the Spirit, ye are not under the law; the fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance, against such there is no law." (Gal. 5, 18:22.)

McCosh, in his admirable work on the Divine Government, holds substantially the same views. "Can we be wrong in supposing," he says, "that if man had been a being spotlessly pure, God would have governed him by a moral law, producing the same harmony throughout the world of mind as physical law does in the world of matter?" "It is questionable whether the mode of government best fitted for holy beings is at all adapted to those who have broken loose from the restraint of moral principle. When a father finds his children rebelling against him, and setting his authority at defiance, he must regulate his family on totally different principles from those adopted when the bonds that connected the members were confidence and love. God can not, in any case, abandon the government of any portion of his universe, and when he can not rule by moral laws, he must needs curb by physical restraint."

No truth could be better expressed. When man fell from his original exalted state of subjection to the Divine will, then the instrumentalities for curbing him by physical restraint, by the strong arm of power, were devised and put in operation, and in the Divine plan of a Social System we have these several instrumentalities perfectly established, free from all the inconsistencies and vulgarities, and shallow devices of the Social-System-mongers of the age.

All these relations are educational and disciplinary. Just in proportion as each of the two parties in the several relations conform to the Divine requirement of just rule on the one part, and cheerful obedience on the other, where these several relations are regulated by the law of Love, Society is peaceful, harmonious, prosperous, and the Slavery element in all of them is either so mitigated as to lose its severity, or it is made more stringent in its severity, just in proportion as the law is set at naught, being modified by the character of the individual or the community controlling or under control.

If in Civil Government the Ruler governs with justice, and is swayed by that love toward those over whom he rules which God has enjoined, it is readily perceived that his rule can not be oppressive or tyrannical, and the disposition to cheerful obedience on the part of the ruled is encouraged and strengthened. The Slavery, therefore, of this relation is in effect abrogated so soon and so far as it has accomplished its object in subduing the natural disobedience of the human heart, and tempered the character of a people with obedience to law. If, however, the ruled are fractious, turbulent, self-willed, vicious, the Slavery element inherent in government revives and manifests itself by more stringent measures, so that persistent disobedience is rebuked and subdued even by physical force. So in the Matrimonial relation, (where the Slavery element is of a milder type than in the other relations, being naturally tempered by a stronger Love in the two parties,) the obedience commanded becomes cheerful subjection, and then all revolting ideas of tyranny and oppression vanish, just so far as the parties conform to the rules that God has given for the regulation of that relation. When, however, the love that is enjoined disappears in the husband, and a willful, contrary, fractious spirit is manifested in the wife, then it is that disorder, contention, and wretchedness ensue in the family.

Again, in the Parental relation this same Slavery element is vigorous or mild, even disappearing altogether to suit the individual character of each child of a family. The Parent holding divinely appointed power, is commanded to use it temperately, not to provoke to wrath; but obedience is peremptorily commanded on the part of the child. Where the parental command is given in the temper required, and the child renders prompt and cheerful obedience, the bonds of its Slavery are not felt. But when the child is willful, headstrong, stubborn, unruly, then it is that the Slavery element of the relation asserts its power and brings its severities to bear, to subdue the native disobedience of the young heart, before its unrestrained exercise shall in manhood have given it a strength that will compel at a remoter period the Civil Governor to use the stronger and more effectual means of subjection, in order to protect Society from its violence.

And now in that relation in which the Slavery element is more strongly because directly pronounced, why should not the same reasoning be accepted? The Master is restrained from an unreasonable exercise of his power by motives drawn from his own responsibilities to a higher power; he must be just toward his Slave, but the Slave is commanded to Obey; when this obedience is cheerfully rendered by the Slave, and the Master exercises his power of command and direction in the temper required, are there any of those revolting appendages observable with which fanaticism delights to clothe it? On the contrary, are there not in this relation, when faithfully carried out according to the Divine directions, some of the most beautiful examples of domestic happiness and contentment that this fallen world knows? Protection and judicious guidance and careful provision on the one part; cheerful obedience, affection, and confidence on the other.

In the light of this argument, drawn from the highest law, we are able to detect the inconsistencies and infraction of civil law of those who hold that Slavery is Sin.

We see that if Slavery is Sin, it is not alone in the Servile relation proper, that this taint of Sin is found; but it is fundamental, is essential in the structure of all the other ordained relations of Society. But if in that relation in which it is more completely embodied, it is condemned as the very essence of sin; or, to use its favorite designation, "the sum of all villainies;" by consequence, consistency requires that this sin in all its ramifications be rooted out of all the other relations. This is in effect to say that Obedience, or subjection to authority, must be altogether blotted out of the Social System. This accomplished, what then? Then comes the boasted reign of universal abolition Freedom! The God of the new religion will have triumphed. Are its worshipers prepared for such a consummation? But the light of this argument exposes infraction of Civil Law. There is at least an outward professed assent to the great truth that Civil Government is an ordinance of God; that "the powers that be are ordained of God." In this I shall assume that all are agreed. There should be among the intelligent citizens of this country no difficulty in discovering the number, the names, and the functions of these Powers to which they are subject, and the proper sphere in which they each of them act. The Supreme power, the Sovereignty—that power from which all other political power is derived, is, under our form of government, the people, or more properly stated in reference to the Federal Government, the PEOPLES of the States, each State being organized as one people. The People of each State being the Supreme power of that State, establish their own independent government, embody their will in a written Law called the Constitution, name the officers to wield powers delegated to them, and prescribe the duties and the limitations of each subordinate power; and this without legitimate interference from without the State, except such as may arise from the restraints of International law. These several States or peoples in their Sovereign capacity consult together, and devise and adopt a Federal Union of States, and delegate powers to form a Federal Government; appoint the various subordinate powers of that Government; instruct them and limit them in all their actions, and unitedly declare their will in a carefully prepared written instrument—the Supreme law of the land, or the Constitution.

To this Constitution or Supreme law, (being the embodiment of the will of the Sovereign—the People,) every officer, from the President to a politican, is amenable; for it is the highest of "the powers that be," whence all the subordinate "powers that be" are derived. Every officer, then, throughout the land, of whatever name or grade, whether a President of the United States or a Governor of a State, or a sheriff of a county, is one of the "powers that be," just so long as he performs his legitimate duties within the limits prescribed by that Supreme power which delegated to him the only power he possesses, and no longer. For so soon as he steps beyond the limits of his people-appointed sphere of duties, he is no longer one of the powers that be, but a usurper, an infractor of the Law, and as deserving of punishment as any other violator of Law. Now, if there is any law that is clearly defined, forbidding action on a specific subject, it is that law of the Constitution which says: "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." When, therefore, religious tenets are obtruded into the political arena, virtually demanding a settlement of conscientious differences of opinion by a political action which adopts the views of one of the parties, thus in effect "prohibiting the free exercise" of the opposite opinion to the other party, is not that action a palpable infraction of the Supreme Law? Such action is as truly establishing by law a religious belief as the passing of a law making one of the denominational creeds the religion of the State.

What is the tenet declaring Slavery to be sin, preached for over thirty years in abolition pulpits, but a setting forth of a religious belief? And what is the opposite tenet declaring Slavery to be an ordinance of God but the declaration of a religious belief? The believers in these two antagonistic tenets form two violently opposed sects, and both plead conscience in maintaining their respective tenets, and appeal to the Bible to sustain their creeds.

And can there be two religious sects in more perfect antagonism than one believing and maintaining that to be sin which the other believes and maintains to be ordained and established by God? If it be not a religious question, what means the sermons in the pulpits, on Fast and Thanksgiving occasions, so universal at the present day, the lectures of the clergy and others, on Sundays and week days, the Resolutions of Synods and Conventions, and other Church organizations, and the rules of discipline in the various churches, excommunicating slaveholders, only because of their slaveholding, and their belief in the tenet, that Slavery is ordained of God? Do not these acts demonstrate the religious character of the crusade against that which they deem sin, and conclusively show it to be a religious question, upon which the political action of the Federal Government is urged with such zealous pertinacity? There are minds which can not, or at least, which do not, discriminate between political and religious duty; carried away by their religious feelings, they make all else bend to their own conscientious convictions. They have settled it immovably in their own minds that Slavery is sin, and therefore that it is right to press into the service of their consciences, political power, whether forbidden or not by the supreme law of the land. They cry conscience, and therefore believe themselves infallibly right. This is no imaginary or exaggerated statement. The affirmation that "John Brown was right because he acted conscientiously," is from a high political quarter.* This pleading of conscience, as a rule of right, should bear examination. They who believe Slavery to be sin, you say are conscientious. Granted. They also who believe it to be an ordinance of God, they who believe that abolitionists are the sinners, are also conscientious. Are both therefore, right? No, you will say; we are right, and they are wrong. Well, but they say that they are right, and you are wrong. How can that controversy be settled? Both plead conscience, both hold with pertinacity their own opinion, and therefore, according to your premises, both are right. John Brown is lauded, ay, canonized by some demented fanatics, because he carried out his conscientious convictions into act, and murdered innocent men and women in performing what he believed to be his duty. They who resisted him also carried out their conscientious convictions into act, captured, tried, and hung him. Why, on your principles, ought not they also to be lauded and canonized as well, especially as they acted under law, and he against law? Follow this out to the end, both now appeal to arms to sustain their conscientious convictions, what is the result? Let the condition of the country answer. The contests of conscience can in this way have no end but the annihilation of one or the other of the contestants. Do you say that it may be compromised? How? There can be no compromise between moral right and wrong. The annihilation, by force of arms, of those who admire the benevolence and the wisdom which they believe they see, if others do not, in the establishing of the Servile relation, can not make that sin which God has declared wise and proper! even after a thousand victories of arms. The question then forces itself upon us, What shall be done with this vexed subject of slavery? The answer is plain, Let it alone. Politically, as a Federal question, involving a religious conviction, we have certainly nothing to do with it; but whether Politically or Religiously, we have nothing to do with it in other States where Slavery exists. When the question, as a political one, is mooted, whether Slavery shall be established in the State of New-York, we, in New-York, can settle it for ourselves, without the aid or advice of the Federal Government, or of any of our sister States. Whatever our conscience or policy dictates in regard to our own State, is no rule or precedent for other States; and as to the judgment rendered by your conscience respecting their sentiments or actions, they may well ask: "Who art thou, who judgest another man's servant? To his own master he standeth or falleth." (Rom. 14 : 4.) "Why is my liberty judged by another man's conscience?" (1 Cor. 10 : 29.)

If action on this subject by any State is wrong, theirs is the responsibility; it is not ours.

But as an Ethical question, involving individual conscientious duty in regard to Slavery, there are some considerations which this argument suggests, which ought to have weight with Christians. It must be obvious to them, that many of the prominent errors of the day, manifested by social reformers, are traceable directly to a false theology, and the fruit of the original fundamental error of disbelief of the degeneracy of man, the framing of social theories on the basis of the nature of man, in the image of his Maker, as originally created, as if man is now what he was at his creation, is a pregnant example.

Ignoring the great paramount fact of man's present condition, as no longer pos sessing his original character, how can a true social theory be the result?

A philosophy which leaves out of view such a vital fact as man's degeneracy, or treats it as a myth, can not arrive at other than erroneous conclusions.

It is a fact worthy of special notice, that the extreme abolitionists yield the Bible argument, and virtually acknowledge that the Bible is against them. Hence, having discovered this fact, like all fanatics who worship their theory in spite of reason or religion, they are ready with irreverent presumption, to throw compass and charts overboard, if these do not indicate the pre-determined course they stubbornly insist on pursuing. Therefore it is they demand a new compass and a new chart, and cry out for an "anti-Slavery Bible and an anti-Slavery God."*

What does this blasphemous demand prove but that the Bible as it is, and the God which it reveals, do not support their abolition views?

But I proceed to the consideration of a momentous fact, sustained by carefully collated statistics, that a great radical error, long since adopted by the Christian community, respecting the Christianization of barbarous nations, has led to a course, in relation to slavery, directly calculated to defeat the great object for which the Christian world has long been striving, to wit, the Christianization and civilization of these barbarous races.

In 1860, my brother, Sidney E. Morse, formerly editor of the New-York Observer, proposed some two hundred questions on the subject of slavery. One great fact, put in the form of a question, but which could only be answered affirmatively, struck me with great force at the time, to wit: "That from the official records of the Baptist, Methodist, Presbyterian, Episcopal, and other Protestant churches, it was shown that nearly four hundred thousand (400,000) negroes (or one fifth part of the whole adult slave population of the Southern States) are members of Protestant Evangelical churches; while in all the churches of the Protestant missionary stations in the world, the number of converts is less than two hundred thousand, (200,000.)" Reflecting upon this statistical fact, seeing that the only great success of Christianity among the African race was precisely in that portion which was in slavery in the United States, I felt assured, that there must be somewhere a fundamental error, in regard to the influence of slavery upon that race, which had escaped detection by Christian men, and had led them into most dangerous paths. Hence, I presumed that an analysis of Bible principles of human society might lead to the detection of the error, and I thus was led to the method of investigation adopted in this argument. I had proceeded thus far in my labors, when I was put in possession of a work, through the courtesy of its learned author, which more than sustains, by indisputable data, the great fact above stated by my brother. This work, entitled, Pulpit Politics, a most valuable volume of over six hundred pages, is the result of the research and labor of Prof. David Christy, of Cincinnati. It is a careful collation of statistics from the best official sources, invaluable to Christian men, whether clergymen or laymen, and specially instructive to the statesmen and politicians of the day. It should be in the library of every citizen. I draw from this rich repository some important facts developed in the history of the past half-century, which fully confirm and strengthen this argument.

The great error of the day, in regard to slavery, lies imbedded far back in the history of anti-slavery agitation, and is of English origin, imported thence, and transplanted to a soil in New-England, but too congenial to its growth.

As far back as 1823, in England, the celebrated Mr. Buxton put forth in Parliament this dogma: "The continuance of Slavery and the principles of the Christian religion are incompatible." Here was the embryo of that more positive tenet that all slavery is sin, afterward embodied in the programme of the American Anti-Slavery Society, in 1833, which Society took this ground, "that nothing short of immediate and unconditional emancipation could satisfy the demands of justice, and fulfill the righteous law of God." To Mr. Buxton's dogma, the celebrated Canning, clear-sighted and prophetic, replied in one of his most eloquent speeches, a paragraph from which is of great significance at this hour, and is earnestly commended to the attention of those so loudly laudatory of the President's Emancipation Proclamation. "Sir," said Mr. Canning, "we must remember that we are dealing with a being possessing the form and strength of a man, but the intellect only of a child. To turn him loose in the manhood of his physical strength, in the maturity of his physical passions, but in the infancy of his uninstructed reason, would be to raise up a creature resembling the splendid picture of romance; the hero of which can sketch a human form, with all the corporeal capabilities of a man, and with the thews and sinews of a giant; but being unable to impart to the work of his hands a perception of right and wrong, he finds too late that he has only created a more than mortal power of doing mischief, and himself recoils from the monster of his own creation."

We are experiencing at this very moment the beginnings of the work of this power of mischief, this monster conjured up and sedulously nurtured, and now, while I write, arming for his frightful work; preparing, under the influence of blind councils, for scenes of horror, which will call forth tears of blood from another and sobered generation. Deplorable as is this course marked out by short-sighted politicians, it is still more mournful to see some of the professed disciples of the Prince of Peace, under the spell of this horrible delusion, sustaining and encouraging it with all their zeal and eloquence as a Christian cause; but so it is that, having adopted as a truth, a dogma unsupported by any authority or experience from the Bible, or from Providential developments, but contradicted by both, and only taken to be truth on the dictum of a good but deluded man, they have been led into the most pernicious measures, directly counteracting their own benevolent purposes of salvation to a barbarous people, utterly ruinous to the country, to religion, and to the degraded race for whose benefit they profess to labor.

After nearly fifty (50) years' labor by the American churches in the Foreign field, they can count but about forty-four thousand five hundred (44,500) members among the free negroes, while the churches at the South can number more than half a million, five hundred and twenty-four thousand seven hundred and sixty-six (524,766) among their slaves! The Methodist missions in Liberia have labored forty-two (42) years, expended more than five hundred thousand (500,000) dollars, and in 1862, their report gives, as the grand result, sixty five (65) native members!

The united Presbyterian church in Trinidad, among the free negroes, has been organized for twenty (20) years, and numbered, as the result of their labors, six (6) converts!!

These are stubborn facts, confirmed by careful, laborious, dispassionate research. The details will be found in Professor Christy's work, to which we refer the reader.

Now, what is the logical inference from these facts? The most unfortunate and calamitous dictum of Mr. Buxton, however philanthropically intended, "that the continuance of Slavery and the principles of Christianity are incompatible," does not stand the test of fifty years' experimenting, on the ground that it is a truth.

No dogma ever uttered is proved to be more directly opposite the truth, more directly at variance with the teachings of the Bible and the experience of Missionary history.

Experience shows that the converse of this dogma, as a general rule, is the truth. CHRISTIANITY HAS BEEN MOST SUCCESSFULLY PROPAGATED AMONG A BARBAROUS RACE, WHEN THEY HAVE BEEN ENSLAVED TO A CHRISTIAN RACE. Slavery to them has been Salvation, and Freedom, ruin. This is a proposition that stands the test both of Scripture and experience. Observe how perfectly it conforms to the Divine plan of the Social System, brought to view in this argument.

It is a truth to be well pondered, that the whole human race without government is barbarous, and it is only by the establishment of government in its various modifications, to suit the various classes and conditions of society, that man, from the earliest stages of his existence, has ever been civilized. No one will dispute this fact. In all these relations of the Social System, therefore, we perceive that Obedience is the central idea, and Government (more definitely and in its largest scope ordained in the first relation) is a notable and significant idea in all the other relations. The Matrimonial, the Parental, and the Servile relations, are all governments in limited spheres, adapted to operate upon the particular classes over which each relation extends. If this be so, as a moment's reflection will show, then when we consider that the great prevailing characteristic of a barbarous race is anarchy; that lawlessness, insubordination, and every conceivable form of licentiousness, are in the ascendant, we are shut up to the conclusion that such a race must first have a government imposed upon it from without; for, there are no elements within it from which to form a government. In the light of this truth, how does that ordinance of God which so many in our day have recklessly stamped as foolishness, illustrate the Bible truth that "the foolishness of God is wiser than men!" The Servile relation is a government adapted to just such a race, and God, in his wisdom and far-sighted benevolence, has ordained that despised and vilified relation as the means of bringing that race home to himself. This is the Bible theory, and the experience of the day sustains it in both aspects of the question. When the relation of Master and Slave is left to its natural workings under the regulations divinely established, and unobstructed by outside fanatic busybodyism, the result, on the enslaved and on society at large, is salutary and benevolent. When resisted, as it is by the abolitionism of the day, we have only to look around us to see the horrible fruits, in every frightful, and disorganizing, and bloody shape.

Crimination and recrimination, the bandying of opprobrious epithets, will not restore our Union. Force will not restore it. Peace, harmony, fraternal affection, can not come from the physical instrumentalities which fanaticism has brought into existence, and is using so fiercely to attain an impracticable end. Fanaticism, leaning on the church, fanaticism encouraged and hounded on, with all the wild zeal of a Peter the Hermit, supported by a false conscience, a wicked conscience, can never restore the Union.

The seeds of Peace must be sown by the true disciples of the Prince of Peace. As this war of separation commenced in the churches, so must the first steps for conciliation come up from the churches. They who have turned their pulpits into rostra for partisan harangues, must exorcise first their own hearts and then their pulpits from the demoniacal possession. It is they who are in fault, who have adopted, and who disseminate, with all their zeal, the false belief, and have joined in the deceptive cry that "Slavery is Sin, and the cause of our civil war; down, therefore, with Slavery." If the doctrine in this argument is sound, they will be convinced that it is not Slavery, but the fanatic resolve to blot out an ordinance of God, which lies at the root of our national troubles. It is abolitionism that is our national sin, and a sin flagrant enough, too, to call down the judgments under which we suffer. Christians oppose the insane and licentious vagaries of the Free-love faction, a faction which would abolish the Matrimonial relation, on the ground of the abuses and cruelties which every day's police-reports expose to the world, and which, they say, should devote it to destruction. If these free-lovers should acquire political power sufficient to wield the resources of the government, and their political campaign-cry should be, "Down with Matrimony," they would be opposed to the death by every decent citizen, and a civil war would ensue. Would Matrimony or anti-Matrimony be the cause of that war? Would they who uphold that relation which God has ordained, or they who would abolish it as sin, be the responsible inciters of the strife? The absurdity, and wickedness, and impracticability of the attempt in this case of the free-love fanatics is at once perceived: can not the like absurdity in the case of Slavery and abolitionism be also discerned?

I am fully aware of the hold which the wide-spread and long-continued influence of abolition sophistry, through the wrest- ings of Scripture,* and the inflammatory appeals to the instincts of human nature, has had on so many of the clergy individually and in conventions, and in the resolutions of various church organizations. How lamentable that many of these latter organizations should be left blindly to incur the fearful responsibility of adding to the catalogue of those sinful acts, which they have voted as deserving of the extremest church censure, to wit, excommunication, a presumed sin which can nowhere be found in the Bible. How is it possible that men with the Bible in their hands can be so deluded as not to see that by their sanctioning such an extreme measure for such a cause, they have rendered themselves amenable to a direct apostolic excommunication. See if this is not true. Consider for a moment how universal at the South is the opinion among those excellent men there, whom the Christian world esteem to be Christians, if others do not, that the relation of master and slave is a divine ordinance. You say they are in error; they say you are in error; they hold their opinions as conscientiously as you do yours; you, in conformity with your declared opinion, have proceeded to excommunicate them from the Church. Have you duly reflected, with how much more propriety, with what greater show of authority, they might proceed to excommunicate you from the Church? Read the First Epistle to Timothy at the 6th chapter.† Paul is giving special directions to Timothy on this very subject of Slavery, he charges him with the instructions to be given to each of the parties in this servile relation; how the slave is to esteem his master, and the master his slave; and he then describes the abolitionists of that day, they who "taught otherwise," and holding them up for stern rebuke, declares what discipline is to be dealt out to such disorganizers αφίστασο απω των τοιουτων, [aphistaso apo ton toiouton,] "separate from them," "remove from them."

* Wrestings of Scripture. Few are aware to what a fearful extent these wrestings have gone. The most popular quotations to sustain abolitionism are false, distorted, irrelevant applications of Scripture, none of them bearing sober examination. Take, for example, those made in Helper's book, not one of them having any true application to the subject.

In other words, he calls upon the Church summarily to excommunicate them. Can you find like authority in the teachings of the Saviour or of his apostles for any such rebuke of Slavery or Slaveholding? No one who examines, even in the most cursory manner, the aspect of public affairs, but must perceive that it is this war upon Slavery, and not Slavery, which is the apple of discord in Church and State. Even those who would have been shocked at the idea in the outset of waging a war to root out Slavery from the land, now acquiesce with a certain complacency, saying that although they would not commence a war for the purpose, yet since it has been commenced, and as they flatter themselves not by their fault, they are rejoiced that the final abolition of Slavery is insured. To such I say, Do you comprehend what such a position as you assume implies? It implies just this: you would not make war directly on an institution proved by the Bible and by experience to be divinely devised for good to a barbarous race, or barbarous men, but you are glad, on the whole, that war has been declared against it, and that its destruction is probably insured; the result, indeed, will be the placing them in a condition which will inevitably undo all that Christian benevolence has hitherto done for them, and reduce them again to barbarism. They will be taken from a position where Christianity has reached them, and does now reach them, and can continue to reach them successfully, and they will be put into a condition which you dignify with the name of freedom, a condition in which experience has proved conclusively they can not be reached.

If the Bible truth and missionary experience had their proper influence upon you, you would rather rejoice at the wise forecast which provided for a weak and degraded race the Christian supervision of governors suited to their condition, providing for their temporal as well as spiritual good, and making them a blessing instead of a curse to the world. But it may be you still insist that the extirpation of Slavery will be a blessing, and that it is to be accomplished in the present strife. You will be egregiously mistaken in the result. There may possibly be a change of the masters—they who have been instrumental in Christianizing the barbarous race committed to their training may be destroyed, and the Slaves turned over to a new set of inexperienced masters whose key-note is freedom—but they will be slaves still, despite of all your efforts to free them, or by whatever names of freedom you choose to call them. You may call them freedmen, you may proclaim liberty to them till doomsday, but when you see, as you inevitably will, the fruit of your folly, in your war on providential arrangements, and of your obstinate blind resistance of God's plan for elevating these degraded beings, then will come the bitter memories of the counsels of statesmen and Christians rejected, of warnings despised, "the name of God and his doctrine blasphemed," vain regrets for the best blood of the country poured forth like water, and for the millions of treasure worse than wasted in fraternal strife; awaking from the delusive dream of a hollow freedom, the figment of infidelity, you will find those chains which a false philanthropy had, in imagination, seen fettering the negro, in sad reality fastened upon your own limbs; the boasted liberty and equality which abolition fanaticism had forced upon the slave turned into disastrous license and hopeless debasement; the country divided, ruined; the scorn, the sport, and the prey of foreign powers; your own freedom a glittering shadow of the past, and your necks in the dust under the iron heel of military rule. This is the dark programme for a day of fasting and repentance, when abolitionism has done its work, and God shall write the doom of the country in letters of blood, for the warning of the world:

THIS IS THE NATION THAT PROUDLY DARED TO DEFY MY WISDOM, AND CALL MY ORDINANCES SIN.

APPENDIX.

FIRST RELATION—CIVIL GOVERNMENT; or the Relation of RULER, and RULED.

Titus 3: 1—Put them in mind to be subject to principalities and powers, to obey magistrates.

Romans 13—Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers, for there is no power but of God. The powers that be are ordained of God. Whosoever, therefore, resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God. And they that resist shall receive to themselves damnation. For Rulers are not a terror to good works, but to the evil. Wilt thou not then be afraid of the power? Do that which is good, and thou shalt have praise of the same. For he is the minister of God to thee for good. But if thou doest that which is evil, be afraid, for he beareth not the sword in vain, for he is the minister of God, a revenger to execute wrath upon him that doeth evil.

Wherefore ye must needs be subject not only for wrath, but also for conscience sake, for this cause pay ye tribute also, for they are God's ministers, attending continually upon this very thing. Render therefore, to all their dues, tribute to whom tribute, custom to whom custom, fear to whom fear, honor to whom honor.

1 Peter 2: 13—Submit yourselves to every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake, whether it be to the King, as Supreme, (or the Supreme power,) or unto Governors, as to them that are sent by him for the punishment of evil-doers, and for the praise of them that do well. For so is the will of God. Honor all men. Love the brotherhood. Fear God. Honor the King.

SECOND RELATION—The MATRIMONIAL; or the Relation of HUSBAND and WIFE.

Titus 2: 4—Teach the young women to be sober, to love their husbands—to be obedient to their own husbands.

Eph. 5: 22—Wives, submit yourselves unto your own husbands as unto the Lord. For the husband is the head of the wife, even as Christ is the head of the church. Therefore, as the church is subject unto Christ, so let the wives be subject to their own husbands in every thing.

So ought men to love their wives as their own bodies. Let every one of you in particular so love his wife even as himself, and the wife see that she reverence her husband.

1 Pet. 3: 1—Likewise, ye wives, be in subjection to your own husbands. Let your adorning be the hidden man of the heart in that which is not corruptible—for after this manner in the olden time, the holy women also who trusted in God adorned themselves, being in subjection to their own husbands, even as Sarah obeyed Abraham, calling him Lord. Likewise, ye husbands, dwell with them, according to knowledge, giving honor unto the wife as unto the weaker vessel.

Colos. 3: 18—Wives, submit yourselves unto your own husbands as it is fit in the Lord. Husbands, love your wives, and be not bitter against them.

THIRD RELATION—The PARENTAL; or the Relation of PARENT and CHILD.

Colos. 3: 18—Children, obey your parents in all things, for this is well pleasing unto the Lord. Fathers, provoke not your children, less they be discouraged.

Eph. 6: 1—Children, obey your parents in the Lord, for this is right. Honor thy father and mother, which is the first commandment with promise. And, ye fathers, provoke not your children to wrath.

FOURTH RELATION—The SERVILE; or the Relation of MASTER and SLAVE.

Eph. 6: 5 — Slaves, δουλοι [douloi] be obedient to them that are your masters according to the flesh, with fear and trembling in singleness of your heart as unto Christ, not with eye-service as men-pleasers, but as the slaves [douloi] of Christ, doing the will of God from the heart; with good will doing service as to the Lord, and not to men. Knowing that whatsoever good thing any man doeth, the same shall he receive of the Lord, whether he be bond or free. And, ye masters, do the same things unto them, forbearing threatening, knowing that your master also is in heaven, neither is there respect of persons with him.

1 Tim. 6: 1 — Let as many slaves [douloi] as are under the yoke count their own masters worthy of all honor, that the name of God and his doctrine be not blasphemed. If any man teach otherwise and consent not to wholesome words, even the words of our Lord Jesus Christ, and to the doctrine which is according to godliness, he is proud, knowing nothing, but doting about questions and strifes of words, whereof cometh envy, strife, railings, evil surmisings, perverse disputings of men of corrupt minds and destitute of the truth, supposing that gain is godliness—from such withdraw thyself.

Col. 3: 18—Slaves, [douloi,] obey in all things your masters according to the flesh, not with eye-service as men-pleasers, but in singleness of heart, fearing God, and whatever ye do, do it heartily as to the Lord, and not to men, knowing that of the Lord ye shall receive the reward of the inheritance, for ye serve the master Christ; but he that doeth wrong shall receive for the wrong which he hath done, and there is no respect of persons. Masters, give unto your slaves [douloi] that which is just and equal, knowing that ye have a master in heaven.

1 Pet. 2: 18—Servants, οἰκεται,* [oiketai,] be subject to your masters with all fear, not only to the good and gentle, but also to the froward, for this is thankworthy, if a man for conscience toward God endure grief, suffering wrongfully; for what glory is it if when ye be buffeted for your faults ye shall take it patiently; but if when ye do well and suffer for it, ye take it patiently, this is acceptable to God.

Titus 2: 9 — Exhort slaves [douloi] to be obedient unto their own masters and to please them in all things, not answering again, not purloining, but showing all good fidelity.

A Presbytery of the "United Presbyterians," held in Steubenville, Ohio, very recently debated the question: "Whether it was consistent with the principles of the United Presbyterian Church to vote for C. L. Vallandigham." Their report says: "The Presbytery considered that voting for that candidate involved a great moral question, and that no member of the United Presbyterian Church could vote for him without ignoring his principles on slavery, and countenancing and encouraging disloyalty." The Clerk of the Presbytery writes: "It was gratifying to see how unhesitatingly the elders, as well as the ministers, gave an emphatic No to the question." It was unanimously decided in the negative.

"I administered the Supper on last Sabbath, and cut off every Butternut* in the congregation from the communion of the Church. There is no use in half-way measures in these times. It is an insult to the intelligence of the Church for rebel sympathizers or Butternuts to remain in her communion, and if they will not peaceably withdraw, they should be cut off."

These facts illustrate the lamentable apostasy which has been effected in the Church through abolition teachings, and the depth of degradation to which some religious teachers have been left to fall. True Christians in another age will look back upon the fanaticism of our days, as those of the present age now do upon the witchcraft delusions of the last century, with amazement and pity.

The above facts also illustrate the obtrusion of a religious sectarianism into the political arena, demanding, under penalty of Church censure, the support of a particular religious creed at the polls. With as much propriety the Baptists might threaten to excommunicate from their communion those of their members who should vote for a United Presbyterian because he believed in Pedo-baptism, this also being esteemed by Baptists a great moral question.

* οἰκεται [oiketai] is not a synonym of δουλοι, [douloi,] but means strictly "an inmate of one's house," but most usually a "house-slave;" this meaning gives still greater force to the injunction to obedience: since if they who are quasi-slaves, not so absolutely slaves as the [douloi,] are commanded to obey even froward or tyrannical masters, how much more if he were a slave in the sense of [doulos]?

TO THE PAPER WHICH JUDGE-ADVOCATE HOLT FURNISHED TO THE PRESIDENT, URGING GENERAL PORTER'S CONDEMNATION.

[It will be remembered by the public, that after the Court-Martial had made up their judgment and transmitted it to the President of the United States, Judge-Advocate-General Holt furnished to the President, without the knowledge of General Porter's Counsel, an argument in favor of condemning Porter. The able reply of Senator Johnson comes too late to save Porter from the cruel sentence inflicted on him, but not too late to save him in the hearts of his countrymen, who owe him all that a nation ever owed to a brave and faithful defender of her cause. It is a duty, in the performance of which all true Americans will unite, to give this document the widest possible circulation.—New-York Publishers.]

REPLY.

NOTE.—The references to the evidence, etc., are to the Record of the trial, as published by order of the House of Representatives.—Ex. Doc. No. 71. Thirty-seventh Congress, third Session.

THE preparation of this Reply was delayed until a printed copy of the Record in the case of Major-General Fitz-John Porter was obtained, and since, by professional engagements, which the writer was not at liberty to set aside. It is now submitted in the confidence that the intelligent and impartial reader will coïncide in opinion with the writer, that a greater injustice was never done through the forms of a judicial proceeding, than was done by the sentence of the Court-Martial in the case of that gallant officer.

BALTIMORE, July, 1863.

To vindicate a citizen unjustly assailed, is the duty of all men who properly estimate the value of individual character and its influence on the public good. The duty is the more imperative, if the services of such citizen have contributed to the honor of his country, and have been rendered with great toil and solicitude, and amidst frequent and imminent perils. To this general obligation in the instance which causes this paper, there is with the writer superinduced the special one growing out of the professional relation in which he has heretofore stood to the officer whose case forms its subject. His first personal acquaintance with Major-General Fitz-John Porter was, when he became one of his counsel on his recent trial. Before then, he knew him only, (and who did not so know him who has followed the history of our sad civil war?) as a patriotic, skillful and gallant officer, giving his days and nights to duty, ever discharging it to its fullest measure, and on all occasions answering the highest expectations of his superior officers, his friends and country. In his hands the military service had not only suffered no dishonor, but had attained even higher distinction. He had achieved for himself a name of which the nation was justly proud, and a reputation amongst all those of his brothers in arms, who, being themselves worthy of their noble profession, saw, without envy, every manifestation of his skill and gallantry, and rejoiced at it as enhancing the reputation of the service, and giving the assurance that a patriotic soldiery led, as Porter led his men, could not fail to extinguish the rebellion, restore the people to their former happiness and prosperity, reïnstate the Government in its rightful authority, and give it a name with the nations of the world, even brighter and more commanding than it had ever possessed. The high esteem in which, in common with all, the writer held Porter, was, if possible, increased after he became his counsel. And to that esteem was then soon added the closer and even stronger ties of personal friendship. For weeks, seeing him almost constantly, not only in the Court by whom his case was tried, but in private consultation, he had every opportunity of becoming acquainted with the man, and as far as he is capable of judging, with the officer. He witnessed in the former that freedom from vanity, that mildness of disposition with that firmness of purpose which are often united, and a strong sense of honor that won for him his highest regard, and in the latter a devotion to his profession, a perfect acquaintance with all the conflicts in which he had been engaged, a cheerful readiness in rendering honor where honor was due, a mildness of censure where he thought errors had been committed, an ardent love of country, and a confident consciousness of innocence of the charges which he was to answer, which, independent of all other evidence, satisfied him that such charges were in every particular wholly unfounded.

When the evidence was all given, he regrets to be compelled to say, that he was further satisfied that they were as malicious as unfounded. But, though then, and still so convinced, he would never have deemed it necessary to bring his case again before the public in the form of a vindication, notwithstanding the sentence of the Court affirming their truth, but for the reasons he is about to give. A defense was made before the sentence was pronounced, and by all who heard it, or who have since read it, a defense considered as triumphant and unanswerable. So universal was this opinion, that when the evidence and the defense had been seen, an acquittal was anticipated with undoubting confidence. So great and general was that confidence, that never in the history of jurisprudence, civil, criminal, or military, was a judgment announced that so shocked and startled the sense of public justice. In speaking of the ability of the defense, the undersigned but pays a just tribute to his associate counsel, Mr. Charles Eames, by whom it was, in every thing deserving praise, exclusively prepared. But what occurred without the knowledge of General Porter, or his counsel, whilst the case was progressing, and in the Court, whilst the evidence was being given, and at the close of the reading of the defense, and what has since occurred has rendered it proper, in the opinion of the writer, that the public judgment should be again invoked. Upon various grounds, it is not less due to Porter, and to truth—than to the good of the military service, and to the confidence so material to that good which is to be placed in future military judgments, that the attention of the public mind should be once more invited. The grounds referred to are these:

I. Pending the trial, the evidence of three of the leading witnesses of the prosecution, Major-General Pope, Brigadier-General Roberts, and Lieutenant-Colonel Thomas C. H. Smith, was secretly and anonymously published in Washington, in pamphlet form, with a title-page which, as evidently intended, would lead the reader to suppose that it contained either all the evidence in the case, or that the evidence that it did contain was in no particular rebutted by other proof. Porter has since discovered that the cost of this publication was paid by Smith, and that Roberts transmitted copies to persons in several of the Northern States, and as believed, to many members of the Senate of the United States, a fact disclosed in part in a short debate in that body at its recent session. On a motion calling for the Record for the purpose of publication—Mr. Fessenden objected, because, as he stated, the Record had already been printed, a copy of it having been sent to him, (by whom sent he did not say, because he did not know,) but doubtless by Roberts, or by his direction. Even by so discerning a gentleman and accomplished a lawyer as Fessenden, the fraud of the publication was not discovered.

II. The rulings of the Court, (which for obvious reasons could not be commented upon in the defense,) on questions of the admissibility of evidence in some instances, and as the undersigned believes in all, were so palpably erroneous, and so injurious to Porter, that they foreshadowed in colors too striking to be mistaken, the result to which a majority of the Court would arrive. These errors were so apparent as to excite the surprise, and incur the censure, as the writer knew at the time, of distinguished Judges, and members of the bar without an exception, unless the Judge-Advocate was one. It is not meant to say that he was, especially as on more than one occasion, he himself intimated the error and induced the Court to correct it.

III. When the evidence was all introduced, the counsel of Porter requested to have until the following Monday to prepare the defense, but the Court suggested, because of other pressing engagements of some of the members, the following Saturday. This suggestion was agreed to by the counsel with the understanding, sanctioned by the Court, that if the Judge-Advocate replied, the counsel should have the right to rejoin. Whether he would reply or not, that officer declined to say. The Court was then cleared, no one remaining with them but the Judge-Advocate. The evidence was, it is said, read over, doubtless commented upon by all, and from the celerity with which the sentence followed the reading of the defense, even charity can not but believe, that it was determined upon before a word of the defense was heard. The defense was read on Saturday, the tenth of January, 1863, and the moment it was concluded, which was about half-past two o'clock P.M., the Judge-Advocate said, orally, that he did not propose to answer it, but that he submitted the case on the part of the Government without remark. The Court was then cleared, the Judge-Advocate again remaining with them, and before six o'clock P.M., the sentence pronounced, that the accused "be cashiered," and "be forever disqualified from holding any office under the Government of the United States." The character of the evidence, as published from day to day in the journals of the country, had so satisfied the public of Porter's innocence, and that conviction become the more fixed and absolute when it was seen that the Judge-Advocate declined to answer the defense, thereby seemingly submitting to a judgment by default, and that the Court decided so immediately after the defense was closed, that all saw it was impossible, even that the evidence could have been read, much less so considered as is due to proper judgment, or the defense either read or compared with the evidence, a measure called for by judicial propriety and necessary to a just and enlightened conclusion. In this state of the public opinion, as manifested by the concurrent voice of the entire press, that spoke at all, the record was placed in the hands of the President. Unless he had before been unofficially advised of it, he must, when he read the sentence, have been struck with the same surprise with which its after announcement struck the public ear. Of all the men in the country, he must have experienced not only astonishment, but concern. In May, 1861, he had commissioned Porter a Colonel in the regular army, in August of the same year, a Brigadier-General of volunteers, and in July, 1862, and for distinguished services in the Peninsular campaign, a Brevet-Brigadier-General in the regular army, and a Major-General of volunteers. Honors due to him, in the view of the President, for amongst others, the services rendered to his country in the battle of Malvern, a battle which, in the words of his Chief, McClellan, in a letter to the President written just afterward, and near the battle-ground, and speaking, as he said, "not from hearsay, but from personal observation," that had eclipsed, "in its result any other engagement in the campaign," and that too much credit could not "be given to General Porter for his skill and gallantry on the occasion."

The President, then, could not but have paused before approving such a sentence and asked himself how it was possible that Porter, the idol of his men, the boast of the army, the pride of his chief, and the recipient of honors which, from a sense of public justice and gratitude, he had conferred upon him for distinguished and valuable services rendered his country in a most perilous crisis, should all at once have been so recreant to his past patriotism, so forgetful of his then well-earned and universally acknowledged fame, as to have committed acts almost before the ink was dry upon the parchments containing his commissions, and whilst the public heart was so gladdened by his deeds of skill and daring, as to demand, in the judgment of a Court composed of brother officers, that he "be cashiered," and "forever disqualified from holding any office of trust or profit under the Government of the United States."

The Record was of great volume. As published by Congress, inclusive of the defense, it consists of two hundred and ninety-eight closely printed octavo pages. The President should have taken time, before approving of such a sentence, the writer respectfully submits, to have examined it to find what it could contain to justify such a judgment. The mere sentence itself gave him no such information. It was, as is usual, but a mere naked judgment, and must, therefore, have left his mind in the condition of amazement in which it could not but have placed him. Nor could he discover why, if at all, his distinguished Judge-Advocate should have sanctioned such a result. The Record contained no reasons of that officer, summary or in detail. It did contain the defense of the accused, and if he had read that, his amazement could but have been increased, as he would have seen that it was, what all but the Court, or to speak (as there is reason to believe) more accurately, a bare majority, thought a complete and perfect vindication. The President's time, however, was perhaps so engrossed by matters which he supposed to be of more pressing national moment, (as if anything was more important than justice,) hat it was impossible, within the period, he twelfth of January, 1863, when the Record was placed in his hands, and his pproval of the sentence promulgated on he twenty-first of that month, that he ould have read it through carefully, or at ll, or examined the testimony, or tested he fairness or sufficiency of the defense, y an accurate or critical review of the vidence. Nor, as it now appears, did he ndertake what, in the interval referred o, would have been an impracticable task. or, as is stated in the review of the Judge-dvocate, which it is the main purpose of he writer to answer, on the thirteenth ay of January, 1863, the day after the Record was transmitted to him, the Presi-ent issued "written instructions" to that fficer, "to revise the proceedings of the ourt-Martial in the case of Major-General itz-John Porter, and to report fully upon ny legal questions that may have arisen n them, and upon the bearing of the estimony in reference to the charges and pecifications exhibited against the accused, nd upon which he was tried." These in-tructions produced an elaborate paper, lated the nineteenth of the same month. The Record between that day and the late of the instructions, and the prior hirteenth, must have been continuously n the exclusive possession of the Judge-Advocate. It is probable that the Record, with the review, was not returned to the President before the twentieth, but, how-ever that may be, it could not have been returned at the earliest sooner than the day of the date of the review, the nine-teenth, and on the twenty-first the sentence was approved. It is even, therefore, the more obvious than it would otherwise be, that in this short period of two days, proper examination and comparison of the proofs, and the bringing to their test Porter's defense, and subjecting to the same test the Judge-Advocate's review, (each vital to a proper consideration and just conclusion,) could not have been made by the President. The inference, there-fore, is irresistible, that in this instance at least; (with motives which his established character prevents our questioning, how much we may lament its weakness and in-justice,) he has rested his judgment, though severely calculated to dishonor a well-tried public servant whom he had but recently before, over and over again, honored by acts of distinguished official favor, upon the argument of his Judge-Advocate alone, without collating it even with the portions of the evidence quoted by that officer, much less with all the evidence so material to understand properly and justly the por-tions quoted, or even stopping to discover what is thought to be quite apparent, the depth of the prejudice which that officer entertained toward the accused. Repos-ing, however, confidence in the Judge-Advocate, he has, yielding to the pressure of other engagements, submitted his own judgment to the keeping of that officer. And he did this so entirely, that it does not seem to have occurred to him, that it was in any respect due to Porter that he should have an opportunity, through his counsel, of replying to the argument of the Judge-Advocate. What occurred in the Court on that point could not, therefore, have been made known to him. He could not have been told, that in the view of the Court, if a reply was made to the defense, it was due to the accused, and his privi-lege, that he should have the right to re-join. But it is most singular, and not to be accounted for, except that his other harassing and important engagements deadened his sense of justice, that a right so justly due to Porter, and so necessary to truth, had not suggested itself to his honest mind, and more especially, as his long experience as a lawyer must have taught him its importance.

But so it was. The accused then, as far as the President's action is concerned, has had his case decided on the argument of the Judge-Advocate's review, not only without having had accorded to him the privilege of reply, but without the Presi-dent's having taken time to read all the evidence, if he read any part of it, or to read the defense, or to test that or the re-view by comparing either with the whole evidence or with any part of it. The rule of military law as laid down by Sir Charles J. Napier, is now well settled, that no matter how many addresses are made by either party, "the prisoner has the right to speak last." Bennet, pp. 123, 124. In this instance, the rule was grossly violated. The last speech was made by the Judge-Advocate. Porter was not only not per-mitted to reply, but the existence even of the review was apparently concealed from him, certainly was not known by him until in common with all, after the sentence was announced, approved and circulated by the War Department. To any mind accustomed to the investigation of truth and the ascertainment of facts through human testimony, such means are known not only to be important but essential. No conclusion arrived at in any other way, can be relied upon. No judgment, otherwise formed, is entitled to the least respect. In any instance it is as likely to be wrong as right, and more likely to be wrong, in a case where it affects injuriously the character of a citizen whose antecedents had challenged not only the good opinion of those who knew him, but their admiration, and whose claim to public esteem rests on admitted valuable and perilous public service. In such a case, mental imbecility or prejudice, so deep and dark as wholly to cloud reason, must be supposed to be the foundation of the error. And with an evident consciousness that the observing and correct mind of the country would be astounded at the result, with a zeal and industry worthy of a better cause, the same resort, which so evidently misled the President, has been adopted to quiet the certainly anticipated public condemnation. While the Senate refused to call for the Record in order to its publication, (because of their having been deceived through the degrading artifice of Roberts and Smith, into the belief that it had all been published,) that the people might see the whole case, the review of the Judge-Advocate was at once published at the expense of the War Department, and scattered broad-cast over the land. Other things, too, have happened, suggestive of most unpleasant reflections — reflections casting more than a doubt on the mere abstract correctness of the Court's sentence. Almost simultaneously with its publication, three of the members of the Court were made Major-Generals, all certainly most estimable gentlemen, and possibly competent soldiers, but with no claims to such promotion. One of them, Major-General Prentiss, the only one of the three who it is confidently believed, did not concur in the sentence, has recently proved himself worthy of his rank, by his skilful defense of Helena, Arkansas. But the public in vain at the time, endeavored to recollect any fact as to either calling for such an honor, and have not been more successful since, except and very recently as to Prentiss. And they have asked, and still ask, if their distinguished services and the good of the country required their elevation to such high rank, why was it not conferred before? And why, why above all, was it the immediate sequence of the sentence against Porter? Who can answer satisfactorily either question? None certainly has as yet come from any quarter. The President of the Court, Major-General Hunter, was also immediately returned to a command from which he had been shortly before removed for acts of alleged mistaken policy, or excess of authority, and from which it has been found necessary to remove him a second time.

Of the three witnesses, Major-General Pope was continued in an important command, notwithstanding his sad failure in his Virginia campaign. Brigadier-General Roberts was assigned to a more important one than he had ever held before, or to which any competent officer who had known him believed him equal—nor in his career since has he done any thing to attract attention, except in the way in which his former chief signalized the commencement of his Virginia career, the issuing of proclamations as uncalled for as they were ridiculous and futile. It has also been found necessary in his case, to take it from him, and he is now once more on Pope's staff.

What disposition has been made of Lieutenant-Colonel Smith, is not known, and probably no one cares. (Appendix, No. 5, p. 86.) He perhaps continues to be one of the military family of Pope, ready whenever his exigencies may require it, to display for his benefit, the extraordinary faculty which he claims to possess—the reading of souls at first sight. The faculty of receiving, to use his own words, an "impression," although unable to analyze it from a few moments' intercourse with another—the power to obtain "one of those convictions that a man has a few times, perhaps, in his life, (he is modest enough not to claim to have it always at his command,) as to the character and purposes of a person who he sees for the first time," and although "no man can express altogether how such an impression is gained from looks and manner, but it is clear."

Under all these circumstances, with every ingenious mind, a sentence announced as this was, would be without the slightest authority, and no reason could exist for subjecting it to serious examination. The fact, however, that the present one is maintained and justified by Mr. Judge-Advocate-General Holt, makes it in a measure advisable. The well-established reputation of that officer, his perfect loyalty, his eminent ability, and the somewhat plausible character of the review, considered by itself, seems to require that that review be answered. For, however, as the writer has good reasons for believing, this is thought to be unnecessary by those who have made themselves acquainted with all the evidence, there must be a numerous class of citizens, who not having done so, may have been led astray by it.

The ingenuity of the Judge-Advocate, and his deservedly high reputation, gives to it an authority to which it will be seen it is not entitled, when it comes to be examined. A reader uninformed as to the evidence, will be unable to detect his sophistry or discover his prejudice, a prejudice doubtless unknown to himself, but not the less strong, and perhaps stronger on that account. Under this impression, it is the purpose of the writer to subject the review to the ordeal of reason and of truth. This he feels to be not less due to Major-General Porter, than to the good of the service, and the benefit of the country. An officer, whose deeds on so many battle-fields in the present war have so enhanced the nation's fame, filling with gratitude the very "pulse and veins of the people," whose patriotism from the first, was not only never before called into doubt, but admitted, and signally honored and rewarded, should not be permitted to suffer in the estimation of one honest citizen from a paper, whatever of high character may belong to its author.

There are further considerations, which, in the judgment of the writer, call for an answer. Before the sentence was made public and since, Porter has been assailed, with a bitterness implying malignity as well as ignorance, and by a few persons filling high official places, and whose claim to capacity and confidence, (however ridiculous these are to those who know them,) may have misled a part of the public. Amongst these are some who pretend to be military critics. Possibly themselves led astray by their own turgid conceit, they may believe that they possess this highest of intellectual powers. And where they are not self-deluded, their blatant patriotism (ever the art of the demagogue) may possibly mislead the unsuspecting. These last are slow to believe that such pretenders to knowledge and virtue can design to delude. Their assumed wisdom for a time is taken at its nominal, not its real worth—their judgments, valued at their author's estimate, and not at their actual value. And for a period, miraculous even as it may appear, they are supposed to be infallible judges of military subjects, to be men whom nature has made chosen objects of her favor, imparting to them the faculty of mastering military science without either study or practice, although in all other respects they are seen to be placed low in the scale of human capacity. It is consequently possible that to some extent these pretenders may have given to the sentence of the Court some little sanction. This furnishes a further reason for the vindication of Porter, and to these several reasons, perhaps, is to be added yet another. It is not to be disguised that in the conduct of this sad war, different views of policy have been entertained in the army as well as in Congress. The resolution adopted in 1861, with so much unanimity by that body, declaring what the object of the Government in the war was, was approved with almost the same unanimity by the army, men as well as officers, and by the people. That policy, then so generally approved, has been since departed from, whether wisely or not it is not the writer's present design to inquire. The chief authors of the change have from the first charged almost every military disaster and the failure of a complete triumph over the rebellion to the want of concurrence in the wisdom and propriety of the change in a portion of our military leaders, and have literally clamored for their removal. To this class Porter was supposed to belong.

Whether he did or not the writer has no certain knowledge, though he thinks it probable, as by nature and intelligent patriotism he is conservative and national. But to suspect him of not changing his individual opinion as Congress changed its own, in the estimate of the men alluded to, was fault enough. In their view every officer whose opinions were supposed to be the same on certain subjects as those of McClellan and Porter, and who has failed to abandon them at party bidding, has been continuously assailed with the same bitterness. Even the present Commander-in-Chief is constantly subjected to its fury. Assaults are made upon him from day to day, and with ever increasing violence. His removal is demanded under the pretext of the public good, but really to gratify party purposes. His capacity is denied—his patriotism questioned, and the Presidential ear literally dinned with the ignorant and false clamor. Thus far, however, it has been without avail. His having abandoned his distant home on the Pacific, where every comfort surrounded him, and no peril threatened or could come, purely from a sense of patriotic duty to serve the country in the present crisis, and his having subsequently on the field and in the closet given his days and nights to her assistance, all avail nothing. These voracious hawkers after objects of party sacrifice seem literally to gloat, and with no concealed delight, over any officer, (the higher he stands in the public esteem the greater the pleasure,) who they think they can make a victim to their thirst for victims to promote party success.

Porter, too, was known to be a personal friend and admirer of McClellan. He had every means of judging of McClellan's capacity, of witnessing his love of country—his constant efforts to serve her, and his military skill and genius, and the result was, that he highly appreciated him as a citizen and an officer. And this, in the view of the men referred to, seemed to be almost if not fully as great an offense as treason. He became therefore at once an object of vituperation, and no efforts were spared to shake the confidence that the President had so conspicuously placed in him. When Pope's disgraceful failure was evidently stirring the public mind to the folly and injustice of taking from McClellan the command of the army of the Potomac, and arresting his plan of further campaign, it became apparently vital to party success that some safety-valve should be found for the harmless escape of the impending indignation. And it was thought that it would be found by ascribing that failure to treasonable conduct on the part of Porter, and this was done. A willing instrument for the purpose, Pope was supposed to be. It is but justice to that officer to say, that when he discovered it, he declined the degrading task. The charges at first were said to be his—he promptly disavowed them. That occurring, an informer was found in Roberts. The result is the dismissal of Porter from the service, whose fame he had so signally enhanced, and its being hailed with delight by the class referred to. Had Porter pursued a different course; had he, with the readiness of a mere party politician, regardless of his former opinions, adopted with instant and proclaimed zeal, those which Congress, forgetting their former opinions, afterward adopted; and especially, had he, oblivious of the teachings of his life, of his good name and honor, and of the opinion of the enlightened and patriotic, proved himself an inordinate braggart, boasted of his own merits, detracted from McClellan's, and stated that he, commanding the army, Richmond would long since have been ours—he, too, would doubtless now not only be in the service, but be the favorite and boast of the very men who have denounced him, and probably have been placed at its head. The rank ignorance of such men, their lofty pretensions, and supercilious arrogance, from its very extravagance, is in a measure captivating. Sublimity is at times found in the excess of the ridiculous. "An avenue of colossal toads might become sublime."

With these remarks, pertinent as the writer thinks to his purpose, he proceeds to answer the Judge-Advocate, and with all the brevity consistent with necessary fullness and perspicuity.

Evidently sensible of the insufficiency of the evidence considered by itself, and perhaps more sensible, that the President would so view it, to affect the accused in the matters charged against him, the Judge-Advocate devotes four pages of the thirty of his review to discover what had been the ANIMUS of the accused. To note his language: "As the animus of the accused toward his Commanding General in pursuing the line of conduct alleged against him, must largely affect the question of his criminality, and may furnish a safe and valuable light for your guidance," (he is addressing the President, not the Court,) "in determining points, otherwise left doubtful by the evidence, it is proper that it should be ascertained before entering at large upon the review of the case, which you have instructed me to make."

What an exordium to a paper designed to induce a sanction of a judgment, dishonoring an officer whose life had been passed in faithfully discharging his duty to his country—whose loyalty and efficiency after the rebellion broke out, had been manifested in part under the orders of the reviewer himself, when he was at the head of the War Department, and to his entire satisfaction, and conspicuously displayed in the midst of great difficulties and peril, and whose conduct in the many battles in which he had been engaged, had excited the public admiration, and received the signal approval of the President.

The evidence alone, says the reviewer, is not sufficient to convict the accused, or to use his own words, his guilt is "left doubtful by the evidence."

His animus, however, "may furnish a safe and reliable light," by which to discover his guilt. It may enable the President to determine what is otherwise doubtful. You must in this way supply, he tells the President, the deficiency in the proof. You must probe the mind of the accused. That may remove the darkness—furnish the light—explain the doubt. And to this, and with an earnestness that evinces a burning desire of success, he addresses himself with poetic license—with a beautiful though somewhat extravagant fancy, which, however it may please the ear, in the judgment of the wise, is a very unsafe guide to truth.

Not content with the asserted tendency of the telegrams, which he had offered in evidence to establish the so much wished for ANIMUS, "Lieutenant-Colonel Thomas C. H. Smith, an Aid-de-Camp in the staff of General Pope," is resorted to for the charitable purpose.

His power to see into the very hearts of men at a single and first interview of a few minutes' duration only, preceded by no prior acquaintance whatever, is, and with a confidence which under other circumstances would, by a plain judgment, be considered simply ridiculous, seriously relied upon. The defense had characterized what this witness had said in regard to it, (and as the impartial and intelligent reader will think justly,) as "ravings, wild fantasies, rubbish, which should not have been suffered to encumber the Record."

How unjust this is, says the Judge-Advocate. "The witness (he says) endeavored to lay bare the foundations on which his belief of the accused's meditated treachery rested." He said that the manner of the accused "was sneering throughout, whenever allusion was made to matters connected with General Pope, and to quote his words, "his look was that of a man having a crime on his mind." But the Judge-Advocate admits, that the task (discovering with the only opportunity which he had the state of Porter's mind) "was a difficult one, and may not have been entirely successful."

In other words, he admits that in this Smith may have failed, and done the accused injustice. He adds that "it was physically impossible for the witness to reproduce the manner, the tone of voice, and the expression of the eye, and the play of the features, which may have so much influenced his judgment. Yet these often afford a language more to be relied on than that of the lips. He could not hold up before the Court, for its inspection and appreciation, the sneer of which he spoke. And yet we know that a sneer is as palpable to the mental, as a smile is to the natural vision. It is a life-long experience that souls read each other, and that there are intercommunings of spirits through instrumentalities which, while defying all human analysis, nevertheless completely command the homage of human faith. Great crimes, too, like great virtues, often reveal themselves to a close observer of character and conduct, as unmistakably as a flower-garden announces its presence by the odors it breathes upon the air." From these quotations, the reader will see how vital, in the judgment of the Judge-Advocate, to the success of his palpable purpose to have the sentence approved, it was that the alleged criminal animus of Porter should be made out. Nor can he also fail to discover that, even with the reviewer's evident desire to discover it—his belief in spiritual "intercommunings"—his tendency to be led into error by his own imagination—his doctrine that the face often speaks the mind as unmistakably as the presence of a flower-garden is announced "by the odors it breathes upon the air"—he admits that in this instance the professor of the art, his lauded Lieutenant Colonel, "may not have been entirely successful."

He concedes that he may have misconceived "the look;" although, if the treachery "was then contemplated, it must be admitted as altogether probable that the shadow of such a crime struggling into being would have made itself manifest"

It is evident that the Judge-Advocate is not satisfied with the result of his search, so far, for the much wished criminal animus of the accused. A philosophic poet has said that there are occasions when—

"Thought meets thought ere from the lips it part,
And each warm wish springs mutual from the heart."

But to this, common feelings and a reciprocal nature are necessary.

Who that knows Porter, and has seen Lieutenant-Colonel Smith, could for a moment believe that such was their relative condition? Well might the reviewer, then, fear that his effort to establish, by such proof, the intended treachery of the accused, had failed. Well might he be sensible that such a task was even beyond his great powers, displayed either in imagination, spiritualism or argument. All exerted together for such an end, could not lift folly to respectability—make absurdity reason—a ridiculous pretense plausible, or for a moment with a considerate, honest, and unprejudiced judgment, injuriously affect a soldier, who, with fearless intrepidity and consummate and applauded skill, had so faithfully served his country, at a period when so many had proved faithless. In addition to the strong impediment which was thus interposed to the success of the Judge-Advocate's purpose, the was another. The witness himself, in addition to the nonsense already referred proved that he was not in this particul at least, to be relied upon. He was bewildered with his own conceited flu mery, that if he is to be believed, it w near making him the greatest of crimina He told the Court what the Judge-Adv cate omits to inform the President, that his return to his chief, after his ten minut interview with Porter, he stated to t former: "I was so certain that Fitz-Jo Porter was a traitor, that I would sh him that night, so far as any crime bef God was concerned, if the law would low me to do it." What an avowal, most a boast. That the laws of man alo restrained him, not the laws of God, fr committing murder. And yet, this witne with this horrible avowal fresh in his min the Judge-Advocate tells the President, "a man of fine intelligence," "that his co scientiousness rendered him careful, a guarded in his statements, and that evinced a depth and solemnity of co viction, rarely paralleled in judicial p ceedings."

What mind, but one so blinded by p judice, that its light was for a time exti guished, would not, on the contrary, once and with indignation, have rejecte the testimony of such a witness, even if transparent doltishness was less conspic ous. But prejudice jaundices the finest well as the weakest intellect, and mak every thing appear of its own color. T immaterial facts and idle fancies, it attac es substance and reality. It affects t very warp and woof of the mind, engende suspicion, and gives to idle and trivial ci cumstances, the weight of unanswerabl proofs. He who read through all heart and knew and described man in his lofties exhibition of virtue—his grandest of crim and his lowest of weaknesses, says jealous (and in this it resembles prejudice) is on of his frailties. "Trifles, light as air, a to the jealous, confirmation strong as proo of holy writ," and "shapes faults that ar not."

These observations are not made in an unkind spirit toward the Judge-Advocate His talents are admired, and his publi services and patriotic virtue in this epoch of our history, have given him an honore ace in the grateful heart of the nation. ut this renders it the more important, hen his great authority is used to justify e sentence against Porter, a soldier to om the country is yet more indebted, at that authority should be examined, at it may be taken only at its intrinsic, d not at its adventitious worth. If it s been depreciated by what has been eady said, such depreciation can not but pair it throughout, and cause the reader receive with more than doubt all that it ges against Porter.

Notwithstanding his evident foregone nclusion of the guilt of Porter, and his lief that to establish it to the satisfaction the dullest and least charitable, it was ost important to make good the hypoth- is of his antecedent meditated treachery, d not satisfied that what were properly aracterized as the "ravings and wild ntasies" of Lieutenant-Colonel Smith, ould have that effect, he seeks to ac- mplish the end by resorting to certain legrams, sent from time to time, during e campaign, by Porter to General Burn- de. Some of these are in part given, d as the reader will see, most unjustly plied. Porter reported to Pope in writ- g, on the twenty-sixth, and in person on e twenty-seventh of August, '62. He had ft Burnside, (under whose command he d been for some days before,) and he as requested by that officer to inform m from time to time by telegraph, how atters progressed. This request was rtually an order, and so considered, and ted upon by both officers. General urnside said that he regarded sending the spatches to him by Porter, "as an official t done by him in the performance of his uty," under his "direction." But this, ys the Judge-Advocate, (p. 180,) "so r as the purpose for which they were ffered by the Government is concerned, is wholly immaterial under whose rompting, or for what end they were ritten."

Not for what end? However important the public good the information they ave was—however patriotic the motive, he sending of the dispatches was imma- erial in an inquiry as to the guilty or in- ocent purpose of the animus of the ac- used in the sending of them. They were ffered by the Government to prove that Porter, at the time, "entertained feelings of contempt and hostility toward the army of Virginia, at its commander," and, "it matters not whether in a private and confidential, or in an official communication."

So reasons the Judge-Advocate. Besides its shallowness, which of itself condemns it, he does not inform the President that they were sent under orders, or of what was proved by Burnside and others, though both facts were most important to enable the President to pass understandingly upon the case, that every fact communicated by the dispatches was true. Burnside was asked by the Court, "From what you know now, have you any reason to believe that the information given by General Porter in these telegrams, (meaning all that were sent to him,) as to the actual state of the army under General Pope, was not correct?" and he answered: "I am myself quite satisfied that it was correct." "But that opinion is merely one based upon the information I then received, and what I have since heard." (P. 184.) And the Government offered no evidence to prove that they were not correct to the letter. Nor does the Judge-Advocate give the President, nor allude to it in any part of his review, the benefit of General Burnside's opinion, formed on these dispatches, as well as on his whole intercourse with and knowledge of Porter, that from the first, and to the period when he testified, he, Burnside, was satisfied that he would prove, and had proved, true to his duty, to Pope and the country. This is, too, the more surprising, as his very first question to Burnside discovers that he considered his opinion important. Could he have obtained the one he desired, would he not have used it, and even with more confidence than he uses the supposed "intercommunings of spirits," to show that Porter meditated treachery? His question was: "Will you state whether at the time these dispatches were received from General Porter, (say between twenty-sixth and twenty-ninth of August inclusive,) any of them excited in your mind the apprehension that General Porter might not be inclined to do his whole duty as a subordinate under General Pope?" The answer was: "I RECEIVED NO SUCH IMPRESSION AS THAT FROM THE DISPATCHES. I saw in General Porter's dispatches exactly what I heard expressed by a large portion of the officers with whom I happened to be in communication at the time, a very great lack of confidence in the management of the campaign. It was not confined to General Porter. I saw in his dispatches and I told General Porter himself so, what may have been indiscreet language; BUT NOTHING THAT LED ME, FOR ONE MOMENT, TO FEEL THAT HE WOULD NOT DO HIS WHOLE DUTY." (P. 181.)

This evidence (could it have been by design?) was not only not given to the President, but its existence was not even intimated, although the Judge-Advocate was instructed by the President "to report fully upon the bearing of the testimony (the whole, of course) in reference to the charges and specifications," upon which Porter was tried. Neither was the President informed that, in answering the question by the Court, (the one already quoted,) which was intended, if possible, to find out whether Porter went under the command of General Pope with unfavorable impressions towards that officer, or whether such "impressions were gained after he was on the ground," the same witness testified: "He moved his troops off rapidly, and marched them at night, and every thing within my limits appeared to me to indicate that he was DETERMINED TO GET HIS TROOPS UP THERE AS RAPIDLY AS POSSIBLE. I SAW NOTHING TO INDICATE THE REVERSE," (p. 182.) Nor was the President advised that Burnside had testified, that in departing from an order of General McClellan as to the movement of his command from the Peninsula, and when it was known that they were to go to the aid of Pope, Porter was enabled to accelerate the movement—in the words of the witness, "to embark that much sooner and send the transports back for others," (p. 184.) Nor, finally, was the President informed that, in answering a question of the accused, the same witness had said, "I have never seen any thing to lead me to think that he (the accused) was ANY THING BUT A FAITHFUL AND LOYAL OFFICER;" nor that, in his opinion, every officer who knew him, and had witnessed his conduct throughout the war, as well as when he was under Pope's command, expressed, and in the strongest terms, PERFECT CONCURRENCE IN THIS OPINION.

General McClellan, under whose speci eye he had served in council and on th field, so spoke of him. He said that fro the time Porter "knew he was to go t the assistance of General Pope," he did, i his opinion, do "all that an energetic, an zealous, and patriotic officer could hav done," (page 196.)

But the opinions of sensible men—me of well-known character, intelligence, an patriotism—seem to have been considere by the Judge-Advocate light as air, whe contrasted with those of Smith and Robert The former, he appears to have though possessed but the ordinary means natu furnishes ordinary men to form opinion whilst to one, of the latter, at least, Smit she had supplied "instrumentalities whic while defying all human analysis, neve theless completely command the homag of human faith," and as to Roberts, h well-known and universally acknowledge character for perfect veracity, almos chronic love of truth and spotless reput tion with his brother officers, placed h evidence and the sincerity of his opinion beyond all possible suspicion.

That a chivalrous officer, whose life ha been given to his country, and who bu recently had so added to the reputation o its flag, should be sacrificed to reasonin so repugnant to common-sense that th unprejudiced mind rejects it at once as a insult to its intelligence, is one of the man extraordinary occurrences which, durin the present rebellion, has so astounded th public. What, but intellect perverted could claim, as is done, for treason, th nobleness of patriotism—for oaths violated the character of virtue—for rebellion, th justification of an absurd theory, or of a oppression that existed nowhere but in diseased fancy? And what adds, if tha be possible, to the injustice of the us attempted to be made of these dispatches and so strongly indicates a predetermine conclusion against Porter, is the fact that although stated to be offered to establis his alleged contemplated treachery, th Judge-Advocate objected to Porter' giving in evidence other dispatches t General Burnside a few days before an after the twenty-sixth and twenty-ninth o August, (the dates of those offered by th Government,) that is, from the twenty second of August to the first of September disprove the alleged purpose, the animus. Strange as it may seem, the objection was sustained by the Court, and the proof rejected. A protest was entered. (See Appendix I.) That protest was published in the papers of the day, and in short period the Court and the Judge-Advocate saw that the ruling of the Court was received with astonishment and disapprobation by the intelligent press of the country. Clearly illegal as the decision was, and strange as it is that it did not so appear to the Judge-Advocate and the Court at the first, they adhered to it until the manifestation of public opinion on the subject caused him to suggest the waiving of his objection, and the Court to admit the evidence. The dispatches were then received, but no one, aware of the circumstances under which they were received, believed that, however conclusive they were in disproving the alleged criminal intent or animus, they would have the slightest effect with the Court or the Judge-Advocate. The result proved that this opinion there was no error. Nor does the Judge-Advocate, in his review, even notice them. The only reference he makes to them is to a single one of these dispatches which Porter desired to send, and was not permitted to send, to Major-General McClellan, dated second of September, 1862, and that one is not given at length; and, although admitted to be full of fervent patriotism and professions of devotion to his duty in connection with the Army of Virginia and its commander," the Judge-Advocate adds that, "unhappily came too late." The merest trifle, which a fair mind would exclude as evidence of charges of dishonor and treachery against any one, much less a soldier, ever before esteemed, is seized upon with avidity and tortured, or sought to be tortured, inconsistent as the effort is with common-sense, into proof of guilt, whilst the weightiest facts, those which, with such a mind, would be conclusive of innocence, for the most part are not mentioned at all, or when in part referred to, are rejected as unimportant, or as coming "too late." The President, however, should have been told of them, and the public should see the nature of the facts so discarded as not proving, or hardly as tending to prove, Porter's innocence of purpose. The Judge-Advocate, even in regard to the dispatches which he uses as establishing, in his view, the guilty purpose, omits to give the whole of any one of them. He extracts a few expressions from each, without alluding to its context, a practice ever unfair and unreliable. Had even the whole of these dispatches been disclosed, the President would have seen, and the public, for whom the review of the Judge-Advocate was also designed, as proved by its general circulation by the War Department, that these dispatches themselves proved no faithlessness on Porter's part to Pope or the country, either actual or contemplated. Whilst those which he does not give at all, or even allude to, with the exception of the one just mentioned, to McClellan, of second September, all demonstrate a fixed purpose and earnest solicitude to do his full duty to both. (The reader will find these dispatches in pp. 228–235.) It is confidently asserted that every one of them evinces not only a mere willingness, but the strongest wish to do every thing in his power to render the campaign successful, or, failing in that, to lessen, as far as possible, any disaster that might befall it, and especially to save the Capitol. His orders, too, to his corps commanders, to be found in the same pages, evidence intelligence, zeal, and energy, and the dispatch referred to, to McClellan, of second September, whilst he was still under the command of Pope, and involved in his fate, breathes the same patriotic spirit. That dispatch was an answer to one from McClellan of the day before, urging him "and all friends" to give "the fullest and most cordial coöperation to General Pope." A dispatch written, as McClellan states, (p. 197,) at the instance of and to satisfy the apprehensions of the President, and not to remove any apprehensions of his own. To quote McClellan's words: "I had no doubt then in my own mind but that the Army of the Potomac, and all connected with it, would do their duty without there being any necessity for any action on my part." To that message, Porter's of the second says: "YOU MAY REST ASSURED THAT ALL YOUR FRIENDS, AS WELL AS EVERY LOVER OF HIS COUNTRY, WILL EVER GIVE, AS THEY HAVE GIVEN, TO GENERAL POPE, THEIR CORDIAL CO-OPERA-TION AND CONSTANT SUPPORT IN THE EXECUTION OF ALL ORDERS AND PLANS. OUR KILLED AND WOUNDED AND ENFEEBLED TROOPS ATTEST OUR DEVOTION TO DUTY."

So conscious was Porter of having fully performed his duty, the moment he received McClellan's dispatch he sought Pope, showed it to him, and asked: "Why he supposed such a dispatch had been sent to him?" (p. 20.) Pope could give him no explanation. His answer to McClellan he was not allowed to send, but it clearly evinces the utter groundlessness of suspicion. His "killed and wounded and enfeebled troops" he points to, as he well might, as the witnesses of duty devotedly performed. Of his command, gallantly led by himself (for he ever led it) in the battle of the thirtieth of August, three days before, in a vain effort to turn the tide of Pope's defeat, and save the honor of our flag, consisting of about seven thousand men, he lost in killed and wounded OVER TWO THOUSAND AND THIRTY-TWO, INCLUDING IN THE KILLED ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTEEN OFFICERS. All this, however, in the view of the Judge-Advocate, was "too late"—gallantry too tardily displayed—wounds and deaths proving nothing, patriotism and sense of duty speaking but for the day, and not an hour before. The twenty-seventh, twenty-eighth, and twenty-ninth of August found him a traitor in fact, as well as intent. The thirtieth, a noble soldier and patriot! And yet, with the transparent injustice of such reasoning, the Judge-Advocate, without seeming to be aware of it and of its absurdity, tells the President and the country, in concluding his review, that "the Court was careful to give to the accused the benefit of all well-founded doubts that arose in their minds in reference either to the fact of disobedience or in reference to the measure of criminality that prompted it, and hence found him not guilty of the fourth and fifth specifications of the first charge;" and that, in the same spirit of generous clemency, he himself withdrew "the fourth specification of the second charge," (p. 317.)

And this statement is seriously made, without even intimating that in the support of the specifications of the first charge to which he refers, there was not only no evidence offered by the Government, but that what it did give, without considerin what was produced by the accused, esta lished the utter groundlessness of bot and without informing the President th the specification of the second charg which he claims credit for having gen rously withdrawn, related to Porter's co duct in the very battle of the thirtieth August, where, under his lead, the batt ground was literally mired with the blo of his devoted followers, and where h efforts were so greatly instrumental i diminishing the disaster of the day.

Having thus, it is confidently submitte shown not only that there is no proof t establish the alleged criminal animus Porter, but conclusive evidence to th contrary, the assumption of which anim constitutes the very foundation of th argument of the Judge-Advocate, th charges and specifications will be co sidered in their order, and in connectio with the whole evidence.

FIRST CHARGE—FIRST SPECIFICATION.

The first charge was the "Violation o the Ninth Article of War," and the firs specification, a failure to obey the followin order of Major-General Pope, dated "Bri tow Station, August twenty-seventh, 186 half-past six P.M., Major-General F. J Porter, Warrenton Junction:"

"GENERAL: The Major-General Com manding directs that you start at on o'clock to-night, and come forward wit your whole corps, or such part of it as i with you, so as to be here by daylight to morrow morning. Hooker has had a ver severe action with the enemy, with a los of about three hundred killed and wounded The enemy has been driven back, but i retiring along the railroad. We mus drive him from Manassas, and clear th country between that place and Gaines ville, where General McDowell is. If Morell has not joined you, send word t him to push forward immediately; also send word to Banks to hurry forward wit all speed, to take your place at Warrento Junction. It is necessary, on all accounts, that you should be here by daylight. I send an officer with this dispatch who wil conduct you to this place. Be sure t send word to Banks, who is on the road from Fayetteville, probably in the direc n of Bealton. Say to Banks, also, that had best run back the railroad trains to s side of Cedar Run. If he is not with n, write him to that effect.

'P. S. — If Banks is not at Warrenton nction, leave a regiment of infantry and o pieces of artillery, as a guard till he nes up, with instructions to follow you nediately. If Banks is not at the Junc-n, instruct Colonel Cleary to run the ins back to this side of Cedar Run, and t a regiment and section of artillery h it."

The Judge-Advocate devotes five pages his review to maintain this specification. th what justice, we will now see:

First.—The order was to bring by the cified time, "daylight," the following rning, not a part merely, but his "whole ps," or the whole of "such part as is h you." Porter had artillery with him, arm of vital moment, at the time, to the omplishment of Pope's purpose, and to safety of his own command. This part his force, too, the body of his order rly embraced.

And if that could be doubted, the post-pt made it clear. For in the postscript was told that, in the event of his not ding Banks "at Warrenton Junction," was to "leave a regiment of infantry l two pieces of artillery, as a guard un-he comes up, with instructions to follow," t is, to follow with his own and these two ces. The artillery of Porter was, there-e, manifestly included in the order. No rt of that arm was to be left behind, ex-pt in the contingency mentioned, and n only two guns, and but for a time. On s fact, the Judge-Advocate is silent, al-ugh its significance is most important. e order exacted the movement of Por-'s entire force, and embraced, in words, artillery. To have left that behind, uld have been disobedience; and if any toward result had ensued to his own mmand or to Pope's, he should, and no ubt would, have been held responsible. arly all the witnesses proved that the illery could not have been moved at e o'clock. In this part of the case, and leed throughout, the prejudice of the dge-Advocate reveals itself. After re-ng, and illogically and uncharitably using the portion of the evidence which he quotes, as bearing on the question involved in this specification, he tells the President, "That there are certain other facts disclosed in the testimony, which go far to indicate a settled purpose on the part of the accused to disregard" the order. On receiving it, he said to the Generals who were with him, "There is something for you to sleep upon," instead of telling them what the Judge-Advocate, in his enthusiasm, says he should have told them, though he fails to say what that was.

Conceding that what he did say is correctly given, one would suppose that if it did not for a moment excite the surprise of the officers to whom it was addressed, (and against whom no fault of motive or want of skill is attributed, and all of whom are now faithfully serving their country,) officers who knew the actual condition of things, and saw the manner and heard the tone in which Porter spoke, an unprejudiced mind would find in that fact alone, ample confutation of the imputation, and dismiss, as wholly unjust and uncharitable, all suspicious speculations that could be founded upon it.

But Porter did not say what is stated by the Judge-Advocate. The reliable proof is the other way. What he did say was not in any degree "saddening or discouraging" to the officers who heard it, or to those who believe "that in the prosecution of this war, much vigor is much wisdom." In that maxim no one more decidedly concurs than Porter himself. This is evidenced by his whole conduct since the war commenced. What he did say, on reading the order to his Generals, was proved by General Butterfield, one of those present at the time. That officer states, that as soon as Porter received the order, he handed it "to General Morell, or to General Sykes, who were present, and said there was a chance for a short nap, or something of that sort, (I do not remember the exact words,) indicating that there was but little time for preparation." And the same witness further stated, that on objections being made by Sykes or Morell, or both, to marching at one A.M., (they both testified that they did so object,) Porter stated what the Judge-Advocate neither gives or alludes to: "In reply to these remarks, General Porter spoke rather decidedly, that there was the order — it must be obeyed; that those who gave the order knew whether the necessities of the case would warrant the exertions that had to be made to comply with it. I do not state that as his exact words, but as the substance of what he said." (P. 185.)

What evidence is this of want of vigor, or of a purpose to disobey? No wonder that neither Sykes, Morell, nor Butterfield saw in it nothing to regret—nothing indicating a purpose or a willingness to disobey the order. Nothing "to the last degree saddening or discouraging for those who believe that in the prosecution of this war much vigor is much wisdom." Nothing sad or discouraging at all, but on the contrary, an ardent desire to obey the order. The Judge-Advocate, however, though he heard not the words, nor the tone, nor saw "the expression of the eye and the play of the features," which he tells us "often afford a language more to be relied on than that of the lips," (p. 301,) ruminating in his study, and even without a Smith, or any other expert in the reading of "the intercommunings of spirits," to supply his own possible want of information, and, with assumed confidence, construes them to have been most sad and discouraging, and to have exhibited nothing of "vigor," or of "wisdom." Can this be reconciled with his well-known ability, except upon the ground of his fixed antecedent hypothesis of Porter's guilt?

I. But to the evidence.

The order was received, as admitted by the Judge-Advocate, between half-past nine and ten o'clock of the evening of the twenty-seventh of August. The Generals who were present, Morell, Sykes and Butterfield, all say it was about ten o'clock.

II. When was the march under the order begun?

The Judge-Advocate says, it was not until about dawn. To make that statement good, he quotes a sentence or two from the testimony of a few witnesses. But why not all that these witnesses said? And especially why not have given the evidence of the Generals, who were present when the order was received, and had charge of the movement, and of th of General Griffin, Lieutenant-Colon Locke, Captains Martin and Montiet and Lieutenant Weld? In fairness, it obvious that this should have been don General Morell was asked, "about wh time did the march or movement of troo commence," and answered, "at thr o'clock, or very near that time. Th was the hour designated." (P. 145.)

General Butterfield (by Presidenti appointment the chief of General Hoo er's staff, whilst he was in command the army) says, that General Port fixed three o'clock as the hour, and th the witness "wrote an order in Gener Porter's tent, for my command to be line to march at three o'clock." And reply to the question, "Did you march attempt to march at three o'clock?" sai "I did;" "I had my column formed a staff-officers sent out to notify me whe the head of my column should take i place in the line. We marched from t camp up to the road, and there wait until we could take our place, which w at the rear of General Morell's division (Pp. 185, 186.) General Griffin, said: " received an order about twelve o'clock the night of the twenty-seventh of A gust, to move my brigade at three o'clo in the morning. At three o'clock in t morning I started from my camp towa Bristow Station, and marched about mile or two, to where I halted, and the I remained at the head of my colun until about two hours after daylight (Why this delay he satisfactorily e plains.) (Pp. 160, 161.)

Lieutenant-Colonel Locke being aske "Did the corps march at three o'clock? answered, "yes." (P. 134.) Captai Montieth: "At what time that mornin did General Porter begin to move h troops?" "I should think it was abo three o'clock." (P. 127.) And such the testimony of all the witnesses upo this point, in fact of all who had the be opportunities of knowing, including th Generals whose duty, to move at thre o'clock, under the order they all say the received from General Porter the nigh before, it was to see that that order wa obeyed, and to superintend the move ment. How idle it is to disregard all this evidence as unreliable, and to find act inconsistent with it upon such testimony, little, too, as that is to which the Judge-Advocate refers, and of that little to General Pope's, who was not present at the time, who, to an inquiry, "Whether on the receipt of certain messages from the accused, the latter was on his march, in obedience to the order of the twenty-seventh of August," answered, "I do not know that he was. On the contrary, from a note I had received from him, (not however, produced, as were none of Porter's notes to this witness, who said that he had mislaid them all,) I did not understand that he would march until daylight in the morning." A story at war with the fact, that he had ordered the march to commence at three, and, as proved by the witness just referred to, that it did commence at that hour.

But, independent of the positive proof as to the time of the march, and supposing that the mind could possibly doubt upon the point with that proof before it, what are the probabilities? Every General and other officer present when the order was received, or who was in Porter's tent afterward on that evening, tells us that Porter gave a positive order to march at three o'clock.

If not obeyed, these Generals, who had to execute the order, were liable to censure. Who censures them? Not the Government, certainly. For, as before stated, and fortunately for the country, they are all of them in high favor. Porter is the only victim. He alone has been sacrificed, or rather as far as his reputation is concerned, a futile effort has been made to sacrifice him.

III. But, admitting that he did begin his march at three A.M., the Judge-Advocate maintains that he was guilty of disobedience, meriting the sentence of the Court, because he should have marched, or attempted to march at one A.M.

However positive in that respect the order was, it was confidently stated in the defense, upon the authority of a military maxim of Napoleon, that passive obedience to a military order is only exacted "where it is given by a superior who is present on the spot at the moment when he gives it." The authority of this maxim is not disputed by the Judge-Advocate—he only denies its application in this instance. And he does this but doubtingly. "Nor is it believed" (says he) that the accused can "find shelter" under it. And why—can the reader imagine? because, as this official military jurist says: "The discretion it allows to a subordinate, separated from his superior officer, is understood to relate to the means, and not to the end of an order. When the accused determined that instead of starting at one o'clock he would start at three or four, (he adds an hour, for all agreed that Porter ordered the march to begin at three,) he did not resolve he would arrive at Bristow Station by daylight in a different manner from that indicated by his Commanding General, but that he would not arrive there by daylight at all. In regard to this, the end of the order, he had no discretion." (P. 360.)

What technicality! A just and enlightened Judge once said of a like display in in a case before him, "it is stretching technicality to the very verge of quibbling."

A few observations will show the weakness of the reasoning of the Judge-Advocate.

I. In the first place, no such qualification of the maxim is anywhere suggested by its great author. His language is general, comprehensive of end as well as means. Passive obedience to an order in any particular, whether of end or means, is not to be exacted when the superior who gives it is not present at the place where it is to be executed. In the words of Napoleon, such obedience is to be exacted "only when it is given by a superior who is present on the spot at the moment when he gives it." And, as was his wont, he assigns succinctly, but clearly, the reasons for the rule. Having then, (that is, when he is present on the spot,) knowledge of the state of things, he can listen to the objections, "and give the necessary explanations to him who should execute the order." This, of course, he can not do when he is not present. To enforce absolute obedience to an order given by a superior who is not present, and may not know the condition of the country, or the difficulties in the way of its execution, might at times lead to the most disastrous results—imperil a corps, frustrate the very purpose of the superior, and so far from aiding, lead to his utter defeat.

II. What authority, other than his own, is there for his statement, that the maxim "is understood to relate to the means and not to the end of an order"? He cites none. Would he not, if he had known of one? And would he not have known if there be one? He shows himself to be fond of military literature, and to have its leading points fastened in his memory. He graphically calls to the President's recollection, the stirring scenes of Hohen Linden—the great gallantry and matchless energy of Richpanse—the dashing onset of Ney, and unites his own tribute to that of the renowned historian of The Consulate and the Empire to the consummate skill of Moreau, as being illustrated more brilliantly than in any of his other battles in this, "the greatest in the present century."

Who can doubt that a mind which so evidently delights in military reading, and whose office of Judge-Advocate-General makes it his duty to do all that he can to master the science, as far, at least, as concerns obedience to orders, could have failed to discover in what authority, great or small, it is stated, that the quoted maxim of Napoleon was understood by him or any one else, military man or not, to relate "to the means and not the end of an order"?

III. But conceding, for a moment, that such is its meaning, how does that meaning deprive Porter of the benefit of the maxim?

I. It is said by the Judge-Advocate, that "the end of the order was that Porter should be with his command at Bristow Station by daylight the following morning."

II. That Porter did not decide to get there at that time, "in a different manner from that indicated by the order, but that he would not get there at all, at that time, and that as to get there at that time, was "the end of the order, he had no discretion upon the subject." Was the end of the order as suggested? The end must be the object to be accomplished by the order. The order stated that "Hooker has had a very severe action with the enemy, with a loss of about three hundred men killed and wounded. The enemy h been driven back, but is retiring along t railroad; we must drive him from Man sas, and clear the country between th place and Gainesville, where General M Dowell is." To clear this portion of t country then was Pope's object. He issu the order with that view. As a means effect it he desired Porter's corps. what condition? In fighting conditio In what way to get to him? By the be and shortest way. Time was importar but time was to yield to the object to accomplished. Pope did not, and cou not, know what would be the condition Porter's command when the order wou be received. He did not fully, if at a know the condition of the roads, nor wh would be the character of the night. his designation of the time of arrival Bristow's Station, did he mean to say, th no matter in what plight the troops shou be—how far they may have marched th day and evening—what meals they ma have had—what rest—what the state the roads—what the character of the nigh and what the opinion of every officer the command as to the practicability getting to Bristow Station at daylight- did he mean that, regardless of all the considerations, the order was to be literall obeyed? He did not, and could not hav been supposed by Porter to have so mean except on the supposition that he was a imbecile. The character for intelligenc of Pope, therefore, should save him fro the damaging effect of such a propositio But in fact that was not his meaning. H conduct, the next day, when the troo did arrive at the designated place, whic he says was twenty minutes past ten A.M (Porter was, in fact, there about eigh A.M.,) (p. 19,) proves, that he was guilt of no such folly. His order, according t the view, adopted by the Court and b the Judge-Advocate, had been shameless disobeyed. He had every reason, tha view assumes, to know that it might hav been obeyed. That Porter should be ther at daylight with his command, was, it i said, the very end of the order.

That end had failed without justificatio or excuse, says the Judge-Advocate. I so, how are we to account for the manne of Pope's reception of Porter at eigh o'clock that morning, or at any time afte

he command arrived? On cross-examination, Pope was asked: "Had you any onversation with him (Porter) in relation o the order of the twenty-seventh, and is having obeyed or disobeyed and if so, hat?" He answered: "I do not remember any conversation with him in reference o obeying or disobeying the order, although I had much conversation with him." n replying to another question, requesting im to try and refresh his recollection, he aid: "I should not be likely to complain to y subordinate officer of a disobedience to y orders, (why, he does not explain except that Porter was his subordinate,) I M THEREFORE VERY SURE THAT I DID NOT OMPLAIN TO GENERAL PORTER." He dded: "I am not sure that he gave me any xplanations. I have a general recollection at he spoke to me of his march, and the ifficulties that he had in getting wagons t of the road, but the particulars I do ot remember, for I was very much occuied, and the necessity which made his resence important, had passed away." P. 18.) On his examination also, in chief y the Judge-Advocate, he was asked: Did he (Porter,) at that time, (the time of s arrival,) or at any time before," "explain you the reason why he did not obey the rder?" He answered: "He wrote me a ote which I received I think in the morng of the twenty-eighth, very early in the orning, perhaps a little before daylight. am not quite sure about the time. The ote I have mislaid (as before stated, he id that he had mislaid all of Porter's otes to him—strange negligence this, and ie that credulity itself could scarcely elieve, if the witness's character for verasty and his repugnance to exaggeration, ther delicate or gorgeous, was not so iversally acknowledged.) I can give ie substance. I remember the reasons iven by General Porter; if it is necessary state them, I can do so." Porter inuired if the witness had looked for the ote, and he said he had, "but had not been ble to find it." The Judge-Advocate then, though the inquiry was his own, and orter said "I do not object" to the witss giving his recollection of the contents the notes, said: "I will not press the uestion." (P. 13.) It appears then, that ope had received before daylight on the venty-eighth, from Porter a written note, giving his reasons why he would not be able to execute his order literally. He sent no answer reiterating the order, nor did he rebuke, or in any way find fault with the failure in its passive obedience. And when Porter and himself met face to face, at eight A.M., and afterward on that day, also during the whole time, when Porter was under his command, and the whole subject was spoken of between them, and the difficulties of the actual march explained, did a single word, as Pope testifies, escape him, even faintly murmuring regret, much less censure! This of itself is conclusive of the groundlessness of the charge. The officer who gave the order, when he was made acquainted with all the circumstances attending its execution found no fault. Defeat had not then given his pride of command a sore wound. His ambition he no doubt thought would yet be gratified. He had at the time, Porter and his command with him, and he trusted, as he well might, to both, and by his own conduct at that time, it is demonstrable that he never intended to charge Porter with disobedience to that order. His doing so was obviously an after-thought. Defeat and not success was soon his fate. Defeat, great, overwhelming defeat. The public were indignant. If the result could not be attributed to Pope, (and that it could be it is not necessary here to charge,) the getters up of the campaign as well as Pope, impelled by natural mortification, looked for escape from the censure which they were certain to receive, to any victim that could with the slightest probability be found, and Porter was selected. His conduct, his disobedience, his meditated treachery were at once alleged to be the cause of the defeat. His telegrams were searched and criticised, his conversations hunted up and examined, and each expression, howsoever made or to whomsoever made, evincing a want of confidence in Pope's skill and capacity for the command, were seized upon and pressed into the service. Whilst it is known that some desired his life, the Court satisfied itself by displacing him from the army, and idly assuming to disfranchise him from all places of honor and trust under the Government. And yet, who in his senses concurs in the justice of that sentence, or fails to stamp it as a gross wrong to Porter and the country? For a time he may not again be permitted to honor his profession, and serve the nation by other deeds of skill and valor, but of the past he is not deprived. The place in the hearts of his fellow-citizens, which he filled after his crowning achievement of Malvern, is his still. And soon will the people order those, who, as they should do, will listen to the public voice, and be alive to the public honor, that he must be restored to their service, and afforded an opportunity of adding, if that be possible, to his own reputation, and to the military renown of the nation.

But to return to the evidence. It is true that to a certain extent he criticised in his dispatches to Burnside, the plans of his chief. As he did it, was it a crime in any view, military or otherwise? His criticisms were for the eyes of Burnside only, and of those of the President and Commander-in-Chief, to whom he must have known they would be communicated. If he really believed in their truth, so far from offending, it was his duty to give the information, and instead of being punished, he should have been thanked by the Government. Not only was the honor of the flag involved, but the very safety of the Capitol. Porter saw that both were in danger by what he believed to be the incompetency of Pope. Was he to keep this conviction in his own breast, regardless of the army and the nation? Or was he not on the contrary, bound to speak his fears to those who had the power to guard against the apprehended peril? Were his fears honestly entertained? Was his motive for stating them patriotic? Let his dispatch to McClellan of first September, half-past eight P.M., give the answer. After telling him of Bayard's report of the movements of the enemy, he says: "I can see the dust and flags: columns evidently moving directly North: evidently towards Leesburgh. If you can, I hope you will protect the fords into Maryland, and guard the Railroad to Baltimore. I think we will have a fight before night. The enemy are between us and Fairfax Court-House, and shelled our trains last night. We will fight, or they will avoid us, and strike our rear first. We have been held on thirty-six hours too long, and we are bound to work our way to Alexandria. I only regret that we have not been distributed to forts, and to the fords over the Potomac into Maryland. GOD SPEED YOUR OPERATIONS, AND ENABLE YOU AND OTHERS IN AUTHORITY TO SAVE OUR COUNTRY," (p. 233.) His whole thoughts were evidently given to his country, its honor, and its safety. He apprehended, and as the result proved correctly, the marching of the enemy into Maryland, and perhaps further North. He was alarmed, too, (it was the alarm of a brave and patriotic man,) for the safety of the Capitol. He ardently wished to avert both dangers, and in words of patriotism that evidently gushed from his heart, he invoked McClellan to be on the alert—to watch the foe and guard the passes, and prayed God to "speed" his "operation, and enable him," and "others in authority, to save the country." Alas! for our good name, this is the man who is charged with faithlessness to duty and treason to the nation. And as yet more dishonoring to it, this is the man whom a Court consisting of nine officers, have been induced to find guilty of the foul dishonoring crime, and whose sentence is supported by the highest military, legal officer, and in a moment of blindness to justice, the result of over confidence in others, a sentence which the President, whose mind is naturally honest, to the prejudice of his own good name, without taking time properly to investigate the subject for himself promptly approved. But is criticism on a commander's capacity, or of his plans by a subordinate officer so criminal as to demand, or at all justify dismissal from service? The wars of Europe furnish very many instances to the contrary. Even Napoleon, the strictest of disciplinarians as well as the greatest military man the world has ever known, not only did not punish, but encouraged it. He went further, he excused at times even a failure to obey orders. It is singular that this was not in the memory of the Judge-Advocate affluent as it would seem to be with such learning.

When Massena, in 1810, was, against his wish, placed by Napoleon in command of the army of Portugal, and in spite of his criticisms to Napoleon himself on his plan of campaign, in obedience to orders decided to lay siege to Ciudad Rodrigo overruling in that respect the advice of his subordinates, Junot and Ney, who recommended an attack first upon that part of Wellington's army encamped at Viseu, Thiers tells us, that those two officers spread abroad amongst their several corps, that it was Massena, who, grown old, and no longer the same man, preferred yearisome and murderous sieges to an active and "decisive campaign." (Vol. 12, History of the Consulate and the Empire, London edition, p. 151.) To criticise Napoleon, to advise against his plan of campaign, was harmless in Massena, and to disparage Massena with his army, was harmless in Junot and Ney. But for Porter to question Pope's plans, to speak despairingly of his strategy, though only to the superiors of both, to evince for Pope as a commander, though only to the superiors of both, "contemptuous and unfriendly feelings," is not to be tolerated or excused. Pope should have been held sacred, because infallible, and Porter condemned for questioning it—whilst Ney and Junot and Massena were properly esteemed guiltless, because Massena and Napoleon possessed no title to infallibility.

II. On the twelfth of March, 1811, after the triumph of the French in the battle of Redinha, Massena, who was still in command, implored Ney "to resist to the utmost, as the nature of the ground would well enable him to do, on his way to Condeixa." "Scarcely," says the same historian, "had Massena departed, than Ney began to watch the least movements of the English," and, hurried on by the fear of "being isolated from the main body" of the French army, "he disputed but for a few moments the heights of Condeixa, and then hastened to quit them." As soon as Massena heard of it he was indignant—"expressed aloud his indignation to Fririon, the chief of his staff, and was so greatly angered as to entertain for a moment the idea of depriving Ney of his command, and yet the purpose was only for a moment entertained, and, as far as we are informed, when he was acquainted with it, Napoleon never entertained it even for a moment, or thought that it required him even to censure Ney. Ney had, however, clearly violated a positive order, and by doing so, as the historian tells us, "for the sake of avoiding an imaginary, or, at most, doubtful danger, he exposed the army to a certain peril," (ib. pp. 210, 211.) How striking is the contrast, even supposing an intended violation by Porter of the order of the twenty-seventh of August, between the conduct of Massena and Napoleon in Ney's case, and that of Pope, the Court, the Judge-Advocate, and the President, in Porter's case.

III. In November, 1812, when Wellington's whole army did not exceed sixty thousand men, and King Joseph's, Napoleon's brother, numbered eighty-five thousand, and Hill's command, left by Wellington at Alba de Tormes, fifteen thousand, the King, Jourdan and all the Generals but Soult, advised an "advance between the English Generals." Soult opposed it, and from deference to his authority the project which was apparently perfectly practicable, and might have led to the destruction of the English army, was abandoned, and another plan, advised by Soult, adopted. And then, on the thirteenth of the same month, when the French crossed the Tormes above Alba, and advanced as far as Neustra, Senora de Retiro, the King and Jourdan insisted upon the advisability of throwing the French cavalry upon the English army, visible on the right, Soult objected to the measure, on account of the obscurity of the atmosphere, etc." "and the result was, that when the eighty-five thousand French troops were assembled the English were already out of their reach, and in full retreat upon the Ciudad Rodrigo route," and the object of the campaign thereby lost, (ib. vol. 15, pp. 73, 74.) Soult nevertheless was continued in command, and escaped, as far as we know, even censure on the part of Napoleon. It can not be necessary to multiply instances from European armies. There are two recent ones, in our own army, occurring under the very eyes of the Government, that also strongly illustrate the injustice of the strict rule applied to Porter.

I. Whilst the Court-Martial in his case was in session, and in the same building, a military inquisition, instituted at the request of Major-General McDowell, of an extraordinary character was examining into the conduct of that officer, and with power to investigate his whole military career, although no charges of any kind had been made against him by any one in authority. Why this favor was shown to McDowell, and Porter was held to rigid and most technical proof, created in the minds of the observing, great surprise; but it is referred to in this connection with no view to censure. In the course of that inquisition, it appeared that McDowell had received a positive order from Pope, (under whose command he was,) which he failed to obey. Instead of doing so, he left his own troops and went in search of Pope, whose exact locality, however, he did not know. For this separation from his own corps, say the Court in his case, there was "clearly" nothing in another order upon which he relied, which contained even an implication to justify it. The result of his conduct, too, in that particular, had proved most disastrous, as proved by Pope, whose evidence in regard to it was adopted by the Court. Upon hearing of the battle, that a part of his corps had had that evening, Pope said: "I stated to several of my staff officers who were present, that the game was in our own hands, (meaning, if his order had been executed,) that it was impossible for Jackson to escape without very heavy loss, if at all."

McDowell's excuse, that he desired to give "the expression of his views to General Pope in person," "could be of no avail when the misconduct of his own corps thwarted a plan, the execution of which afforded an opportunity for speedy victory."

To this unauthorized and inexcusable failure of McDowell, if it frustrated, as Pope says it did, the almost certain destruction of Jackson's command, and probably its capture, may with much more show of reason be attributed the failure of the campaign, (if that was not owing to the inherent defect of the plan of the campaign and the incompetency of the commander,) than to any or all of the failures, even were they established, alleged against Porter.

He, however, is cashiered, whilst McDowell is honorably acquitted, and at once placed on important duty, because, as the Court in his case say, gross as his fault was, "grave" as the "error committed by him," (disobedience of an express order which, as the Judge-Advocate says, and cites De Hart for it, "is a crime which the law has stigmatized as of the highest degree, and against which is denounced the extreme punishment of death,") "his subsequent efforts, on the twenty-ninth, to repair the consequences of that unfortunate movement of his corps, and to press them forward into action, were earnest and energetic, and disclosed fully that the separation of which this Court has stated its disapproval, was inconsiderate and unauthorized, but was not induced by any unworthy motives." The italics are the Court's. And this moderate reproof, if reproof it can be called, is for the violation of a clear, positive order, leaving the subordinate no discretion, and committed upon his own judgment alone, without consulting, for aught that appeared, a single officer in his command.

His conduct "was not induced by any unworthy motive." Evidenced, in the Court's view, by his course on the following day. Had he confidence in Pope? Was he asked? If he had been, who that knows him, can doubt what his answer would have been, had he said what he thought? The very fact, that at such a moment, he left his command in the hands of his own subordinates, to find Pope, to counsel with him as to the very order, and probably to advise against it, evinces strongly such want of confidence. But his next day's conduct exempts him from serious censure, as it proved his "motive" pure. And, besides, adds the Court, "it feels itself bound (why, but because it was material to the inquiry) to report the fact, that his commanding officer (General Pope) not only omitted to hold him culpable for this separation, but emphatically commended his whole conduct while under his command, without exception or qualification."

How different the facts and the course of the Court in Porter's case.

I. Before deciding not to attempt to execute the order of the twenty-seventh, by marching at one A.M., Porter was strongly advised against it by all of his general officers who were present when he received it. Officers, who have ever been above all suspicion of want of fidelity, and who now, and deservedly, stand high in Executive favor. On their almost positive remonstrance, he only agreed (they could persuade him to no longer delay) to wait till three A.M., but two hours, and he and they issued at once their orders accordingly; and who also proved that Bristow Station was reached as soon as if the march had been attempted at one.

II. His conduct on the bloody field of the thirtieth, red with the blood of thousands of his command, and illustrated by his usual fearless gallantry, and greatly diminishing the day's disaster.

III. Not only the omission of Pope even to intimate to him that he was held culpable for the alleged disobedience of the order of the twenty-seventh, but telling him, as he almost admits in his own evidence, and as was positively proved by Colonel Ruggles, (hereafter to be given,) that he had no fault to find; but, on the contrary, was satisfied with his whole conduct, and his omission afterward to report him to the Department, were all, in the judgment of the Court in his case, of no importance whatever, proving nothing in his favor, either as to act or intent—having not even a tendency to show that in his conduct in relation to the order, he "was not induced by any unworthy motive." For the one—McDowell—facts of the same character, not as strong, are a conclusive defense to proved disobedience. For the other—Porter—such facts, if they have any effect, either come "too late," or prove nothing, or if any thing, prove guilt. Such is the striking difference in the administration of its justice, exhibited by the Government through two of its Military Courts toward these two officers. The one, adjudged to be guiltless, and no doubt properly, who, from misfortune rather than want of skill, had signally failed not only to excite the admiration and gratitude of the Republic, but had received its censure—the other, adjudged guilty and cashiered, who, throughout his career, had evidenced rare skill and daring courage, and in the public estimation had won for himself a name of which the best of Napoleon's Marshals would have had reason to be proud.

How is this to be explained, and the reputation of the Government to pass unharmed? Can any reflecting, unprejudiced citizen give a satisfactory answer? And yet, how priceless to a "nation is even-handed justice." How imperative the interest, and the duty, to observe and enforce it.

But the opinion of the McDowell Court furnishes another instance of duty not performed in the same unfortunate campaign, and at the time known by Pope not to have been performed, and also by the War Department and the President, after that opinion was given—and yet, to this day, not even censured. And what makes that instance the more striking, is, that it was on the part of General King, one of the members of the Court that convicted and sentenced Porter. The division of that officer, as Pope testified before the McDowell Court, had had a successful fight with the enemy, "who were retreating from Centreville, on the night of the twenty-eighth of August, had remained masters of the field, still interposing between Jackson's forces and the main body of the enemy, and that the information was, he thought, brought to him by a staff-officer of General King." This filled him, as it well might, with high hopes of success, and he says that he "immediately" "directed General Kearny, whose division occupied Centreville, to push forward cautiously at one o'clock that night, in the direction of Gainesville, to drive in the pickets of the enemy," etc. "I directed him, at the first blush of daylight, to attack the enemy with his right advanced, and informed him that Hooker and Reno would be with him immediately after daylight. To my surprise and dissatisfaction, I learned toward daylight, on the morning of the twenty-ninth, that King's division had been withdrawn in the direction of Manassas Junction, leaving open the road to Thoroughfare Gap. This withdrawal of that division made necessary a great change in the movement, and was a most serious and unlooked for mistake." McDowell, under whose command King was, had before left his corps improperly, as the Court found. He, of course, did not give King the order to withdraw. If he had, the Court says, "it could not be controverted that he would be justly held responsible for their retreat, and the consequent derangements of the plan of battle then formed by General Pope." By whose order, then, was the retreat made? By King's. Why was not he called to answer for it? Did he know that it was important to hold his ground? Pope says that he was "so impressed with the necessity, that that division (King's) should hold its ground, that I sent several orders to General King (one by his own staff-officer,) during that night, to hold his ground at all hazards, and to prevent the retreat of the enemy, and informed him that our whole force from the direction of Centreville and Manassas Junction would fall upon the enemy at daylight."

The testimony of General Pope, in relation to these orders, the Court adopt, "as a faithful statement of the facts." Was the first order, or either of the succeeding ones, known to or received by King? If they were, how is it that he has not been charged with disobedience? If he did know of the orders, did he satisfy his before surprised and dissatisfied chief that he had good grounds for his disobedience, or, at least, that he "was not induced by any unworthy motive," or has he since satisfied the Department? If he has, then disobedience is not always censurable. Then "the Napoleonic maxim" includes ends as well as means.

That General King, who is known to be a patriotic soldier, had good motives for his failure, disastrous as Pope says it was to his plans, those who are acquainted with him will readily believe.

But to condemn Porter of disobedience, and to cashier him in the face of the reasons which are proved to have governed him, the concurrent and strong advice, and almost remonstrance, of his three Generals, and when the order itself afterward proved to be useless, and not only not to question King, but, on the contrary, to make him one of Porter's judges, and to continue him in high command, is conduct on the part of those in authority which no explanation can justify or excuse.

III. A yet more recent case, in the Army of the Potomac, illustrates still stronger the injustice done to Porter. On the removal from its command, as we all unfortunately now know it to have been, of General McClellan, General Burnside was placed at its head. The high character f gallantry and patriotism of that soldier one that has watched his career will ev question. Whether it was well or ill a vised, his subsequent attack on the enen at Fredericksburgh, proved most dis trous. To redeem the honor of his arm and retrieve, at the same time, his ov weakened reputation, he resolved on a other attack, and on a different plan. Th was at once, not to him only, but to all, cri icised with severity by his officers; and tw of his Generals, with, as it was stated, tl knowledge of others, visited the Presider to protest against it, and did so. The resu was, the President, on their advice, pr hibited the movement. Burnside at onc before he had seen the President, for th insubordination, issued an order, subje to the President's approval, dismissing fro the service several of the highest officer in his command, and many others, and soon after, informed the President in pe son that his sanctioning the order was ir dispensable not only to his remaining i command of the army, but to his contir uing in the military service. He testifie as the reader will remember, before th Committee of Congress on the Conduct o the War, that the President told him tha his order of dismissal was right, but tha before acting upon it, he must consult hi advisers, and that by persuasion he induce the witness to relinquish his purpose t leave the service. The result, and as it i to be supposed of his consultation with hi Cabinet, was that not only were none o the officers who were to be dismissed by the order dismissed, but, on the contrary, that General Hooker, one of the number, was put in the chief command.

Here again criticisms showing, if unexplained, "contempt" for the skill of a Commander-in-Chief may be so explained as to be held innocent, and may even place, notwithstanding his own example of insubordination, one of the critics in the place of the Chief.

IV. Another strong instance must be in the recollection of all. General Charles P. Stone, more than a year since, for alleged disloyalty and insinuated charge of treason, was taken from his then command, and for many weary months imprisoned in Fort Lafayette. Futile were his and his friends' forts to ascertain what were the specific cts of disloyalty, or the grounds of imated treason. No explanation was given could be obtained. And when his case as made a matter of inquiry in the Sen-e of the United States, the Chairman of e Military Committee of that body, who as also Chairman of the Committee on e Conduct of the War, stated, in sub-ance, that the evidence before the latter mmittee fully justified the imprisonment, d the President afterward, in replying a call of the Senate, virtually said the me thing. But now what a change.

o Court-Martial or inquiry was ordered, ough frequently solicited by Stone. No ecification or other definition of the chars ever given him, and yet but the other y he was ordered into service in the rmy of the Gulf, and is now at the head the command which recently so distin-ished itself under the lead of the gallant erman. Porter's case then, though of e same character of those named, is the ly one which, in the opinion of the au-orities, it has been deemed necessary to quire into, much less to punish. He is e only officer who, upon such grounds, has en held unfit for a service which he has adorned, and not to be relied upon to l the country, which, during the present ar, he has so signally served and so ndly loves.

But to return to the evidence, it is said the Judge-Advocate, that neither the aracter of the night, nor the state of the ad, nor the condition of his command caused Porter for his failure literally to mply with the order to start at one A.M.
These objections will be considered in eir order.

I.—As to the Night.

Its darkness had been given as a reason r not starting at one A.M. The Judge-dvocate answers this as he does every rt of the case by giving but detached d partial statements of the evidence of a w of the witnesses, and omitting alto-ther what was proved by those who ere clearly the most to be relied upon.
he parts of the testimony that he does ve, are from the evidence of Captain uryea, Major Barstow, Lieutenant-Colo-l Myers, General Pope, and General
Roberts. What was proved by Generals Morell, Griffin, Sykes, Butterfield and Reynolds, Colonel Cleary, Lieutenant-Colonel Locke, Captain Fifield, and Montieth, and Lieutenant Weld, all present when the order was received, or was being executed, is not given at all, and the reader will ask why? And can he give a satisfactory answer? This obviously unfair omission will now be supplied.

1. Morell says: "It was a very dark night. It was cloudy, threatening to rain, and did rain before morning." (P. 145.)

2. Griffin.—"The night of the twenty-seventh, and the morning of the twenty-eighth was very dark," I "know that at three o'clock, it was very dark, so dark that I used candles with my leading regiments to get through a little piece of woods which we left, in which we had been encamped." (Pp. 160–63.)

3. Sykes.—"The night was unusually dark." "Before I directed the advance to be sounded, I sent an aid-de-camp to find the road, so as to lead the column upon it. He returned in a short time, and told me that the darkness was so great, that he could not distinguish the road. He also told me that he was assisted in that search by several soldiers." (Pp. 176, 177.)

4. Butterfield, after stating, as before mentioned, what occurred in Porter's tent, when the order was received, and Porter's answer to the objections of his Generals to his marching at one A.M., added: "When we got outside, the darkness was so apparent, (to use such an expression,) and it seemed such a matter of impossibility to move, that General Porter said: "In consideration of all the circumstances, I will fix the hour at three o'clock instead of one. You will be ready to move promptly." He also stated that De Kay, who was sent by Pope with the order, said: "That it would be very difficult in getting back. That he would have hard work to find the way." (Pp. 185, 186.)

5. Reynolds, (alas! now of our illustrious dead.)—"It was a very dark night, as was the succeeding night. I recollect both of them distinctly from having been about a good deal, until after twelve o'clock on each night." (P. 169.)

6. Cleary.—"It was dark, cloudy." (P. 121.)

7. Locke.—The night was "extremely dark." "I received a very severe injury, groping about in the darkness." (P. 134.)

8. Fifield.—"The early part of the night was an ordinary star-light night of summer, without any moon. About half-past eleven o'clock, it commenced overcasting, and threatened rain. Very black clouds came up, and it did sprinkle a little. It was very dark from that time till toward morning."

"It was very dark," "every thing so obscure from the extreme darkness of the night, that it would be very difficult for me to give any thing like a reasonable answer, in regard to that matter." (The matter was as to the extent and density of the wood along the road.) He also said "the night was very dark, and it was like a man groping his way in the darkness, without being able to see his hand before him, much of the way through the wood." (Pp. 122–125.)

This witness testified also that he was on duty from half-past ten o'clock, the entire balance of the night.

9. Montieth.—The night was "very dark." (P. 126.)

10. Weld.—The night "was very dark indeed." (P. 129.)

With all this evidence before him, the Judge-Advocate advises the President, that the night was not so dark before eleven o'clock, at least, if at any hour, as to have made it impossible for Porter, "to obey the order," to move at one A.M., and that it was a noticeable fact, "that the determination not to move at that hour, was not occasioned by this extreme darkness, (the admission that the darkness was extreme, thus leaked out,) but had been taken before Captain De Kay lay down, which was at eleven o'clock." And this is told to the President, though the Judge-Advocate knew, or should have known, that General Butterfield had before testified positively, that Porter, and that, too unwillingly, only agreed to postpone the time of marching from one to three A.M. when he, with his Generals, got outside of his tent and saw "the darkness so apparent," that it "seemed to be such a matter of impossibility to move." It was then and not before that Porter yielded to the advice and remonstrance of his three Generals, saying: "In consideration of all the circumstances I will fix the hour at three o'clock, instead of one." Why was the fact represented otherwise, and without even an intimation, that there was proof to the contrary? And especially, why was the President not informed of this evidence of Butterfield? It can not be necessary to say more on this head.

II.—The Condition of the Road.

That, says the Judge-Advocate, afforded no excuse for failing to march at one A.M. However dark the night was—whatever may have been the condition of his men—however worn down by immediately preceding day and night marches—however deprived of rest and food, there was nothing in the condition of the roads, that offered even an apology for not moving. But to the fact. What was the condition of the road?

The witnesses who were on the road that night, Major Cleary and Captain Fifield proved beyond all cavil, the existence of serious obstructions.

1. Cleary.—"At ten o'clock that night I received a note from General Porter to move the trains east of the railroad beyond and east of Cedar Run, toward Bristow Station. I gave the order to the proper persons connected with the trains, and they commenced immediately to move," "the removal of the trains occupied me from ten o'clock, till two o'clock in the morning, at which time, or perhaps a little later, I myself left that point for Bristow Station." "The road for some three miles, I think, was occupied by wagons, and was obstructed so as to render it very difficult for me and my party to pass along." (P. 121.) He testified also that his party consisted of ten or twelve persons only, that he traveled on horseback, and that they did not get to Bristow Station that night.

2. Fifield—He testified that he received rough Colonel Cleary, an order from eneral Porter on the evening of the venty-seventh of August, "to have the ains moved from Warrenton Junction own as far as possible in the neighborhood Bristow Station." He said that he proeded to execute it, and that it was not lly effected till about four o'clock in the orning, because it could not have been oner done, and added, "that the moving the trains during the night, would have evented the possibility of moving troops the railroad track." He also said, that tween "three and four miles" of the ad, (not the railroad,) was occupied by agons, and in reply to inquiries of the dge-Advocate, stated: "I know of no ad except on one side, (that is, on one le of the railroad,) and that the wagons that, were very much jammed and reining stationary. I found a great deal difficulty even in getting through them horseback." (Pp. 122–124.)

II.—The Condition of the Troops.

1. Morell.—They were very much exusted from their previous marching. ey had marched all the way from James ver, except from Fortress Monroe to Acia Creek." "They had marched (laboriisly) and as fast as possible," "and somenes at night." On being told by Porter the order, he said, that he, and Sykes d Butterfield, "immediately spoke of the ndition of our troops, they being so much tigued," as well as of "the darkness of e night, and told him that we did not lieve we could make any better progress attempting to start at that hour, (one M.) than if we waited till daylight." (Pp. 4, 145.)

2. Sykes.—I told Porter, on his informg me of the order to march at one A.M., y reasons for his not attempting it, That a night march is always exceedgly fatiguing and injurious to troops. hat my command had already marched om twelve to fourteen miles that day," c. (P. 176.)

3. Butterfield.—My men "were very uch fatigued. They had marched from elly's Ford to Bealton, and from there up to Warrenton Junction, almost all the way without water, in the dust. It was very warm, and it was with great difficulty that we got them along." (P. 186.)

No portion of this testimony was the President advised of, and yet its materiality is most apparent. Why did the Judge-Advocate omit it, in executing an order, which directed him to report "fully" upon the bearing of all the testimony? Why select a part? Can these inquiries possibly be met satisfactorily? What fair mind will say they can?

The darkness of the night then, the state of the road, the condition of the troops, rendered it, in the opinion of his three Generals, not only inadvisable, but impossible, to execute literally as to time, the order of the twenty-seventh of August. Did the President, when he approved the sentence, know these facts? For the sake of his own character, of his sense of justice, his duty to the country, it is hoped, and believed, that he did not. Did he know, could he have known, that Porter's decision was based not on his own experience merely, but, as proved by Sykes, "upon the opinions of the three General officers in his corps next in rank to himself," (p. 176,) and that each one of them, in his testimony before the Court, maintained the same opinion?

Did he know, that all concurred in saying that "nothing whatever" would have been gained by a different decision? And, finally, did he know, what they all also stated, (as did Pope,) that the "military necessity for the movement to be at one o'clock A.M., on the twenty-eighth, so as to be at Bristow Station at daylight, did not appear, on the twenty-eighth," when Porter's command reached that point? (P. 177.)

Ignorance, however, of these circumstances can not be used in vindication of the Court. How they are to be vindicated, except upon the hypothesis of an obtuseness of intellect, the effect of prejudice, no fair mind can imagine.

But in the march, when it was begun, the Judge-Advocate says, "there was no haste or vigor displayed," and that the mud, spoken of by General Griffin, could not have been an obstacle "at such a season." "It was (he adds) in summer, and a season of drought, as appears from the clouds of dust which are continually brought to our notice by the testimony," and that "he can not, therefore, be misled," by the alleged existence of mud.

A few words on these points are all that can be necessary:

1. The charge of the absence of haste and vigor rests on the evidence of De Kay. On his statement that the troops were marched "at the rate at which troops would move if there was no necessity for rapid movement," and that, in his "judgment," they could "have moved much faster than they did in point of fact."

In the first place, the evidence of this witness, who was on Pope's staff, is to be taken with many grains of allowance. He recollects little except what was thought to prejudice Porter. He remembers nothing of what Porter said to the attending Generals, except that he states Porter said, "Gentlemen, there is something for you to sleep upon," a fact positively disproved by Butterfield, and not stated by Sykes or Morell.

2. He said, "he could not recollect precisely" whether Porter announced his purpose, either to obey the order or not, a fact clearly proved by each of the Generals.

3. That he "was aware of the determination not to start until daylight," because he "went to sleep" on hearing so, when the Generals, all of them say, at first he resolved starting at once, and only delayed till three through their earnest advice.

4. He does not say, what Butterfield proved he did say, that he told Porter "it would be very difficult in getting back. That he would have hard work to find the way."

But, it is not necessary to rely on these circumstances. As the fact of the asserted want of haste and vigor, is positively disproved by each of the Generals, and by other officers, a fact also not disclosed to the President.

1. Morell answered "Yes" to this question. "After starting at three o'clock, did your own command, and so far as you know, the rest of the corps make the best of their way, and push on as fast as p sible toward Bristow Station?" (P. 14

2. Sykes.—"I led the advance on th morning, (the twenty-eighth,) and I co tinued my march to Bristow Station, wi the exception of the usual halts which co mands always have to allow men to pass the rear, and the one that I spoke of at t creek, when I said, I found it necessa to halt my command for some time, order to unite it." (P. 179.)

3. Locke.—"They (the troops) march as fast as they could under the circu stances," and by the circumstances, said, he meant "the darkness of the nig and the obstructions of the road." also stated that the troops "were ve much fatigued." (P. 134.)

How idle to disregard all this concurri proof, and rely not only on the unsupporte but the contradicted evidence of De Ka And how unfair to the President and the public, (the review was intended f both,) and unjust to Porter, not to giv the opposing and contradictory evidenc

II. That the mud was no obstacle "t the onward march of soldiers determine to do their duty." No evidence w offered to prove that there was no mud o any part of the line of march.

I. The Judge-Advocate infers it "fro the clouds of dust" continually brought t our notice by the evidence. How illogica What rare simplicity. The weather wa hot and dry. The parts of the road wher there was no water, were dusty. Ther could not, therefore, be mud, where ther was no dust, but water. Had the exigenc of his case required it, the acute an learned reviewer would have maintained that as Pennsylvania Avenue is at time excruciatingly dusty, there can not then b mud in the marshes of the Potomac.

II. But the fact of there being mud, an that it operated to impede the march, wa proved expressly by Generals Griffin an Butterfield. They were on the spot, lead ing the march of their respective columns and it is rather more than probable, tha they would know better whether ther as mud in the route, and whether it in-posed an obstacle to the march, than an icial sitting in his study, and evidently nt on showing that there was nothing the way to impede "the onward march soldiers determined to do their duty."

1. Griffin.—"I know that the artillery hich followed the brigade, that is, a car-ge or two of the artillery which followed e brigade, got stuck in the mud, or in a tle creek, and had trouble in getting it. (P. 161.)

2. Butterfield.—In answer to a question the Judge-Advocate, he said: "I know at after it had got to be about daylight, went out to the head of my column, and found a difficult place to cross—that there as difficulty in getting the troops across. could see that it had been dark, and the oops had been impeded, but they began go on more rapidly, as light broke."

He was then asked again by the Judge-dvocate to "state the character of the fficulty—the character of the place—was mud or water, or what was it?" And e answered:

"It was mud and water both—one of ose streams that we almost always have force troops over. In the daytime you ould force them over very well—but at ight, when it can not be seen, it is a very ifficult thing to get men across such a lace." (P. 187.)

This testimony of Butterfield is not ven alluded to in the review. Then, un-ss Griffin and Butterfield swear falsely, for mistake as to such facts was impos-ible,) notwithstanding the hypothesis of he Judge-Advocate, resting on the exist-nce of dust on portions of the road, there vas mud and water in other portions, and o an extent interposing obstacles "to the nward march of soldiers determined to lo their duty." But, finally, on this head. Why is it, that Porter, alone of the com-mand is accused of want of "haste or vigor"?

As commander of the entire corps, his duty was but to issue the necessary orders to his division commanders, for the march. And this they all say, was done. It was their duty to superintend the execution of the orders. They are equally responsible for disregard of duty, as their immediate chief. He relied, as he had a right to rely, upon them to conduct the march with proper "haste" and "vigor." He had every reason for such reliance. They had been under his command on many battle-fields. He had seen them in the midst of countless perils, ever foremost in danger, unsurpassed in skill, and nobly devoted to duty. "To do their duty," he knew them to be "soldiers determined." If there was any failure, then, in the speed of the march, it is to be referred to them, and not to him." And yet, who has ever called their patriotism, or their efforts in regard to it, in question? The Government certainly has not. They are now, and have been continuously, from the twenty-seventh of August, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, in its service, and on duty. To hold Porter responsible for their alleged misconduct, (for which, however, there is not the least ground,) and not only not even to censure them, but to keep them in honored commands, is an unequal measure of justice, that amounts to a gross and palpable wrong. One victim, however, was enough. To have sacrificed to the behest of party, or to the exigencies of an ill-planned campaign, and of an unfortunately selected Commander, Morell, Griffin and Butterfield, would have been too glaringly to have outraged public opinion, and it was not done. But the very omission of passing by these officers, and visiting upon their immediate chief, the sole responsibility for the asserted want of haste and vigor in the march of the twenty-eighth of August, which, if it was true, was their fault, and not his, demonstrates the depth and the enormity of the injustice done to Porter.

SECOND SPECIFICATION—FIRST CHARGE.

II. The second specification of the first charge is, Porter's failure to obey the joint order to himself and McDowell of the twenty-ninth August, eighteen hundred and sixty-two. That order was as follows:

"HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF VIRGINIA, CENTREVILLE, August 29th, 1862.

"GENERALS MCDOWELL AND PORTER:

"You will please move forward with your joint command towards Gainesville.

I sent General Porter written orders to that effect, an hour and a half ago. Heintzelman, Sigel, and Reno, are moving on the Warrenton turnpike, and must now be not far from Gainesville. I desire that as soon as communication is established between this force and your own, the whole command shall halt. It may be necessary to fall back behind Bull Run to-night. I presume it will be so on account of our supplies.

"I have sent no orders of any description to Ricketts, and none to interfere in any way with the movement of General McDowell's troops, except what I sent by his aid-de-camp last night, which were to hold his position on the Warrenton pike, until the troops from here should fall on the enemy's flank and rear.

"I do not even know Ricketts's position, as I have not been able to find out where General McDowell was until a late hour this morning.

"General McDowell will take immediate steps to communicate with General Ricketts, and instruct him to join the other division of his corps as soon as practicable. If any considerable advantages are to be gained by departing from this order, it will not be strictly carried out. One thing must be held in view, that the troops must occupy a position, from which they can reach Bull Run to-night, or by morning. The indications are, that the whole force of the enemy is moving in this direction, at a pace that will bring them here by to-morrow night, or the next day. My own headquarters will for the present be with Heintzelman's or at this place.

"JOHN POPE,
"Major-General Commanding."

I. The first inquiry on this head is, what, in one particular, was the meaning of the order? Was it that each of the two Generals was to act independently of each other, or that, being together when received, and being executed, they were to be governed by the sixty-second Article of War? This, as will be seen, is a material point, and was so considered by the Judge-Advocate. He endeavors to give it the former interpretation, and relies for that purpose mainly on Pope's evidence. Pope, he says, testified that his "intention" was, that they "should act independently of each other, and each in direct subordination to himself." (P. 306.) But even with this assistance, he admits that the point is not clear. Anxious as he was to maintain that construction, he could not bring himself to say, in its support, more than that "under these circumstances, it may well be questioned whether, under the Article of War referred to "General McDowell could continue the command which he had assumed over these joint forces." Here, again, as throughout, contrary to the universal rule, doubt, however reasonable, is to be solved to the prejudice of Porter. "Full weight," says Bennet, and all other authorities, is to be given "to every argument or presumption in favor of the prisoner." (P. 126.) Porter was, by the Court and Judge-Advocate, denied the benefit of this rule.

In fact, however, there is no room for doubt. The construction maintained by the Judge-Advocate as probable, is manifestly wrong.

II. To call to the aid of that construction Pope's oral proof before the Court, of his intention, is in violation of the best-established rules of evidence.

The order must be its own interpreter. To construe written matter by evidence aliunde, every professional man knows to be inadmissible. Nothing but confusion, mistake and injustice would be the result of such a course. And in this instance, to refer to Pope's evidence, given months after the order, not made known to McDowell and Porter when they received it, or afterward, until he gave such evidence, is as absurd as it is unjust. How were either of them to know Pope's intention, except as the order disclosed it? He was twelve miles away from them. The order was received, without any explanation or message from Pope. His mind, his intent, they could but collect from the order itself; and certainly they could not foresee that, months afterward, Pope would seek to give it an intent, not only not consentaneous with, but contradictory with its terms. Pope is presumed to have known of the sixty-second Article of War. If by that article, McDowell, as "the officer highest in rank," would have the right to "com-and the whole," then, at least, in the sence of any direction from himself to e contrary, Pope is to be assumed to ve so intended.

The different view taken by the Judge-dvocate serves to deprive Porter of the fense to this specification, that in what is charged to have done, or to have itted, in supposed violation of this der, he acted under the command of eneral McDowell, his senior in rank.

The very fact that such a view is taken the Judge-Advocate, satisfactorily ows, that he thought the opposite one uld, upon the evidence, be a full an-er to the specification. He seeks also maintain his interpretation upon the rther ground, that the article "excludes e idea of the presence of an officer su-rior in rank to those commanding the fferent corps of which it speaks." Cer-inly it does. But was Pope present hen he gave the order? when it was ceived? or was being executed? The dge-Advocate does not say he was, it does say he "was absent but a few iles." How many miles, he does not form the President, or how many miles uld, in his opinion, constitute absence d not presence. As the fact in this nnection was material, he should have ated if he knew, and he ought to have own, the evidence being before him, w far off Pope was, that the President ight judge, as he gave no opinion of his vn to guide him, whether such distance as absence or not. Pope was at Cen-eville, a distance of twelve miles. To y then that he was present would seem be absurd. The Article looks to pres-nt and immediate joint duty.

It was such duty that the order em-raced. The two commands were to act gether. The officers were told to "move rward with your joint command ward ainesville." It contemplated its union ith the forces of Heintzelman, Sigel, nd Reno, and that that occurring, "the hole force should halt." They were also ld, "that the troops (that is, all of them) ust occupy a position from which they n reach Bull Run to-night or by morn-g." In the forward movement of the vo corps, who was to command? Who give the order to halt? Who to de-cide upon the position to be held to enable the command to reach Bull Run that night or morning?

The Article contemplates this very state of things, and provides for it. "If on marches," or "doing duty together" different corps of the army shall happen to join, the officer highest in rank of the line of the army, "shall command the whole, and give orders for what is needful to the service." No matter how the junction is brought about, when it exists, the Article embraces it, and establishes a positive rule, that "the officer highest in rank in the line of the army" is to command the whole with the single exception that it shall be "otherwise specially directed by the President of the United States." To hold that, under the circumstances of this joint command, what was to be done in executing the joint order, was to be done by Pope, who was twelve miles distant, upon the theory that he was, notwithstanding, to be considered present, every one will see is wholly untenable. How was he to judge when to move the command? when to halt, or what position to take with a view to retire to Bull Run that night or the next morning? These two corps were placed by the order and the sixty-second Article under the command of McDowell. No one but the President had the authority to take the command out of the operation of that Article. And even if Pope thought that he had the power, he did not attempt to exert it by the joint order.

II. The specification does not state in what particular the order was disobeyed. It only alleges that Porter "did then and there disobey."

We are to look then, to the evidence and review, for the information. The finding of the Court, merely finds disobedience in fact, without stating in what it consisted.

The President therefore had no knowledge upon the point, except as he obtained it from the Review. That told him that, "the Court concluded and justly, that his (Porter's) falling back under the circumstances, and for the purpose mentioned in his note to Generals McDowell and King, was a violation of the joint order to himself and McDowell." (P. 308.)

As this is the only information we have of what was considered by the Court disobedience, it would be sufficient to confine these remarks to that point. But, as the Judge-Advocate has suggested many things, tending to disparage Porter in other particulars, these will be first noticed.

I. It is said, that when the two corps were together, and the front of Porter's column (his corps being in advance) "had reached some three miles beyond Bethlehem Church," "General McDowell then rode forward to the head of the column of the accused, when an interview and conference took place between them. They discussed the joint order, and General McDowell determined, for himself, that there were considerable advantages to be gained by departing from it," and by moving with his forces along the Sudley Springs road toward the field of a battle, then being fought by the main army of General Pope, at the distance of three or four miles. His purpose was to throw himself on the enemy's centre, and he wished the accused to attack his right flank. He then said to Porter: "You put your forces in here, and I will take mine up the Sudley Springs road on the left of troops engaged at that point with the enemy." (P. 307.)

From this statement, the reader will suppose that McDowell considered himself entitled to direct Porter's movement. The Judge-Advocate should at least be consistent with himself. If upon the theory that Pope was to be considered as present, Porter was not under McDowell's command, then the latter had no right to direct his movements. Of these Porter had the sole control, subject only to Pope.

If they were to "act independently of each other," (and the Judge-Advocate says they were to do so,) and that such was Pope's "intention," then if McDowell's alleged direction to Porter was given authoritatively, it was but intrusive. If on the contrary, as in this part of his review, the Judge-Advocate implies, a different opinion of their relation toward each other, is the correct one, Porter w under the command of McDowell, th it is most important to ascertain wh order, if any, was given by the latter Porter. If he was subject to McDowel command, (as it is confidently believe and as in this part of his argument, conceded by the Judge-Advocate,) th his duty in the execution of the joi order was to act in subordination to th officer. And if in doing so, the joi order was disobeyed, the offender w McDowell, not Porter. Where was M Dowell, when he gave the order to P ter, and what was that order?

I. He was present with the joint co mand, and had the control of it. H leaving it afterward, and going with h own corps to another part of the field, no way impairs the validity or effect his prior order; whatever that was, Po ter was bound to obey it.

II. If McDowell gave an order, wh was it?

The Judge-Advocate would have us b lieve, that it was that Porter should a tack "the enemy's right flank"—shou put his "force in here," meaning, in fro of the then locality of the two corps. H does not intimate even, that a word w uttered by McDowell contrary to this a leged order, and yet the proof is clea (McDowell to the contrary, notwithstan ing,) that there was an order, and not onl that, but that the one alleged was n given at all.

I. Lieutenant-Colonel Locke, Chief o Porter's staff, and his Assistant Adjutan General. He saw McDowell on the twen ty-ninth, "on the ground where he ha taken up our position in the direction o Gainesville, and near the Manassas Rail road," "where Porter was forming hi corps in line of battle." "He had mad considerable progress in the disposition of his troops, a battery was in position and the troops were being deployed Skirmishers were being thrown out i front." On seeing it, McDowell said "Porter, you are out too far already this is no place to fight a battle." (P. 135.)

If this evidence is to be relied upon, and this will soon be examined,) Porter was preparing for battle. He was not then certainly providing for "the personal safety of (himself) and staff," as the reviewer most charitably suggests, was his motive subsequently in another asserted movement on the same day.

2. Captain A. P. Martin, a Captain in the Third Massachusetts battery, commanding "Division Artillery of General Morell's division." He saw a meeting between McDowell and Porter, about eleven o'clock on the morning of the twenty-ninth, "on the road leading from Manassas Junction to Gainesville," and "at the head of the column," (Porter's.) Heard McDowell say to Porter: "PORTER, THIS IS NO PLACE TO FIGHT A BATTLE, YOU ARE OUT TOO FAR." Colonel Locke, he said was present, and within hearing at the time. Porter "had sent out skirmishers to the front, and the troops were moving, closing up apparently en masse, as I supposed, preparing to form a line of battle, which was afterward done. These movements "were continued. The brigade that was leading were being disposed off, on the hill near where the conversation referred to, had taken place—one brigade, and one battery moved off to the right shortly after, evidently preparing to form on the right of the brigade on the hill. I went with the battery that moved to the right, to see the position. One battery was placed where the conversation was held, about that time." (P. 144.)

Both of these witnesses were unimpeached by evidence as to character or otherwise, and in their cross-examination, the Judge-Advocate made no attempt to weaken their testimony. Not a question was propounded, suggesting even a possibility that they could be mistaken. And when McDowell was recalled for the purpose, in part, of rebutting this evidence, he was only asked by the Judge-Advocate, if he had or not, "recollection of having said to Porter," at his interview with him on the twenty-ninth, (he had admitted the fact of the interview,) what was sworn to by Locke and Martin, and his answer was: "I can not recollect precisely what occurred, or what conversation, and what words passed between us at that time. I can not say what language I used, or how it may have been understood, whilst talking on that point," (the joint order.) (Pp. 217, 218.)

He stated also, that he thought the conversation related chiefly to Pope's joint order. It is then, but a failure to remember whether he did or not tell Porter what Locke and Martin positively testified. Non me recordo. In using this phrase, a classic one, since the trial of England's former Queen, it is not intended to intimate, that it was the purpose of McDowell to conceal what he did know, but merely to show that his evidence rebutted nothing, but merely proved a want of memory, as to the fact that he was called to rebut. Every lawyer, every man of sense, knows, that such evidence has not a feather's weight against positive proof. Intelligent experience ever discards it as wholly unreliable. If, in this instance, influence was given to it, it is but another proof of the weakness to which prejudice has reduced the minds of the Court.

The state of things then existing at eleven A.M, on the twenty-ninth, was:

I. That Porter was preparing for battle at the point where McDowell and he met. That his corps were all placed by his order, or were being placed in position for that purpose.

II. That he was told by McDowell, that he was not to fight there, the place not being a proper one for a battle, and that "he was too far advanced." McDowell supposed he was too far forward, that his position was an unfit one, and, of course, a dangerous one, for a conflict, and yet it is insinuated by the Judge-Advocate, that he retreated an hour or two only afterward, on the same day, for the degrading and cowardly purpose of securing "the personal safety of (himself) and staff." (P. 308.)

Was ever a party dealt with so unjustly? Could it have been thought possible, that a gallant officer, who in the many battles through which he had passed, was always in the front, or where danger was greatest —devoting his energies, and periling his life for the honor and existence of his country, whilst the Judge-Advocate was safely seated in his office, where no danger could come, or if it did, could readily be escaped from, would be arraigned by that officer, before the President and the public, as having abandoned his duty, and cravenly fled from the foe for the vile and disgraceful purpose of "personal safety." Is all generosity gone? Is no magnanimity left? Is all gratitude fled? It is of the many dreadful evils of this war, that suspicion takes the place of confidence, prejudice of impartiality, the darkest passions of the highest virtues. Porter a coward! Let him who charges it, go to the noble troops he has so often led to battle, and ask of them if the charge is not true. He would soon be found, if not himself wholly regardless of danger, looking to his "personal safety." Go to the officers who have been with him in battle, and never saw his eye dimmed, except when he discovered his comrades wounded and dying around him, and see with what surprise and scorn the charge would be received. Go to the troops and the officers constituting his corps on the twenty-ninth, and listen to the contempt with which the imputation would be regarded. The enlightened public will never sanction such an accusation by whomsoever made. They are ever grateful to such a public servant as they know Porter to have been. Individuals may be found wanting in that virtue. But such a public, never. Ingratitude, that "crime of deeper die than all the guilty train of human vices," is never found in them.

III. Conceding, however, that the joint order did not direct an attack on the enemy at that point, or elsewhere, on that day, and that McDowell gave Porter no such order, or if he did, that it was without authority, the Judge-Advocate says: "It would seem to have been a manifest violation of the duty resting on Porter in the position in which he was then placed, without reference to any specific order or direction, leading or directing him to engage the enemy," not to have done so. (P. 308.)

I. It would be a conclusive reply to this view that the specification charges only disobedience of the joint order of the twenty-ninth. If it was the purpose of the Judge-Advocate to rely on any such general military duty, as is here stated, fairness, as well as the laws of military pleading, required that it should have be alleged. To specify a particular offens and on the trial rely upon another and t tally different one, is as repugnant to ju tice as to every legal principle. How the accused to prepare for his defense? know what witnesses to summon? or wh proof he is to meet? It is impossible th the law in this respect can be unknown t the Judge-Advocate. A long abando ment of the profession, which he for yea so greatly adorned, may have had its usu result, the making him somewhat rusty i some branches of the science. But th rule of pleading and evidence is so fam iar, and so challenges the assent of ever sensible mind, that he could not have fo gotten it. Why then rely on a charge n stated in the specification? Why prese it to the President as one of the reaso for his approving the finding on the actu specification? Can it be accounted f except because he was satisfied, or appr hended the President would be satisfie that the offense specified was not estal lished by the evidence? Did he urge th same view upon the Court? Did th Court adopt it, or itself take it? If s both he and the Court offended again the law, and committed a legal outrag upon Porter. The same observations a applicable to the further view of the Judg Advocate, that Porter on the same da violated an "elementary principle," "th in the absence of positive restraining order the march shall always be toward th sound of the guns. (Ib.) That is not th offense specified. Nothing can be cleare than this. But, waiving this objectio conclusive as it is, what foundation in fac is there for either of these charges?

II. The ground of the first is said to b that the officer is bound to hold his colum so, "in the advance, as to be ready t afford mutual assistance in time of need." (Ib.) Need, then, is to exist, to make th principle applicable. Who is to judge o it? The officer in command of the colum If he judges erroneously, it is no offense provided he does so honestly. Thos who know Porter require no proof to con vince them that, unless prohibited by "re straining orders," he would ever assist hi brother soldiers in time of need. Did h believe it was wanted in this instance? The columns supposed to have required his aid were not in his sight, but severa niles off. Nor could he leave his own command to ascertain their condition, or the desire of their immediate officers, or of the Commander-in-Chief. McDowell, leaving his column under the same circumstances, to consult Pope, the Court in his case adjudged committed a clear offense, and only omitted to punish for it from an impression that his motives were innocent. Porter remained, as he should, with his troops, and sent one of his aids, Lieutenant Weld, to Pope. That officer states, "about four o'clock on the afternoon of the twenty-ninth," he started on his errand. He bore a written and verbal message to Pope from Porter. The latter was "to the effect that General Morell would soon be strongly engaged; that there was a large force in front of us." The glance that he had of the written one showed him, he said, that it was to the same purport, "but much more minutely, with details"—what they were, he did not remember. He found Pope, "and delivered the message to him, both written and verbal," and asked if there was an answer. Pope told him, "Tell General Porter we are having a hard fight," and said, that "was all he had to send to General Porter." The witness wrote this down, and afterward delivered it in person to Porter. He further stated, that on the way to Pope he "saw General Hatch," who was in command of King's division, that officer, as Hatch said, being sick, and not present. That he gave Hatch both of the messages, as Porter had authorized, and asked him for an answer, and was told, "Tell General Porter that we have whipped the enemy, and are driving them," but soon added, Don't deliver that answer, but this, "Tell General Porter we have driven the enemy in the woods." (P. 129.) This also was delivered to Porter. With these facts in his possession, on what ground could Porter have supposed that Pope needed on his battle-ground Porter's column?

Who was best able to judge? Pope, who was on the site of the battle, and in command of all the forces engaged, or Porter, who was several miles distant? Had Porter not a right to consider that if his assistance was needed, a request, or order to that effect, would have been sent by Pope, in reply to his written and verbal messages by Weld? Pope had the right to demand his assistance. But he not only failed to do this, but even to intimate that he desired it. If the assistance was needed, and not asked, (and it is clear that it was not,) then one of these conclusions follows:

I. Either Pope designedly failed in his duty, or II., had not the intelligence to know (though on the spot) that Porter's corps was needed. But he is not blamed by the Judge-Advocate. On the contrary, (however it may excite surprise, or cause a smile with those who remember the disorganized army that fell back upon the Washington defenses, and its crest-fallen chief,) he tells us, "That it can not be improper to add, what the Record will sustain me in saying, that so far as light is shed upon the subject by the testimony, the Army of Virginia appears to have nobly performed the arduous and perilous work committed to its hands. Its campaign was brief, but marked by signal vigor and ability, and animated by a spirit which, shrinking from neither toil nor exposure, nor danger, bravely struck the enemy whenever and wherever he could be found." (P. 316.) The only way to account for so singular an opinion, is by supposing that the Judge-Advocate closed his eyes to all the evidence in the Record, except that of Pope, Roberts, and Smith, (a fault belonging to the whole of his review,) and also by supposing that the universal voice of the public upon the campaign, which literally filled the land, never found its way within the walls of his office. But it is strange, that when he was penning this eulogium and lauding "the signal vigor and ability of Pope," it did not occur to him, that it was possible the people would find in the fact, that when the President discovered the Capitol in imminent peril, he at once relieved the so much lauded chief, and about the second of September, placed the army under the command of Major-General McClellan, and on the fifth of the same month gave to Porter the command of eighteen thousand men, to guard the most important portion of the intrenchments around the city, and continued him in that position until the twelfth, when he ordered him to the command of his former corps, to which a new division was attached, in the army, with which McClellan, to his great honor and to the incalculable advantage of the country, and the safety of the Capitol and the Executive, fought the battles of South-

Mountain and Antietam—conclusive evidence that the President did not then share in the confidence of the Judge-Advocate in Pope, or in the truth of his eulogium, or participate in his present detraction of Porter.

II. But as the joint order, for the reasons already assigned, as long as McDowell and Porter were together, placed the command of their united forces in McDowell, his order was conclusive on Porter. To have disobeyed it would have been a high military offense. Did McDowell give an order, and what was it? The facts that he gave one, and what the order was, are conclusively proved by the evidence of Locke and Martin, before referred to, and which was not at all weakened, much less rebutted by that of McDowell.

III. Porter's "falling back," the Judge-Advocate says, was the ground on which the Court decided that there "was a violation of the joint order." (P. 308.)

I. The only proof urged to sustain the fact that there was a falling back is a note (which will be given hereafter) of Porter to McDowell and King, without date, but no doubt written and sent on the twenty-ninth, after those officers had left Porter's corps. At this time, Porter was, as before stated, authorized to judge for himself. That this was his right, McDowell having then separated from him, the Judge-Advocate nowhere contests. On the contrary, he admits that McDowell then ceased to have any rightful authority over Porter, and that he (Porter) was left "untrammeled," and empowered to decide for himself what was to be done under the joint order. (P. 307.) He not only makes this concession, but in another part of his review, as has been seen, he goes farther, and maintains that even McDowell present, Porter had the right, under the order, to act independently of him. In this latter opinion he is certainly mistaken, but in the other, clearly right. The order told Porter that "it may be necessary to fall back behind Bull Run at Centreville to-night," and that "one thing must be held in view, that the troops must occupy a position from which they can reach Bull Run to-night, or by morning," "and that if any considerable advantages are to be gained by departing from this order, it will not be strictly carried out." The power, therefore, to judge whether departing from the order would produce "any considerable advantages" was given to Porter exclusively. He had the right to decide on that as fully as Pope himself would have had if personally present. Error in judging of it is no offense if committed honestly. The power, however, was made subject to this positive limitation, that it was not to be exercised so as to place his troops in a position from which they might not be able to "reach Bull Run that night or by morning." Every thing to be done was to be in subordination to that object. To march in a different direction, or to attack the enemy, or to do any thing else would probably hazard that end, it was not to be done. And who was to decide this? Porter. Had he acted without regard to that primary purpose, and by doing so had frustrated it, he would have violated the order, and been justly liable to punishment. Now, what evidence is there that in any thing he did, after McDowell left him, Porter did not decide honestly? His Generals and several of his other officers were examined, and they exculpated him in this, as indeed they did in regard to all the charges. Nor, as to this, did the Judge-Advocate attempt to prove the contrary by any one of them.

If, therefore, Porter had in fact fallen "back," he was empowered to do so if he really judged it expedient, looking to the positive injunction, as to Bull Run, or to "advantages" that he thought would result from it. This proposition, however, is not necessary to his vindication. For there is not only no proof that he did fall back, but positive proof that he did not. "Falling back," as the Judge-Advocate uses the term, means retreat. Did his troops fall back or retreat on the twenty-ninth? There is not a scinctilla of evidence of it; nor does the Judge-Advocate offer any evidence of any fact that even tends to establish it. He not only substitutes surmise for proof, but, in favor of surmise, he rejects positive and uncontradicted proof.

The proof is this:

1. Morell.—He stated that he received an order from Porter, written in pencil, a little before sunset on that evening, and soon after, through Colonel Locke, a verbal message to the same effect, directig him "to make dispositions to attack he enemy," and that he did so. That the rder was afterward countermanded, because of the lateness of the hour, as suggested by him, and he added: "I was irected to remain where I was during the ight." That he made his dispositions ccordingly, describing them, and said, in that way we passed the night." (Pp. 46, 147.)

The written order was produced, on the ross-examination of the Judge-Advocate, nd was as follows:

"GENERAL MORELL: I wish you to push p two regiments, supported by two others, receded by skirmishers; the regiments t intervals of two hundred yards, and ttack the party with a section of a battery, pposed to you. The battle works well n our right, and the enemy are said to be etiring up the pike. Give the enemy a ood shelling when our troops advance.

"F. J. PORTER,
"Major-General Commanding."

What conclusive proof this, that Porter, on that day, was thinking of "the personal safety of (himself) and staff"! It is commended as such to the special meditation of the charitable Judge-Advocate. The witness further stated, "I received from General Porter an order to remain all night where I was," in line of battle, immediately in front of the enemy, and did so.

2. Butterfield, Sykes, Locke, and B. F. Smith proved that the troops remained in their position in front of the enemy, all the night of the twenty-ninth. Locke said that they continued there "until the next morning at daylight," and to the question, "was there any retreat at all, answered no." (P. 195.) Smith, a witness of the Government, examined by the Judge-Advocate, and whose evidence he fully relied upon for another purpose, was asked by him, "Was there or not any such display of the enemy's forces as to make it necessary, in your judgment, to retreat before them?" and answered: "I had no means of knowing. When we moved back from that position I supposed it was for some proper cause, but I did not understand at all what the cause was. I did not receive any impression that we were retreating from the enemy. I supposed that we were making a reconnoissance to feel the enemy in that direction, and, having found him, that we had moved back for some other purpose and, not knowing about the orders to the General, I remained under that impression. (P. 113.) Is it not then passing strange, that with this clear proof, the Court should, as the Judge-Advocate says they did, "and justly," have found that Porter did fall back, did retreat on that evening, and in that way (the only one suggested) violated the joint order? It can but be accounted for as other gross errors can only be by assuming the existence from some cause aliunde of judicial and official blindness. The only ground relied upon by the Judge-Advocate is the following note, heretofore referred to, from Porter to McDowell and King.

"GENERALS MCDOWELL AND KING: I found it impossible to communicate by crossing the roads to Groveton. The enemy are in strong force on this road, and as they appear to have driven our forces back, the firing of the enemy having advanced and ours retired, I have determined to withdraw to Manassas. I have attempted to communicate with McDowell and Sigel, but my messengers have run into the enemy. They have gathered artillery and cavalry and infantry, and the advancing masses of dust show the enemy coming in force. I am now going to the head of the column to see what is passing and how affairs are going. Had you not better send your train back? I will communicate with you.

"F. J. PORTER,
"Major-General."

Waiving for the present, what however is most obvious, that if Porter had withdrawn to Manassas, (his purpose when this note was written,) the movement would have been within the discretion vested in him by the joint order, yet as the evidence is clear, that he did not so withdraw, but, on the contrary, continued where he was in front of the enemy, when the note was written, and until the morning to the thirtieth, and then only marched under a positive order from Pope, he could have been found guilty of falling back or retreating upon the twenty-ninth, only upon the hypothesis, that an unexecuted purpose is the exact equivalent of an executed one. In the view of ordinary minds, to do is one thing, and to intend to do, another—but with this Court and Judge-Advocate, they are in fact and in law identical, and Porter has been adjudged guilty of disobedience, not because he did disobey, but because he, for a moment, contemplated disobedience. There is no better way of meeting such reasoning than to state it. Like all palpable follies, it answers itself.

The Judge-Advocate asserts, however, that the purpose to "retreat," "most energetically," as he says announced in the note, "was promptly carried out substantially if not to the letter, because at between five and six o'clock, the accused was found at or near Bethlehem Church, surrounded by his troops, whose arms were stacked." (P. 308.) He omits, however, to inform the President, or even to allude to it, that the greater part of his troops, Morell's division, as proved by Morell himself, remained during the night, and, by Porter's order, where McDowell left them, in the immediate front of the enemy, and in line of battle, prepared either to repel or attack, as the occurrences of the night might require. That all the troops were not there, upon the point in question, proves nothing. The Judge-Advocate would seem to think that there was a retreat, if the whole corps was not retained at the spot—placed in solid column, standing erect, and with arms at the shoulder. But this is mere fancy. What witness proved a retreat in a military sense? Not one, whilst Morell, Locke, and B. F. Smith testified that there was no retreat, in fact, and no order given for one. Here again hypothesis is made to do more than take the place of proof—it is used to supplant it. The Judge-Advocate, conscious that the order from McDowell to Porter of the twenty-ninth, which Colonel Locke positively swears he received and delivered that afternoon, would be a full justification for Porter's not attacking the enemy, assails the witness. This he does, not by calling witnesses to impeach his character for veracity, or in any other respect, but by proving, I., by McDowell, that he did not recollect giving the order; II., by King, that he was not with McDowell (as Locke had said he was) when McDowell, as stated by Locke, gave the order. The reviewer says, that McDowell "declared that none such was sent by him." This is not so. He made no such statement—on the contrary, he studiously avoided doing so. He but professed not to recollect having given it. King's evidence was to the same effect. He was only asked by the Judge-Advocate if he remembered being with McDowell about the time when Locke testified he received the order, and said that he did not. And to another question he answered, that he did not remember hearing McDowell give any such order that day. In his case, then, as in McDowell's, there existed but a want of recollection. Is this to destroy the evidence of a witness not otherwise impeached, who swears that the order was given? As far as there is proof, and as those who are acquainted with the parties, know to be the fact, Locke's character for veracity is as perfect as that of McDowell's or King's. Why then is his truth assailed and their being mistaken even, treated as impossible? King admitted that he was sick on that day, and although he did not state what his disease was, yet, as he said, he was too sick to take part in the battle of the succeeding day, and was forced to leave his division to be led by Hatch; as his loyalty and gallantry are beyond all question, his sickness must have been severe. Certain diseases we all know (and King's may have been of that kind) produce listlessness and impair memory. And yet on this negative and wholly unreliable evidence, it is maintained by the Judge-Advocate, that no such order was given, and that Locke, the equal in virtue of McDowell and King, willfully swore false.

Mistake as to the fact to which he testified was impossible. If the order was not delivered by McDowell to Locke, then the latter knew it, and his testimony was designedly untrue. But, whether the order was in fact sent by McDowell, Locke positively swears he delivered it to Porter as coming from McDowell. No one contradicts this, either positively or negatively. To receive it as true, therefore, would seem to be unavoidable; but it is not so with the Judge-Advocate. He assumes, without charging it designed falsehood on the part of Locke in his statement, that the order was sent by McDowell, and then maintains that the other fact proved by him, the delivery of such an order to Porter, is to be rejected as untrue on the authority of the maxim, which, according to his reading, is "falsum in uno, falsum in omnibus," (it should be "falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus.") Desirous, however, as he evidently was to impeach the credibility of Locke, he could not bring himself to charge him with willful falsehood. And yet the maxim has no application to any other. And it applies there, because in such a case, the very ground on which credit is given to human testimony fails. You can not be certain in such a case whether there is truth in any part of the witness's evidence. Having (says the Judge-Advocate) been discredited as laboring under a complete misapprehension in regard to the first, the receiving the order from McDowell,) his discredit necessarily attaches to the second, (the delivery of such an order to Porter,) and under the maxim quoted, his entire statement falls to the ground." (P. 314.)

Mistake—"misapprehension," as to one fact, the Judge-Advocate asserts—taints the whole evidence of the witness, and demands its rejection. It establishes, therefore, in the sense of the maxim, according to his understanding of it, falsehood. If this was its true construction, in how many cases could testimony be of any avail? What witness but proves at times to be mistaken, or to misapprehend some of the facts to which he testifies? Human memory often honestly fails — is human testimony on that account to be rejected? But if misapprehension as to a fact legally and morally discredits every other portion of the evidence of a witness, for the same reason the misapprehension of the meaning of a legal maxim, would deny to him who entertains it any legal knowledge. The misapprehension of the meaning of the maxim quoted by the Judge-Advocate, every student will see is clear beyond all doubt. Its meaning is stated with his accustomed perspicuity by Mr. Justice Story, in the case of the Santissima, 7 Wheat. 338. "Where a party speaks to a fact in respect to which he can not be presumed liable to mistake, as in relation to the country of his birth, or his being in a vessel on a particular voyage, or living in a particular place, it is extremely difficult to exempt him from the charge of deliberate falsehood; and Courts of Justice, under such circumstances, are bound upon principles of law, and morality, and justice, to apply the maxim falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus. What ground of judicial belief can there be left, when the party has shown such gross insensibility to the difference between right and wrong, between truth and falsehood?" But yet how unfair it would be to deny to the Judge-Advocate even very distinguished legal attainments! He so wished to get rid of the fact fatal to his immediate purpose, the approval of the sentence against Porter, that he was oblivious for a moment of the true sense of the maxim or of the moral principle on which it rests.

It is unaccountable also why the Judge-Advocate did not call the President's attention to the positive statement by Porter in his defense, that Locke delivered the order to him. Did he doubt Porter's truth? Did he think his statement false? He could not. He must have known, or could have informed himself, that in the estimation of all who knew them, Porter, as a gentleman, and man of honor, is in every respect the peer of McDowell and King and himself. It is no answer to this suggestion, that Porter's defense is not evidence. It is not legally, but it is morally. Locke being confirmed by Porter, whose veracity no gentleman will question, should have saved Locke from the charge of perjury, so recklessly made by the Judge-Advocate.

But the evidence of Locke, after McDowell and King were examined, is so clear that it is impossible not to credit it. After stating why he considered McDowell's message to Porter singular and important, he said that on that account "it impressed me very strongly all the way up to the time that I gave it to General Porter." That its character was such that he thought no one should hear it but Porter, and that he therefore "delivered it to him in an under-tone," and that he had "never forgotten the messages or the incidents connected therewith." He also described minutely where he found McDowell and King. At the time he knew the former well, but not the latter. And in conclusion was asked this question, "Are you entirely positive, as much as you can be of any fact, that you did deliver to General Porter, on the afternoon of the twenty-ninth of August, words which purported to be a message from General McDowell, to the effect that General King was to be taken away, and that he, Porter, was to remain where he was"? and answered: "I AM POSITIVELY CERTAIN OF IT." (Pp. 223, 224.)

It is not thought that there was a person present when this evidence was given, not excepting the Judge-Advocate, who did not fully believe it. It was impossible to do otherwise. The manner of the witness, his evident intelligence, the reason he assigned for his conviction, all united to challenge absolute confidence in his truthfulness and accuracy. To discredit him as to the fact of delivering the message to Porter, on the authority of the legal maxim quoted by the Judge-Advocate, is as cruel as it is legally absurd. With as much, indeed greater propriety, could the maxim be used to destroy the whole evidence of McDowell and King. The one is proved by Locke to have given the order, the other to have heard it given. No fair legal mind can doubt this. They say, they do not recollect the facts. The Judge-Advocate maintains "that, under the circumstances, this is in effect the same as positively swearing that the facts did not occur."

They then are found to have labored "under a complete misapprehension in regard to" them, and, being to that extent "discredited," the discredit necessarily attaches to "all the evidence," and under the maxim, "falsum in uno, falsum in omnibus," to use the Judge-Advocate's Latin, the entire evidence "falls to the ground." That an accusation of falsehood against these officers, on that ground, would be most unjust and disreputable to him who should make it, all will agree, and none, it is supposed, more decidedly than the Judge-Advocate. And yet such an imputation is cast by him on Locke, on that very ground and no other. The topic is too unpleasant to be further considered. But finally, on this specification, how the Court could find it against Porter is incredible. It averred only disobedience of Pope's joint order.

Whether that existed or not was best known to Pope. Porter's conduct was all before him. He was informed of every thing that he had done under the joint order. And yet with this information, in no part of his evidence did he state or intimate that the order had not been obeyed. All that he said on the subject, or that the Judge-Advocate could induce him to say, was not that that order was not obeyed, but the subsequent one of half-past four of that day. At the time this last order was received, the proof is clear and uncontradicted, that Porter was doing every thing required by the joint one.

Neither Pope nor any other witness testified to the contrary. And yet the Court found the specification true. Such a finding under all the circumstances can serve but to disparage their intelligence in the estimation of the public.

THIRD SPECIFICATION.—FIRST CHARGE.

Disobedience of the half-past four order of the twenty-ninth of August. The order was as follows:

"HEADQUARTERS IN THE FIELD,
"August 29, 1862, 4.30 P.M.

"MAJOR-GENERAL PORTER: Your line of march brings you on the enemy's right flank. I desire you to push forward into action at once on the enemy's flank, and, if possible, on his rear, keeping your right in communication with General Reynolds. The enemy is massed in the woods in front of us, but can be shelled out as soon as you engage their flank. Keep heavy reserves and use your batteries—keeping well closed to your right all the time. In case you are obliged to fall back, do so to your right and rear, so as to keep you in close communication with the right wing.

"JOHN POPE,
"Major-General Commanding."

I. It will be seen that this order assumes that Porter's line of march under the joint one would bring him "on the enemy's right flank."

It directs him, therefore, when he gets on that flank, to attack it "at once," and if possible the enemy's "rear." To do this last, the flank was necessarily to be first turned. So that the order with reference to both the flank and rear attacks, was intended to depend on the contingency of Porter's march under the previous order, bringing him "on the enemy's right flank." As this, however, necessarily involved the line of the enemy's march, as well as that of Porter's, and neither he nor Pope could control the former, Pope could not have been certain when he issued the half-past four order, that Porter would be brought by the route he was pursuing under the joint order on the enemy's right flank. Pope therefore could not have designed (the words indeed of the half-past four der negative such a design) that Porter as to attack, unless his march brought m on that flank of the enemy. If it ould bring him on the enemy's left or ntre, then the order from necessity be- me inoperative.

II. Where then, pursuing as it is admit- d he did, the route prescribed by the joint der, was Porter's command when he re- ived that of half-past four? The proof ll one way. He was not on the enemy's ght flank, but in his immediate front, and ere he was in full force. Not only then s the order inoperative, but to have at- npted in that position of his troops to ve marched them toward the enemy's ght flank with a view to attack that, and, possible, his rear, would not only have led, but almost certainly have been fol- ved by serious if not fatal consequences his command. What was the fact? as the enemy in his front, and in force, en he received the half-past four order?

I. At what hour did he receive it?

The Judge-Advocate on this, as well as every other point of doubt, decides so to prejudice Porter. The rule is other- se in every system of civilized jurispru- nce, and this is believed to be the first se in which it has been uniformly de- rted from.

Facts have not only been disregarded, erences, the wildest and most uncharit- ble, indulged in, but the best established gal principles, without even a sophistical ason to excuse it, totally repudiated. at when did Porter in fact receive the der? The Judge-Advocate admits that regard to this, "there is a decided con- ct in the testimony." He seems rather clined to conclude for himself, that it was ceived about half-past five o'clock. And suggests that "it may be that after refully considering all the circumstances, e Court felt that the explicit and intel- ent statements of Captain Pope and his derly, fortified by the corroborative evi- nce of Generals Pope, McDowell, and berts, were not overcome by the opin- ns of the five officers examined on the rt of Porter. (P. 309.)

But what is the evidence?

1. Captain Pope of General Pope's staff.—He says that he supposes that the distance between Pope and Porter, when he got from the former, the half-past four order, was "three miles," and swears that it was in Porter's hands "by five o'clock." On cross-examination, he admitted that he fixed the hour when it was handed to him, by Pope, from the time stated on the face of the order. He did not profess other knowledge of it. He described the road he took to get to Porter, and said that he returned by the same road. (P. 57.)

2. Charles Duffer, the orderly.—He fixed the distance between the two Generals, not at three, but at "about five miles, as near as he could judge from traveling the road." This is the distance that the Judge-Advocate adopts, discarding, in that respect, what he calls "the explicit and intelligent statement of Captain Pope." He says that Pope "rode as fast as his horse could carry him, and had but about five miles to travel, and yet, according to the theory of the defense, that he did not arrive until sunset, or half-past six, he was two hours on the way," and then asks, with an air of triumphant logical confidence: "Is it credible that a staff-officer, bearing an important order in the midst of a fiercely contested battle, would have traveled at this rate, and this too when he was conducted by an orderly acquainted with the road, and encountered no obstacle? Is it not much more probable that but a single hour was occupied, and that, in point of fact, he arrived at half-past five?" (P 309.) He thus rejects as to the time of arrival, as he had done as to distance, Pope's evidence, and adopts that of the orderly, and yet tells us, that the statements of both, though materially conflicting, were adopted by the Court as being "explicit and intelligent." He also says that these statements were "fortified by the corroborative evidence of Generals Pope, McDowell, and Roberts." How this could be, when the statements were contradictory of each other, it is not very easy to comprehend. But let that pass. What is the supposed corroborative evidence?

1. General Pope.—"I know that an aid-de-camp, riding rapidly, could go from the field of battle to Manassas Junction, or to any point west of Manassas Junction, within an hour, by going at speed.

2. Roberts, the disinterested prosecutor of Porter—he says that he was present when the order was issued, and gives it as his opinion that it should have been delivered "in half an hour or less, as orders are generally delivered on such occasions."

3. McDowell.—He agreed with young Pope as to the time and place, when he says he saw the witness. Neither of these officers even profess to know when the order in fact was delivered to Porter, nor at what rate of speed the messenger traveled, nor the character of the road he passed over; and yet their opinions are gravely relied upon as confirming the statements of the messenger and his orderly, although they vitally conflicted with each other. And their statements and their supposed corroboration are held sufficient wholly to rebut the positive proof of five witnesses of admitted intelligence and unquestioned integrity, who were present when the order was delivered, and concurred as to the time.

That this would be manifestly unreasonable if the evidence of the two was the same, and if neither was contradicted in any material fact, every impartial mind will agree. But in this instance, it is the more obviously unreasonable since Pope is contradicted as to other material facts than the hour at which he says he delivered the order, and, H., Duffer, the orderly, disproves the facts on which Pope and Roberts, and the Judge-Advocate, base their opinions. Captain Pope stated first, that after giving the order to Porter, he returned by the same road by which he had arrived; second, that no one pointed out to him the road on his return, except his orderly.

In both these particulars he is expressly contradicted.

1. By Lieutenant Weld.—In his evidence in chief, he says, that he carried, on the afternoon of the twenty-ninth, an order from Porter to General Pope, and adds, I "got back after sundown—I think it was about a quarter to seven o'clock when I got back, as near as I can recollect." That General Pope's messenger to Porter (admitted to be Captain Pope) "came afterward." "I was told to show this messenger the direct road back to General Pope. I did show it to him, and described it, and even drew on a piece of paper the road I had taken, which I afterward found out was not the direct road; there was little variation in it. He could not see the road; he did not seem to understand where the road was, where it crossed the railroad. Some one then told me that I had better go and show him where the road was, and I went up to the railroad with him, and pointed out the road that I had taken." "He started on it." (P. 130.)

2. Lieutenant George T. Ingham, Aid-de-Camp to General Sykes.—Was present, he said, when the order was delivered to Porter, and knew Pope, the messenger, "it was after sunset." That Pope did not remain "there more than twenty or twenty-five minutes at the outside." That after he had left, the witness was sent by Porter to recall him. "I rode on pretty rapidly and I found Captain Pope had got between a quarter and a half-mile. There were several officers on the road, and I had to ride up close to Captain Pope to see who he was, it was so dark at that time." He further stated that Pope, on starting to return, did not take "the Sudley Spring Road, the road he finally took," but "was bearing off down the railroad, toward Manassas Junction, and that he then told him to take the left-hand road, and that then Lieutenant Weld (the former witness) went down to the road with Pope, to show him which road to take." (P. 199.) It will be remembered that Pope had sworn that he had returned by the same road that he had come, and that no one had pointed out to him any other.

3. Major General Sykes.—He was present when Captain Pope delivered the order to Porter. It was "as near sunset as I can remember; certainly, within a little before sunset, or after sunset." (P. 177.)

4. Locke.—He witnessed the delivery, and said it was "between sundown and dusk." (P. 136.)

5. Montieth.—Was present, knew Pope, and says he delivered the order about "sundown." (P. 127.)

All this evidence, however, is rejected by the Judge-Advocate, and, as he tells us, by the Court, although the witnesses re with Porter when the order was dered, saw it delivered, and concurred in ting that it was about sundown. Their tements are at least equally "explicit l intelligent" as Pope's and his orderly's,

; they are passed over, and theirs
pted.

I. Nor does the corroborative evidence ed upon in support of the latter amount ny thing. It consists of mere opinion, ilst the rejected evidence was positive ement of facts, made on personal wledge. When the order could have n delivered, in the judgment of Gener-Pope and Roberts, and how long it uld take a messenger to go from the nt where he saw McDowell to Porter's t, can be but mere opinion. General pe says an hour. Roberts says a half-ur; in no exigency, does he fail, the lge-Advocate. But to carry the mes-e within either an hour or half-hour, y unite in saying that speed was neces-
y. Pope says it could be done within time he named, "by going at speed"— berts, in his "half-hour or less, if carl as orders are generally carried on h occasions." Whether it was in fact ried "with speed," or as is "generally" e, neither ventures to say. The Judge-vocate presumes "speed," from the racter of the message. He can not bee it "credible that a staff-officer" could more than an hour in performing such uty. In his view, it is nothing that intelligent and honorable witnesses ar positively to a later delivery. He,
, as he says, the Court, adopts the ements of Pope and his orderly, not y not corroborated in any manner, but ressly contradicted in the very material of the roads traveled coming or rening. The reasoning of the Judge-Ad-ate is, that the messenger did what he fesses to have done, because he should e done it.

He also maintains, in the support of his othesis, that Pope "rode as fast as his se could carry him." How fast that s, depended on the character of his horse l of his orderly's, and the nature of the d. To suppose all horses go at the e pace, and that their speed is irrective of the nature of the road, is not ctly logical, if experience is to be conered. And in this case, too, to conclude t actual speed was had in the sense in which the term is used by Generals Pope and Roberts and the Judge-Advocate, is to disregard the evidence of the orderly. It is apparent that the Court, who alone examined this witness, (he was produced by the Government, after Porter had "rested his case,") would like to have had him prove that great speed was used in the transmission of the order, but in this they failed. He said: "Sometimes we were on a trot, sometimes on a walk, and sometimes on a canter, going about as fast as we thought our horses could travel." (P. 208.) He was then asked: "How much of the way did you gallop?" And answered: "That is more than I can tell you. We went as fast as we could from the nature of the road, and as we thought our horses could travel." He was further asked: "Do you remember whether you trotted or walked, or galloped the most of the way?" and replied: "We had to go a good deal of the way quite slow, on account of the road being very bad, rough in places." The Court, unwilling to abandon their purpose, asked this additional question: "Did you gallop any at all?" And were answered: "Yes, sir, we did." I recollect galloping some, in other places we had to go quite slow. (Pp. 209, 210.)

The speed, therefore, required, in the judgment of Generals Pope and Roberts, for the delivery of the order by five, or five and a half o'clock, was not used, unless to travel "a good deal of the way quite slow," as proved by the orderly, and not disproved by young Pope, is to go with speed. It is not only true, therefore, that the preponderance of evidence shows that the time of the delivery of the order was about sunset, but that there is not any reliable evidence to the contrary. Even, however, if the first part of the remark alone was correct, the Court should have found the fact, that the delivery was at that time. They had neither the legal nor moral right to find it otherwise. Where witnesses are equally intelligent and fair in character, the testimony of the greatest number is to prevail. The probabilities of mistake (designed mistake in such case being impossible) are less likely with many than a few. The Court, consequently, in pursuing the course attributed to them by the Judge-Advocate, violated both legal and moral principle. In addition, however, to the distinct proof of the five witnesses, which was made to yield to that of the two, though one of the two was positively contradicted, and the evidence of the other but served to confirm that of the five, there was before the Court, in regard of the transmission of other orders in which no error was intimated, evidence that strongly confirmed that of the five. It is this:

The important and urgent order of three A.M., of the twenty-ninth, (p. 28,) for the corps to march at dawn of day, was not delivered till six A.M., (about two hours after dawn,) though the distance was only five miles. The one of seven P.M., of the twenty-sixth, (p. 154,) not till eleven P.M., and another of four A.M., of the twenty-seventh, (p. 153,) was also four hours in its delivery, though the distance was but six miles. And the one of eight-fifty P.M., of the twenty-ninth, (p. 7,) dispatched to and from the same point as the four-thirty order, was six hours and forty minutes in its delivery, the distance being but four miles.

Neither of the officers who bore those several orders were reprimanded by Pope for delay. Nor could they have been, justly. The roads were very bad, and comparatively unknown, and the horses much broken down by prior hard work. Speed, of course, was impossible. It can not be necessary to pursue the inquiry further.

The order, then, having been received about sundown, or, as General Sykes says, "certainly within a little before sunset, or about sunset,"

I. Was it obeyed? And

II. If not, why not?

The proof is distinct, that the moment it was received, Porter sent an order to Morell, who was in the advance, to attack the enemy.

1. Locke says, Porter handed me the order, and "very soon afterward ordered me to ride up to General Morell, and direct him to move forward and attack the enemy immediately, and to say, that he would be up himself right after me." (P. 136.)

2. Morell says, that soon after sunset, Locke "came to me with an order from General Porter to make the attack, (he had been preparing for one under a prior order.") "I told him, (and I think in message to General Porter, I spoke of lateness of the day,) that we could not it before dark." (P. 147.) This or was afterward, and in the judgment Morell, properly, countermanded. thought that the day was too far vanced, and the enemy too well strongly posted in the front, and in great force to justify the attempt. In opinion all the officers in the comm concurred. Colonel Marshall, as will seen presently, most decidedly.

The Judge-Advocate states, that "the inaction" of Porter's command, by its "falling back," (a charge before futed,) "the enemy had been so far couraged in their advance, that at hour, the front of (Porter's) column not separated from the advance of rebels by more than a mile, or a mile a a half," and that "little time therefore required to make the attack." He fa however, to inform the President, wha evidently true, that the joint order of twenty-ninth from Pope, was designed prevent the junction of Longstreet's cor supposed to be twenty-four thousa and Jackson's twenty five thousand. T it was for that purpose, that Pope, by t order, united the commands of McDow and Porter. Before McDowell separat from Porter, he had read General Bufor note to General Ricketts, as appears by evidence. (P. 83.) That note was dat at half-past nine o'clock A.M. on the twen ninth, and stated that "seventeen re ments, one battery, five hundred caval passed through Gainesville three quart of an hour ago, on the Centreville ro I think this division should join our for now engaged at once. Please forwa this." (P. 84.) He also said the re ments averaged 800 men. Buford, at t time he sent this note, was at Groveto about four miles from Gainesville. T proof is most conclusive that it was Lon street's corps that Buford referred to, a that it was that corps which was in t immediate front of Porter. If it was, is supposed, the purpose of the joint ord that an attack should be made to preve the junction of Longstreet and Jackso by the blended commands of McDow and Porter, it should have been made that time. Instead of this, McDowell, w being the senior in rank, had the contr

the whole force, retired with his own ps, taking with him a division of Por-
's, (King's,) and repaired to a distant int, which he was several hours in reach-g, and where he was beyond a support-g distance from Porter. This is alluded under the present head, to confirm the tement before made, that prior to his thdrawing and reducing by more than e half, the force which Pope had assign-for the attack, and leaving Porter with enemy over double his own force in nt, he never gave Porter an order to ke the attack. This conclusion is necesy to exempt McDowell from the impuion of reckless folly, gross military igrance, and a disregard of what he must ve known was the design of the Comnder-in-Chief. It was in this condition his force, that Porter received the order half-past four. And as already appears, gave orders, without the least delay, to ke the attack, and abandoned the purse afterward, because of the approach night, which made it, in the judgment Morell, as well as in his own, impossible make an effective one. It is asserted the Judge-Advocate, that there was t an "earnest or vigorous effort on the rt of (Porter) to obey the order." Moll says, as has been already seen, that the oment he received Porter's order through ocke, he proceeded to place "the men in sition to make the attack." And Locke ys, that the moment Porter received the der, he carried one from Porter to Moll to attack, "at once." The Judge-Adocate assumes that there was but a small rce in Porter's front, and rests for his sumption principally upon the testimony General Roberts. It is sufficient to say, relation to his evidence, and to show
w totally unworthy of consideration it in this particular, that he does not prend to have seen Porter's position on that ay, later than "about one o'clock." He uld not therefore have seen the position, had any information of the strength of e enemy in Porter's front, later than that our. Nor does he pretend to have been earer to it, at any time of the day, than a mile and a half." He says, too, "I ould not see his command, there were oods intervening," nor could I "see his nmediate front." (P. 215.) And yet, lthough it was literally impossible that he ould have any information to justify it, he ives it as his opinion that there was "only a cavalry force with some light artillery," in Porter's front. And yet, more strange is it, that the Judge-Advocate adopts this opinion in preference to the testimony of Major Hyland, attached to Colonel Marshall's regiment of skirmishers, and who was eight hundred or a thousand yards in advance of Morell, and near the enemy, of Lieut. Stevenson, of Colonel Marshall, Morell, and of every other officer examined, who was with Morell's command on that evening. Under the circumstances, his criticism upon the testimony of Stevenson, that "he was a young man with limited experience," is amusing, when it is remembered with what confidence he relies upon the testimony and opinion of young Pope, Smith the orderly, and Roberts, with his admitted ignorance of the facts upon which he gives his opinion. The reliable evidence upon the point which was rejected by the Judge-Advocate is, however, conclusive.

1. Major Hyland. — He belonged to Morell's division, and was on the evening of the twenty-ninth in "the front of it." That his regiment was at the time "employed as skirmishers," "from about one o'clock of the afternoon of the twenty-ninth, until daylight of the next day. That the Twenty-second Massachusetts and Berdan's sharpshooters were placed on our left in the evening." That the enemy "commenced forming between two or three o'clock," in our front, "there appeared to be two columns of them." The witness indicated the position of his regiment, and the enemy on the map, which was before the Court. That no portion of the enemy was on the left of his regiment. That he knows of their forming to attack (Porter's force) during the day. He "could hear the commands plainly as if forming in line, and the movements of their artillery coming into position." On cross-examination by the Judge-Advocate, in answering this question with reference to the number of the enemy, "Can you state how many thousands, or divisions, or regiments?" he answered: "I could not state the number of thousands, or divisions. I judge, from the movement and from the commands given, that there was a very large force indeed, probably a larger force than we had." He reported the force to Colonel Marshall, his commanding officer. He further stated that he thought it "was sufficient to have made a successful resistance to General Porter's entire corps." Although unable to state with accuracy the number of the enemy, he yet added, that "from what information I had, and from what I could get from the other officers, I thought their force was very heavy indeed. I should think there were probably ten thousand troops in front of us. Judging by the columns of dust that I also saw coming from the same direction." And in reply to a question by the Court, he stated that in his opinion "the strength of the enemy," in Morell's front, was increased by the "strength of their position." (Pp. 174–176.)

2. Stevenson, of the Thirteenth New York Volunteers, Marshall's regiment. On the twenty-ninth, he went on horseback "from the left flank of General Pope's army to the position then occupied by" his regiment. That the distance was "between a mile and a mile and three quarters." That he was almost an hour in traveling it, and reached his regiment "between one and four o'clock in the afternoon." That when he got there he could "see the enemy," and "judge him to be about between twelve and fifteen thousand." That he could "see his forces of different arms, infantry and artillery," and could see that "he was receiving reinforcements."

3. Colonel E. G. Marshall, of the Thirteenth New-York Volunteers, was with his regiment on duty with General Morell's division, on the twenty-ninth. "About one o'clock, I was detailed by General Porter to go with my regiment across an open country and a ravine, to some timber that was facing our line of battle, and deploy skirmishers to find out the position of the enemy, and any thing else that I could find out concerning them." They were "a very large force, and they were drawn up in line of battle as they came down." After describing the manner in which the enemy approached, and saying that he deemed it so important, that Morell should know their position, that he was unwilling to trust his orderlies or others with messages, he said that he repaired himself to Morell to confer with him "concerning the enemy." "This was about dusk." Upon hearing from Morell, that he had orders from Porter to attack the enemy, and finding that Morell was much troubl concerning it, and that he "asked my vice," says, "I told him BY ALL ME NOT TO ATTACK, THAT IT WAS CERTAIN STRUCTION FOR US TO DO SO; THAT I one did not wish to go into that tim and attack the enemy." Their position a very strong one, and they were certai in force at that time, TWICE AS LARGE OUR OWN FORCE, ALL OF GENERAL P TER'S CORPS." He also said, "that if had attacked them, I felt that it CERTAIN DESTRUCTION." "Afterward, dark, I was sent for by General Port and questioned very stringently with re ence to the enemy; and my remarks him were the same as I am now maki and as I made to General Morell." (1 189, 190.)

The force of the evidence of this l witness, the Judge-Advocate attempts avoid by asserting, that he was "large influenced in forming his opinion from t clouds of dust which (the Judge-Advoc says, not the witness) may have arisen much from the movement of ambulanc and wagons as from the march of troo The witness, in answer to this questi of the Judge-Advocate, "Did you ma your estimate of the amount of that for principally from the extent of the line indicated by the clouds of dust, or h you other means than that of judging said, "My estimate was made mostly fro the length of time, which they were comi down—there appeared to be artillery an infantry—and the time that we were a tacked, and also from what I had seen o the enemy's dust prior to going on th duty, and the length of their lines, as muc as I could see of it in our front."

There is no foundation, therefore, in fac for the criticism of the Judge-Advocat Of the intelligence, integrity, and patrio ism of this witness, the Judge-Advocat does not even insinuate a doubt. No does he question his military capacity He was a Captain in the regular army, an for his ability and gallantry was mad Colonel of his regiment. His gallantry wa greatly displayed in the then recent battl of Fredericksburgh, where he was severel wounded. The Court repaired to hi chamber, where he was confined, and there took his testimony. To discard the evi dence and opinions of this witness, and of Hyland and Stevenson, and to adopt the diculous opinion of Roberts—ridiculous, cause founded in ignorance, as he adtted, of the facts—is an insult to the derstanding.

It being then clear, that it would have en madness in Porter to have attacked e enemy, who were in his front, at sun- on the twenty-ninth, and equally clear, t to have done so would not have been stified by the 4.30 order, but, on the trary, would have been a violation of as it directed him to attack the "ene- 's flank, and if possible, his rear;" let see whether, when he received it, could have made such attacks. At t time there was, as proved by Marll, and the other witnesses referred to Porter's front, a force of the enemy ice as great as his own. To have ched their flank he must have marched front and to the entire distance of the emy's line. Their force consisted of intry, cavalry, and artillery. With this ce they could have assailed him in ery foot of his progress, and readily ve attained a position in his own rear, nich must have ended, in all human probility, in his annihilation, and if so, in e destruction or capture of Pope's army. t, in addition to this, the country over nich he would have had to pass was so oken and filled with ravines and timber, at it would have been impossible, in the rkness which then prevailed, to have oved his infantry in any thing like order, d utterly impossible to have moved his tillery. To have left the latter behind n would have subjected it to certain pture, and would have been a direct vilation of the order, as that directed him his march to "keep heavy reserves and e your batteries."

The Judge-Advocate says, "It may be mitted, and perhaps the testimony reires the admission to be made, that fallg upon the enemy on the afternoon of e twenty-ninth, (Porter,) would have enuntered both difficulty and danger," but lds the very original remark that "difflty and danger in time of war are daily d hourly in the category of the soldier's e. Their presence should be for him, t a discouragement, but an inspiration. o grapple with them should be his ambion; to overcome them, his glory." (P. 12.) Without meaning to call into doubt ie capacity of the Judge-Advocate to udge what would be a soldier's ambition or "glory" in such an exigency, it is certainly not discourteous to him, to say that such soldiers as Hyland, Marshall, Morell, and Porter, who saw the difficulty and danger, are judges more to be relied upon. In comparing in this particular the Judge-Advocate with Porter, no disparagement is intended of the former. When he shall have been in as many battles—shall have conducted himself with as much skill and valor—shall have won the same grateful applause—have received such signal manifestations of approval from the Government—have done so much to fill the whole measure of a soldier's ambition and glory, he will then, and not before, have a right to be heard with respect, as to what, in any particular instance, should be a soldier's ambition and glory. Let us, however, examine what was the extent of the "difficulty and danger" which the Judge-Advocate admits to have existed. In considering this question, the Judge-Advocate accepts the least and rejects the most satisfactory evidence. He relies on the opinions of Lieutenant-Colonel Smith and McDowell, formed in ignorance of the country to be passed over, or of the length of the march, and of the force of the enemy in Porter's front. That such opinions are entitled to no weight, must be obvious to every fair mind. In a court of justice, where the principles of evidence are apprehended and impartially applied, they would be promptly rejected, and the counsel who endeavored to maintain them lose reputation with the bench and bar. The reliable evidence is this:

1. General Reynolds.—He had passed over the country on the twenty-eighth with his command, and says, he found it "so broken, wooded, and obstructed that I had to turn into a road leading along the railroad from Gainesville to Manassas Junction, and finally marched on that road in one column, around to Bethlehem Church, toward the old battle-field of Bull Run, late in the evening." That the country between New-Market and Groveton was "very broken by ravines and wooded; I will state that I know that from having passed over it on horseback that night, from somewhere in the neighborhood of New-Market over to the Warrenton Pike, near Groveton." In his judgment, a command could not have passed over that country in force, with artillery, in proper order to face an enemy, if it had to "move in the immediate presence of an enemy."

On cross-examination by the Judge-Advocate, he was asked: "You say that a command with artillery, etc., could not have passed over the country between New-Market and Groveton, in the immediate presence of the enemy: was not the ground equally bad for the enemy as for General Porter? And if the enemy could take position there, why could not General Porter's troops have taken position against them?" And answered: "It was impossible to manœuvre troops over that country." They could take position there, of course, and they could be attacked in position by troops. But it would have been very difficult to have got artillery up through that broken country, and a very disadvantageous attack would have been made." He was afterward asked: "Did you or not pass over the country stretching from your left toward General Porter's position, on the twenty-ninth, while on the march from Gainesville toward Manassas Junction?" And answered: "Not with my command." "Did not the enemy, in attacking the left and rear of General Pope on Saturday, the thirtieth of August, pass with artillery and infantry much of the country that General Porter would have had to pass over on the twenty-ninth to attack the right of the Confederates?" He replied: "I think not; I think it had gotten in, as it were, between that broken country and our position on that day, occupying a ridge which crossed the turnpike there, and having the broken country behind him. Because I manœuvred the day before, the twenty-ninth, all over, up to that broken country, and got partially on that ridge with one brigade." The Court, evidently unwilling to abandon their desire to show that Porter could have made the attack, not satisfied with this answer, put to the witness this additional question: "Could so large a force as passed around your left on Saturday, have done so without passing over a long distance toward where General Porter was?" And received this answer: "He had the Warrenton Turnpike open for him, and by coming down that turnpike, he filed in off that turnpike, as I supposed, though at a different point, through this broken country. He had that advantage in coming down and occupying this ridg (Pp. 170–173.)

2. Morell.—This inquiry was made him: "Seeing your own position and t of General Porter's command, so far you knew it, at the period of the day question, between sundown and the g of the evening, and seeing all that knew and believed of the position of enemy at that time, please to state whet an attack by General Porter's comm upon the right flank and rear of the ene at that time was possible." And answer "The only attack we could have made that time would have been directly front. The firing of which I spoke far to the right, and at that time we co not have got there. The troops of enemy in front of us were under cover the woods. If we had moved forward would have gone over this open spa where our men would have been expo to the fire of the enemy, without any p sibility of effectively returning it."

"Such being the case as to a movem on your left to attack the enemy by fla ing him on his right, please to state whe er you could have passed through woods on your own right in any good or to attack the enemy in that directio "I doubt whether we could have got artillery through, even by daylight. might have passed through the wo with our infantry, but not in any fight order at all."

"Would it have been possible to ca your artillery through that wood night?" "No sir, I think not." (P. 14

The force of this testimony was not tempted to be weakened by the exami tion of either the Judge-Advocate or Court. The intelligence of the witn and his well-known high character, wo have rendered such an effort fruitless.

3. Marshall.—"Was it possible, (he asked,) without the greatest danger, General Porter to have made a movem to his right to attempt to reach and tack Jackson on his right?" "No it was impossible to have done so. In first place, it was impracticable to cr the country in that position during day. Again, we would have been obli to have whipped the very force in fr of us, large as it was, to have got the d it was very doubtful if we could have ne it."

He also said, that if Porter had "at- mpted the movement," the enemy would have attacked our flank." The dge-Advocate did not think it prudent examine the witness at all upon the int, but the Court were less cautious. ey asked whether, "from the position the forces, both those of the enemy d our own, would the march of General rter, to reach the right flank of Jack- n, have been direct or circuitous?" And re answered:

"It would have been circuitous, through broken country. If he had endeavored go the most direct route, it would have en through a broken country. But I not conceive that it was practicable for n to have gone that route. I think that order to have acted upon the enemy he uld have had to go back the same route took the next morning in retreating." Not practicable, (the Court further in- ired,) because of the character of the untry or the position of the enemy?" nd were answered:

"Because of the broken country; it is rocky, and then a part of it was very avily timbered, and it would have been practicable to have carried artillery rough there, besides being fired upon d met by the enemy in our front." p. 191–193.)

There was other testimony to the same ect, but it is unnecessary to give it in tail. It is submitted with perfect confi- nce that this evidence is conclusive to ow that the order of 4.30, which alone rms the subject of this specification, uld not have been, at the time it was re- ived, executed. In this opinion, all of orter's officers who were acquainted with e condition of things concurred. Under ese circumstances, if Porter had made e attempt to execute the order, and had en, as he certainly would have been ac- rding to this testimony, defeated with eat, if not total loss, he would have com- itted a most serious military offense, for hich he should have been, and no doubt uld have been, held responsible and se- rely punished. If that had occurred, o, judging from the treatment he has re- ived, no one can doubt that the failure Pope's campaign would have been attri- ted to such rash and unmilitary conduct.

How ridiculous it is to reject the evi- dence of the above-named officers; and how insulting to the intelligence of a reader, to ask him to put faith in the opinions, not statements of facts, of Smith and McDowell, given in admitted igno- rance of the facts which rendered a com- pliance with the order impracticable Smith's opinion is based, as he states, "on the fact that that portion of the country over which (as he understood it) the corps of (Porter) would have moved upon the enemy, "was sufficiently practi- cable to enable the enemy, as they did, to make a similar movement on our left on the next day." (P. 77.) The Italics are the Judge-Advocate's. Not only did he omit to imform the President, what in fairness he should have done, of the evi- dence here given, but to advise him that the fact on which Smith's opinion was formed, was not true. That Reynolds had proved that the enemy's movement on the thirtieth was not over the ground which Porter must have passed on the twenty- ninth to have attacked their right flank. And McDowell's opinion was based upon the same misapprehension, and only upon what (as he said) was his "knowledge of the country, derived principally from hav- ing gone over the railroad from Manassas to Gainesville in a car, or on a locomotive, which gave me but little idea of it, as I was engaged whilst going over with mat- ters which prevented my paying attention to the country." And upon several other facts, for the most part immaterial, and unknown to him except upon hearsay. (P. 93.) The Judge-Advocate seeks to aggravate Porter's supposed offense by stating with entire confidence, that if the order had been obeyed it "would have secured a triumph for our arms, and not only the overthrow of the rebel forces, but probably the destruction or capture of Jackson's army." He states that this would have been the result if a vigorous attack had been made by Porter "at any time between twelve o'clock, when the battle (between Pope and the enemy) began, and dark, when it closed." And for this he refers to the opinions of Pope, McDowell, Roberts, and Smith, "all of whom participated in the engagement, and were well qualified to judge." This confidence is somewhat amusing, when it is remembered that Pope and McDowell never achieved a victory, Roberts no one thought could ever achieve one, and Smith was a volunteer of but a few months' standing, and never before under fire.

But, waiving this, how totally immaterial are those opinions when the proof is clear to the dullest comprehension, that the attack directed by the order, when that was received, could not have been made, and when there was no prior order stated in this specification, or either of the other two under the first charge, directing an attack to be made at all.

First, Second, and Third Specification of the Second Charge.

These will be considered together. They are framed under the fifty-second Article of War, which embraces "misbehavior before the enemy." They charge Porter with such misbehavior on the twenty-ninth. It will be seen that this concedes that there was no order from Pope to make an attack on that day. This charge has been substantially anticipated. It has been proved conclusively, that no attack could have been made, except with the almost certain result of serious defeat, if not destruction. Either of which would have been fatal to Pope. Nor is the fact true upon which the Judge-Advocate relies, that during the time from twelve o'clock to sunset on that day, a severe battle was raging between the rest of Pope's command and the enemy, within the hearing of Porter. On the contrary, the officers, all of them who were with Porter, agreed in stating that the battle appeared to be mainly with artillery, and at some miles from his position. That Porter had no reason to believe, and did not believe that an attack by him was necessary for Pope's safety or success, appears by his order to Morell, brought out on the cross-examination of the Judge-Advocate, and received about sunset, or a little before sunset. (P. 150.) That order informed Morell, "the battle works well on our right, and the enemy are said to be retiring up the pike."

This reply has assumed dimensions greater than was anticipated. It was found unavoidable however, from the necessity of giving in detail many portions of the evidence. The object of the writer was to expose the injustice done Porter by the Judge-Advocate—to rescue him from the influence of the reputation of that office; and to demonstrate to t public the gross wrong done him by t Court, and unconsciously, as is thoug from misplaced confidence, by the Pre dent. In this he can not have failed. I thinks that in the public judgment, wh the case is fully understood, the finding the Court will be considered to be witho explanation, except upon the ground mental imbecility or blinding prejudi The first certainly did not exist. The l ter is believed to be established.

With a view to avoid this last concl sion, one which the Judge-Advocate s pears to have anticipated, he ventur (and in so doing, greatly compromises legal reputation) to say: "It is not believ that there remains upon the Record single ruling of the Court to which exce tion could be seriously taken." The rulings are on pages 17, 21, 24, 39, 41, 5 71, 96, 214, 221.

There were several others which Porte counsel considered erroneous, but omitt to except to them, in order to save tim and from their then having no hope, th any thing they could say, would chan the rulings. These involve two propo tions—first, whether it is competent for witness to state his opinion upon t meaning of orders written or verbal; a second, whether, when the prosecutio with a view to show the alleged crimin animus of Porter, had given in evide his telegrams and conduct, on the twent seventh, twenty-eighth, twenty-ninth, an thirtieth of August, it was not compete to Porter, in order to disprove such a mus, and to show his loyalty and his d termination to do his full duty before ge ting, and after coming under Pope's co mand, to offer in evidence his telegram and conduct on the twenty-fifth, twent sixth, thirty-first of August, and the firs second, and third of September telegram constituting a series, of which those offer by the prosecution, were a part.

I. Without stopping to inquire if a d cision on this head was correct, whic either admitted or rejected the evidenc all will agree, that to admit it in some i stances, and reject it in others, can not b be erroneous. And that is just what w done by the Court. When Porter aske the opinion of a witness, the question wa objected to and overruled. When th Judge-Advocate, or any member of th ourt, asked such a question, though obcted to by Porter, because the same ivilege was not allowed him, the obction was overruled, and the evidence ceived. The Record will show that this as uniformly the case. Its evident par-ality and palpable injustice render further marks unnecessary.

II. To exclude statements and conduct ade and occurring a day or two before id after the date of those relied upon to tablish Porter's criminal animus when fered to explain the latter, and to disprove ch animus, is an error so gross, that it amazing how the Court, though not wyers, could have fallen into it, and more nazing how the Judge-Advocate could nction it. The admissibility of the evi ence is proved, clearly, it is thought, in orter's protest, Appendix No. 1.

But notwithstanding the finding and ntence of the Court, and its approval, id the malignant and bitter assaults upon m, before and since, Porter will stand harmed through the potent power of uth and the public judgment. The latter er cheers the patriot, and sooner or later ustrates the aim of the demagogue, and lsies the arm of the traitor. In addi-on, too, to this support, he possesses in mself one even yet more potential. He self-sustained in the consciousness of in-ocence, and conviction of duty fully perrmed.

What shield against injustice is more in-lnerable? It abides with the injured at l times and everywhere; consoles him adversity—enhances his prosperity. It an adjunct to truth and justice, an anti-ote to falsehood and calumny, and in the id is certain to bring their authors before e public in full relief, to be the scorn or e jest of the honest.

The friends of Porter, therefore, need l no further concern for him. He and is accusers stand for judgment before a ist and enlightened tribunal, and what ir mind can doubt the issue?

But we must all feel deep solicitude for e country, now passing through a dread-il crisis. No people was ever subjected a more perilous one. But this solici-ude is not because we doubt the result, the Government is true to its own duty.
f it is, the danger will soon be over, and ho can doubt that it will be? If keeping single eye to the extinction of the rebellion in conducting the war, they discard mere party, cast off intrusive and ignorant politicians, observe in the loyal States, where the ordinary course of justice is unobstructed, all the constitutional guarantees of personal liberty, recognize every individual right, regard freedom of speech and of the press, (a freedom which the people will never suffer to be impaired,) restrain the excessive enthusiasm or madness of misjudging officers, instruct them that it is their duty to war with the rebel enemy alone, and to observe in so doing all the humane rules of the modern laws of war, suffering no harm to be done to private property, nor the appropriation of it for other than military purposes, cease to foster the incompetent, and in an enlarged and enlightened statemanship, sword in one hand and the olive-branch of forgiveness, conciliation, and compromise in the other, (the enemies are our brothers, and we but seek to bring them back to the common household,) all will ere long be well again. The rebellion now so shaking the land, like as

> "Ocean's mighty swing,
> When heaving on tempest's wing,
> It breaks upon the shore," will have subsided, and before the historian shall have written its history, even its vast wrecks of material wealth, and its vaster and more distressing wrecks of former harmony and affection, will have been forgotten in the magnitude and universality of the blessings in which the whole land will then be rejoicing.

Nor portentous of destruction as is the black cloud that lowers over us is there serious ground for despondency, much less despair. A beneficent Providence can not design so to affect us, and, through us, the world. Great as our national sins may have been, and deserving of punishment, as they no doubt are,
it can not be that such a Being will strike a nation like ours out of existence. Protected and regulated freedom is so important to human happiness, that, if we may, with reverence, speculate on such a subject, it must be within the scope of Heaven's design to secure it to all. And in the past what has contributed more to that result than our example? With institutions resting as their sole foundation on individual liberty, we have by its inherent and almost magic power prospered

as never people prospered before; so unexampled and striking has this been, that all nations looked at us with wonder—the rulers of some with envy—the oppressed, everywhere, with hope and gratitude. Is such an example to end forever? Believe it not. If, however, in the inscrutable dispositions of Heaven, it is so to be, and we are hereafter to live but in memory, of one thing we may rest assured, that that dire calamity will not be caused by the fulfillment of the object of this rebellion. That object, even ostentatiously and shamelessly avowed, is not to vindicate and maintain freedom, nor even to rescue human slavery as it at present exists, in some of the States, from the hazard of a possible early overthrow, but to extend and perpetuate it through all time. In the very City and State of their nativity, and which for so many years were guided, benefited, and honored by the wisdom and presence of Mason, Jefferson, Madison, Marshall, and Washington, in defiance of all the doctrines which they inculcated, and shocking the world by their astounding and iniquitous degeneracy, it is proclaimed, without rebuke, and no doubt by the authority of him who sacrilegiously holds out Washington as his model, that the main object of the rebellion is to establish a Confederacy which will be "A DISTINCT REACTION AGAINST THE WHOLE COURSE OF THE MISTAKEN CIVILIZATION OF THE AGE." "THAT FOR LIBERTY, EQUALITY, AND FRATERNITY THEY HAVE DELIBERATELY SUBSTITUTED SLAVERY, SUBORDINATION, AND GOVERNMENT. THAT HOWEVER AMONG EQUALS EQUALITY IS RIGHT, AMONG THOSE WHO NATURALLY ARE UNEQUAL EQUALITY IS CHAOS." "THAT THERE ARE SLAVE RACES BORN TO SERVE, MASTER RACES BORN TO GOVERN." Such are the fundamental principles (what a profanation of the term!) which, addressing themselves to the universe of man, they say: "We inherit from the ancient world, which we lifted up in the face of a perverse generation, that has forgotten the wisdom of its fathers." (Spirits of the great departed, let us hope that you do not hear the vile calumny!) "By these principles we live, and by their defense we have shown ourselves ready to die; reverently we feel that our Confederacy is a God-sent missionary to the nations with great truths to preach." "A who hath ears to hear let him hear."*

No, no. Through such an instrume tality God will never work our destructic He libels Deity who for a moment cred it. An honest man might as soon be su pected of effecting an end by fraud, p jury, or murder.

There is then no reason for despa The rebellion will not triumph. Its fa is already sealed. The lamentations ov its anticipated early death are heard in t wailings of the conspirators. The muc boasted army of Lee has been arrested its recent invasion of Maryland and Pen sylvania by the unsurpassed bravery the Army of the Potomac, handled wi consummate skill by Meade, the gentl man and soldier, and driven back, wi terrific slaughter, to its own impoverishe and desolated Virginia, stealing away night, under the cover of darkness an storm, in the demoralizing fear that th arm of the Union was approaching utter to crush them. Vicksburgh and Po Hudson have fallen, and the States Louisiana, Tennessee, Kentucky, Weste Virginia, Maryland, and Mississippi, a ours, and the Father of Waters knows n standard but the Stars and Stripes. Th very leader of the conspiring band, f years the plotters of the treason, is losin heart. In the beginning of his wicke career, he ridiculed the power of the loy States, and vauntingly threatened the with the feeling of "Southern steel" an "the smell of Southern powder." Now he stands conscience-stricken and appalle He sees, and well he may, the finger God in their dreadful reverses, and call upon his deluded and ruined followers "t unite in prayer and humble submissio under God's chastening hand." He tell them that they are to attribute their trial and afflictions to their forgetfulness o Him, and to their "love of lucre," (wha an admission for proud chivalry!) whic had "eaten like a gangrene into the very heart of the land, converting too many o them into worshipers of gain, and render ing them UNMINDFUL OF THEIR DUTY TO THEIR COUNTRY, TO THEIR FELLOW-MEN, AND TO THEIR GOD." †

To their country! How could he have er even dreamed that forgetfulness of ity to country, to fellow-man, and God ould not meet with the chastening hand heaven? Davis, the educated and often nored child of the Union, over and over ain pledged by solemn oath to support , is at last aroused to a sense of the guilt oaths violated and duty to country for-tten, and on his knees implores the forveness of Omnipotence. What stronger idence could there be that despair of ecess of his criminal career now fills his ry soul?

It has, too, in its very form of govern-ent, the seed of its own certain dissolution
-secession is made the vital principle of s organism. No government is certain living a day, but, on the contrary, is rtain of a speedy death under such ronic and ever active disease. Whilst defies cure, it is certain, sooner or later, produce death. And before a single tion has recognized its legitimate ex-tence, the disease has manifested its fatal nature. GEORGIA and NORTH-CAROLINA have already disputed the Confederate authority, and threatened withdrawal under the acknowledged theory of secession. So alarming has the threat become, and so obviously fatal to the Confederacy, that notwithstanding its constitutional recognition of the right, it has been denied in serious debate in their Congress, and the insubordinate members menaced with the exertion of the central military power. Our own downfall then, if ever, is not to be now. The rebellion will be put down. If not by force, as it may be, if our rulers are equal to the emergency, and as it is believed it will be, it will fall through the very feebleness of its form of government. Fall it will. Fall it must, and the United States be restored to the condition in which our fathers left it. A nation of which its citizens can speak with an honest pride as being destined to make "the world its debtor by its discoveries of truth and example of virtuous freedom."

APPENDIX.

I.

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 26, 1862.

WITH all proper respect for the ruling of the ourt on Wednesday, refusing the accused the ght to give in evidence the telegrams and mesges he then offered, dated before and after e twenty-ninth of August, (that is to say, om August twenty-second to September first, 862,) he begs leave to enter on its proceedings is protest.

The accused is charged, among other things, ith having disobeyed the several orders stated the specifications of the twenty-seventh Au-ust, 1862, twenty-ninth August, 1862, (4.30
M.,) and twenty-ninth August, 1862, (8.50
M.,) and the prosecution has endeavored to rove that such disobedience was by design, ecause of a fixed purpose on the part of the ccused not only to coöperate with the General command in the existing campaign, but to il in his duty in that regard.

With this view, certain papers, being a part f the same series of telegrams with those re-ected, were offered by the Judge-Advocate, ot objected to by the accused, when the pur-ose for which they were offered was stated, nd received by the Court.

And with the same object the opinions of the witnesses, Roberts and Smith, founded, as they said, on what they represent to be the manner and conversation of the accused, and also on what the first said he heard from another that the accused would fail the Commander-in-Chief.

In the words of the Judge-Advocate, this evidence was produced to show the animus of the accused toward his chief, and in that aspect was admitted by the Court. The accused respectfully maintains, that if evidence of that description, for such a purpose, be admissible, (as he concedes it is,) it is equally admissible, and is his right, to show by his conduct just before, at, and after he came under the command of General Pope, by what he did and by what he said, orally or in writing, that the asserted purpose—the alleged ANIMUS—is wholly untrue but that, on the contrary, his real purpose—his real animus—from the first to the last, was to do his whole duty to the utmost of his ability, and render his General and his country all the aid in his power.

If the prosecution had contented itself with exhibiting the orders in the specifications which he is said to have disobeyed, and given evidence of the fact of disobedience, the accused is advised that, even then, the proof which the Court has ruled out should have been received. But when, not content with that course, it has attempted to prove his mental purpose—to fathom his mind—to show that from personal grudge to his General, or other cause, he designedly disobeyed such orders, he is advised that the evidence rejected is clearly admissible.

The general rules of evidence are the same in Courts-Martial as in other Courts. They are based on principles of universal application, and which, as experience has demonstrated, are best calculated to ascertain the truth. One of these, as well settled as any known to the law, is, that where a mental intent with which an act is done is in issue, the acts and declarations of the party a few days before, at, or a few days after the time when the intent is charged to have existed, bearing on such intent, may be given in evidence by either party. This is a familiar rule in cases, among others, of acts of alleged bankruptcy or insolvency, change of residence, and of many acts of alleged fraud. In the first, whether the act charged as an act of bankruptcy is one or not, often depends on the intent with which it is done; and what the party did before or after is constantly admitted as legitimately illustrating the actual intent.

In the second, Whether a man has changed his residence often, also depends on intent. He may have removed, to remain permanently or temporarily; and what he has done or said before and after removing is allowed to prove or disprove intent.

In the third, Whether the imputed fraud was perpetrated or not, often depends on intent unexplained. The mere act itself may appear criminal or innocent. It is the purpose which gives it its actual character, and this purpose may be shown by either party, by acts and declarations of the person charged before and after the period of the impeached act. This principle, I am advised, is fully settled, not only in all the elementary writers on evidence, but by the Supreme Court of the United States in, among other cases, that of Wood vs. United States. (16 Peters, 362.)

And it is respectfully hoped that the Court will, on further consideration, see the justice of the rule. Its justice is strikingly illustrated in this instance: the accused is charged with the dishonorable, traitorous purpose of having isregarded the orders of his Chief, to gratify me supposed personal dissatisfaction with m, wholly reckless of its consequences to his untry. He is charged with having caused e defeat of our arms, and hazarded the safety of the Capitol, under the same degrading impulse. One of the witnesses has sworn, without objection from the Judge-Advocate or the Court, that a deceased officer of chivalrous character and spotless patriotism had declared to him, before the date of either of the orders, that the accused would fail his Chief. Another has stated, also without objection, that his conduct and manner in his presence were such that he was satisfied that he was a traitor, and that nothing but the fear of human laws prevented his killing the accused on the spot. This evidence was offered and received to show his animus—his intent. Proudly conscious of his innocence, and knowing the baseness of the calumny, he did not object to its introduction, being perfectly willing to let it all go for what it is worth. But to deny him the right, after it is received by the Court, to meet it by proving what is wholly inconsistent with it—acts of duty about the same period, orders, and messages, having no possible purpose but a faithful discharge of duty to his Chief and his country—it is submitted is a violation of the rule of evidence, and is to deprive him of the very best and most persuasive proof that the nature of the accusation admits of.

To show that he was not a traitor, he desired to establish constant acts of duty immediately preceding and succeeding the acts which he is charged to have done traitorously. To show faithfulness to duty to his Chief, he desires to prove, as the rejected evidence does, that to get to his command, and after he reached it, he did every thing that diligence, zeal, ardor, and all the skill and ability which he possessed enabled him to do to assist his Chief in every possible way, and at every possible hazard, so as to render his campaign a successful one.

Your ruling puts this out of his power, and, respectfully protesting against it, he can do nothing further than to submit it to your more mature consideration. (P. 253, 254.)

F. J. Porter, Major-General.

II.

In addition to the propositions embraced as mentioned in the text, other gross errors characterized the rulings of the Court. 1. As will be seen, (p. 21,) this question was propounded to Pope.

"If, as you have stated, you were of the opinion that the army under your command had been defeated, and in danger of still greater defeat, and the Capitol of the country in danger of capture by the enemy, and you thought that these calamities would have been obviated if General Porter had obeyed your orders, why was it that you doubted on the second of September whether you would or would not take any action against him?"

The witness declined to answer it, "as not being relevant to this investigation." The Court was thereupon cleared, and when opened, the Judge-Advocate stated its decision was, "that the question was irrelevant!" Porter submitted a protest in writing. The Court was again cleared, and after some time was opened, and Porter told that his protest would be held "under advisement until" the next day. On the next day, the protest was read by the Judge-Advocate, and is as follows:

"The witness having, in his examination in hief, attributed the disasters of the army under his command in Virginia, in August last, to the ailure of the accused to obey all or some of his rders, and having stated that he was of the pinion that such orders might have been beyed; and it being so far as the prosecution as gone, upon his evidence that such disobe- ience occurred that the prosecution has endeav- red to be maintained; the accused is advised y his counsel that the question just ruled out y the Court is not only relevant and legal, but ost material in order to show that the recollec- on of the witness in such his examination in hief is not to be relied upon; and that he for he first time afterward charged the alleged dis- bedience upon the accused; because it was the uty of the witness, not only to doubt whether e would take any action in relation to the mat- r, but to report the same as a grave offense on he part of the accused; and his determination r doubt whether he would take such action, or ake such report, are facts not only admissible nt material evidence, that at the time to which he question relates he did not believe there had een any such disobedience on the part of the ccused, and thereupon respectfully requests to ave this protest entered on the proceedings of he Court against the exclusion of the question eferred to.

"F. J. Porter, Major General."

The Judge-Advocate said: "The witness re- uests the permission of the Court to answer he question referred to in the protest just read."

The accused made no objection.

The Court was cleared and after some time pened, and the Judge-Advocate announced the ecision to be that the witness have permis- ion to answer the question. When the witness bjected to the question for irrelevancy, his ob- ection is sustained. After the protest is heard y him and the Court, and he requested to be ermitted to answer the question, it was decided, lthough still as far as is known in the opinion f the Court, irrelevant to allow him the per- ission. As the Court had no authority to re- eive any but relevant testimony, the result of is ruling was to leave the relevancy or irrele- ancy of the question to the decision of the wit- ess.

III.

The same course was adopted by the Court n regard to another question put by Porter to he same witness. (P. 24.)

IV.

General McClellan, whose evidence was trongly in favor of Porter, was asked by one of he Court, and evidently with a view to impair s effect, whether his feelings toward General Pope were not unfriendly. The gross indelica- y of the inquiry, caused another member of the ourt to object to it, and it was then withdrawn. Porter by his counsel protested against its with- drawal, because as it was apparent that the member of the Court propounding it was under the impression that such feelings existed, it was Porter's right to have the truth of the imputa- tion tested, and the right of the witness to be permitted to exonerate himself from it. But the Court decided that it should not be answer- ed, and neither the question, nor what occurred in relation to it, were permitted to appear in the Record.

V.

In the Reply, (p. 11,) it is said that th writer did not know what, if any thing had been done, for Lieut.-Colonel Thomas C. H. Smith. He has since ascertained that he was appointed a Brigadier-General, to date from the twenty- ninth of November, 1862. The Court was open- ed on the twenty-fifth of that month. On what day the appointment was made he is not inform- ed, but it must have been after he gave this tes- timony against Porter, on the eleventh of De cember, in the same year, as at that time he stated himself to be a Lieutenant-Colonel, under a commission dated the twenty-fourth of Au gust, 1861. As he admitted upon his examin ation that he had never been in any army before that date, and never received a military educa- tion, and never was in a battle prior to Pope's Virginia campaign, and there being nothing to show that he displayed there either scientific knowledge or conspicuous valor, it must be true that his promotion to the high rank of General was not a reward for gallant service in the field or distinguished military ability. But looking to the time when he gave his evidence in Por- ter's case, and the character of that evidence, and his conduct in publishing and circulating his testimony and Pope's, and Roberts's only, without any other part of the proof, it is left to the reader to decide for himself to what cause it is to be referred.

VI.

The Judge-Advocate considers as immaterial the testimony of Porter's "former services and character for faithfulness and efficiency as an officer," although he admits it to be "full and earnest," because such evidence, he says, "is held to be entitled to but little weight except in doubtful cases," and to no weight when "it comes into conflict with evidence that is bot positive and reliable."

That no such evidence as the latter was given against Porter the reader has seen in The Reply. He will also have seen that the case made against him by the Government, in view of an impartial and fair mind, was not even a doubtful one. It is due, however, to Porter, that it should be known how strong were the testimo- nials to his former "faithfulness and efficiency" by those who had known him longest and best.

1. Major-General Burnside.—"I have never seen any thing to lead me to think that he was any thing but a ZEALOUS, FAITHFUL, AND LOYAL OFFICER." (P. 181.)

2. General Reynolds.—"I have had opportunities to judge of General Porter's conduct, and I have always considered him AN ENERGETIC, FAITHFUL, AND DEVOTED OFFICER." (P. 170.)

3. General Morell.—"I do not think that ever failed to do his duty." (P. 149.)

4. General Sykes.—He was asked, did you ver see in Porter "any slackness to do his duty, any evidence of a disposition to fail his commanding officer or his country," and answered:

No; I never have. General Porter is an officer whose zeal is so well established, that I hardly see the necessity of that question. I would like to add that General Porter's foresight, his providence for the wants of his command, and his attention to all the minutiæ of his command, are such and so great that I have often thought that he relied or trusted too little to the capacity of his division commanders. He seemed to do every thing himself. (P. 177.)

5. General Butterfield.—(Roberts had said that Major-General Kearny had told him that Porter "would fail General Pope.") Butterfield was asked whether he had had conversations with Kearny in relation to Porter, and said, "frequently," and "that he always spoke in the HIGHEST TERMS of General Porter, both as a BRAVE OFFICER AND A GENTLEMAN, AND AS A HARD WORKER." And Butterfield also stated for himself that he never saw in any thing that he did or said before, or when it was understood that he was to come under Pope's command, any evidence of an indisposition to be faithful to General Pope and to his country.

6. Major-General McClellan, under whose immediate eye Porter was during his command of the Army of the Potomac, said, that from what he saw of his conduct, or from what he heard him say, after he knew that he was to go to the assistance of Pope, he did, in his opinion, "ALL THAT AN ENERGETIC AND ZEALOUS AND PATRIOTIC OFFICER COULD HAVE DONE," and that he never had any reason whatever, at any time after he received notice that he was to go to Pope's aid, "TO BELIEVE THAT HE WOULD FAIL GENERAL POPE OR THE COUNTRY IN THE DISCHARGE OF HIS DUTY." (P. 196.)

The very material evidence on one point, of Colonel George D. Ruggles, was omitted in the Reply. It is here given.

He says that he was in a room of the headquarters of General Pope, at Fairfax Court House, on the morning of the second of September, 1862, that Porter and General Pope were in the room, and that "I was engaged at the time, (he was Pope's Assistant Adjutant-General, and chief of staff,) writing orders for the position of troops." "While I was writing these orders, General Porter and General Pope had a conversation lasting about twenty minutes."

"Whilst this time, studiously avoiding overhearing their conversation, I heard scraps enough of it to know they were talking about the incidents of a few days previous. At the conclusion of the interview, General Pope and Porter got up, and I heard General Pope say to General Porter, that his explanations were satisfactory, with the exception of the matter of the one brigade. I think he said, 'ENTIRELY SATISFACTORY,'" "though as to the word entirely, I can not swear positively." I think General Porter replied, "that (the brigade) can be easily explained," though I am not positive about his answer. He also stated that his recollection was, that he reminded Pope of this "conversation on the fifth or sixth of September, 1862." The Judge Advocate, in order to destroy the force of this evidence, succeeded only in getting the witness to repeat what he had said before, that he was not positive in his recollection of the latter fact stated by him, but that with regard to the other, Pope's telling Porter that he was satisfied, he was positive and certain. (Pp. 155, 156.) Nor did Pope, who was examined before in regard to it, deny it; on the contrary, he virtually admitted it. He said that he remembered that upon the occasion referred to, "I told General Porter that I had not reported him to the Department in Washington, and as matters stood, I thought I should not take any action in reference to his case, though I felt bound to do so in the case of Griffin." And when asked upon cross-examination whether he remembered the conversation between himself and Ruggles, testified to by the latter, he only said he had "no remembrance of it," but was "not certain that he had not," but was "very certain that Colonel Ruggles never stated a thing of that kind to him," although he was "not prepared to swear that he did not." The bearing of Ruggles's evidence upon the accuracy, if nothing else, of General Pope's testimony and its conclusiveness of the fact, that Pope when he was made acquainted by Porter with all the circumstances connected with his conduct under Pope's several orders, expressed himself satisfied, can not fail to be apparent to the reader, and fatal, in any fair judgment, to the finding of the Court.

FOR THE

Diffusion of Political Knowledge.

Prof. S. F. B. MORSE, President. C. MASON, Cor. Sec'y, 13 Park Row, New-York.

SPEECH OF EX-GOV. HUNT,

AT LOCKPORT.

He commenced by reminding the meeting that they had assembled to deliberate on subjects of transcendent importance to the American people, not only of the present time, but to the long line of coming generations. The fate of our country and its nationality, our Union and Constitution, was trembling in the balance, and the issue must depend upon the people themselves. He came before them once more to plead for the supremacy of the Constitution. Let us maintain and defend it from armed enemies, from the encroachments of official usurpation. If we preserve it in its true spirit and integrity, the country will be saved and free government rescued from destruction. On the other hand, if people are indifferent to the sense of duty and danger, and recreant to their sacred trust as freemen, their rights and liberties are lost and nothing will remain but for history to add another to the long list of republics which have flourished for a season and disappeared forever.

Before proceeding to express his views on the national crisis, he said he felt constrained to pause and dwell for a moment on the right of discussion. Do we still possess freedom of speech and the right to canvas the measures of government and the conduct of our public agents? It has been assumed that this inestimable prerogative of freedom is suspended during the war; and attempts have been made to suppress its exercise by arbitrary and summary proceedings. He utterly repelled this doctrine. It annihilates one of the most sacred of our constitutional guarantees. He was aware that the pretensions of power in this matter find many apologists even among those who in better days claimed to represent the great principle of free speech. Their theory is, that in seasons of repose, when there is nothing but subordinate administrative questions to be discussed, the people may speak freely; but that in times of peril, when the safety of the nation is at stake, we must either approve or stand mute, and no matter what may be done or attempted by our official agents, true loyalty requires passive obedience and the abject silence of those oriental nations, whose language has no word expressive of political liberty.

But he contended that the Constitution was made for all times and seasons, and especially for war-time. It contains ample provisions for the prosecution of war, the suppression of rebellion, and the punishment of treason. It is in times of war and commotion, when executive power is vastly augmented, that the safeguards intended for the protection of the citizen are specially needed, for then our only security from arbitrary caprice must be found behind the barriers of constitutional law. By the theory of our government, the political power resides in the people. All authority emanates from them, and under the Constitution is to be exercised for their good and according to their will. It is their sovereign prerogative, not merely to elect the public agents and representatives, but to hold them to a just responsibility. More than this, all measures of policy, whether in peace or war, must be ultimately determined by the people themselves. It is for them to decide when and for what objects wars shall be prosecuted. For they alone furnish the victims and bear the burdens of the conflict. No higher or more sacred responsibility can devolve upon a free people than to determine upon the occasions of war, the purposes for which it shall be pursued, the conditions upon which it shall be concluded. For the intelligent and wise discharge of this duty, it is indispensable that the citizens should enjoy, in its most perfect sense, the right of free public discussion and deliberation.

A just cause has nothing to fear from investigation and an honest interchange and expression of opinion.

Governed by these principles of duty, he claimed and intended to exercise the constitutional right to discuss all public questions freely, including the conduct of the government in the management of the war, the objects for which it was commenced, and the purposes which are now avowed in many quarters as the chief end and inducement for its prosecution. It would be his aim to express his opinions in a calm, loyal, patriotic spirit, which occasions of public peril and anxiety ought always to inspire. He had no factious feelings to indulge. On the contrary, the only aspiration of his heart was for the welfare and safety of our country and the preservation of its free institutions. Far from wishing to embarrass the government, he desired, above all things, to strengthen and uphold it, and insure its perpetuity as a free constitutional government, to protect the people in the enjoyment of their rights and liberties during all coming time.

Before proceeding to examine the present posture of affairs, Governor Hunt observed that he deemed it but just and proper to say a few words in regard to the position of the Conservative Union men of the North at the commencement of the war. For several years an angry political conflict had raged between the sections. Party organizations were formed on a sectional antagonism resulting from the different systems of society and industry, North and South, and all the national interests in common between them which the Union was formed to protect, were sedulously banished from popular discussion. Instead of common interests and a common destiny—instead of cherishing a kindly memory of joint efforts and trials and glories in the past, nothing was heard but words of insult, reproach, and defiance. Many of us were profoundly apprehensive of the consequences of this system of organized strife, by which vast and distant communities of men, few of whom, though related by federal compact, had personally seen or understood each other, were inflamed to madness and mutually taught to entertain sentiments of animosity and contempt.

We deemed this warfare wholly inconsistent with the spirit of the federal compact, subversive of the great ends for which the Union was established, and dangerous to its harmony and stability. Under these convictions, we endeavored to allay feelings of sectional irritation, and preserve sentiments of fraternity and peace. Acting in conjunction with a large and patriotic body of true Union men in the South, we labored earnestly for years to keep the spirit of sectional hostility within bounds, pleading for moderation and justice, and exposing the abyss into which the country was madly rushing forward. But appeals and warnings and entreaties were unavailing. Popular passions had been aroused and swept onward in their course. All ideas of danger were treated with levity, and too many were persuaded that the contest was a mere political tournament for the prizes of power. The strongest section made the President, the weaker refused to submit. Even then noble and heroic efforts were made to avert the impending collision by a just and honorable compromise. But all was in vain. The extremists and agitators on both sides disdained compromise, and preferred to defy consequences.

When the struggle came and the attempt was made to break up the Union by force of arms, what was the conduct of the national union men of the North who had so firmly resisted the whole system of agitation and strife, the prolific source of so many calamities? Did we falter in our loyalty or swerve from the discharge of our duty to the Government? No, no. We were still as now and ever, faithful to the Union and Constitution. We promptly rushed to the support of the Executive in his efforts to subdue rebellion and maintain the federal authority. We had always regarded the Constitution as a sacred covenant, binding upon the people and the States under all circumstances; it was enough for us that it was assailed and in peril. We had no sympathies with secession. We felt that no temporary excess or perversion of popular passions was sufficient to justify resistance to government, or to absolve any portion of our countrymen from their allegiance.

Those who felt aggrieved were bound to adopt constitutional remedies, and await the return of sober judgment and reflection among the people. Therefore we hesitated not to rally to the support of the Government in a spirit of disinterested patriotism. For the time being we put all former dissensions far from us, drawing the vail of oblivion over the past, anxious only to discharge our duty and aid in the deliverance of our country. We indulged in no reproaches toward the men whom so many honestly deemed the responsible authors of the national misfortunes. We rendered prompt and efficient support to an administration from which we neither desired nor expected any favor, but that it would be faithful to the Constitution. We readily, and, as time has shown, too confidingly, accepted the assurance of the Administration that the war should be conducted solely for the defense of the Constitution, according to its clear and well-defined provisions. This assurance was subsequently confirmed by the resolution of Congress adopted by a vote almost unanimous. Such was the language of nearly the entire press in the interest of the Administration. It would have been most fortunate for the country if this pledge had been faithfully observed. So long as the war was prosecuted for the preservation of the Constitution in its integrity, and until other objects were avowed, the President had the united support of the Northern people. No conscription was necessary.

Men of all parties rushed to the field as volunteers. An army was rapidly formed far more numerous than the world had ever seen in the annals of civil war. They went forth in a loyal spirit to put down rebellion and uphold the Constitution. A majority of the people in the border States, where public sentiment was divided, decided to adhere to the old Union and give an active support to the Government. Besides the declaration of Congress, they were distinctly assured by the Executive, that a Conservative policy should be pursued, and that the war should not be perverted into a crusade upon the rights and institutions of the States. Never was a more sacred pledge given to any people; never in the history of the world was a pledge more wantonly violated. Unfortunately for the Government and country, the President was surrounded by a class of political visionaries and ideologists maddened by the fell spirit of abolition fanaticism.

It is evident that they had resolved to seize upon the war to carry their utopian theories into execution. They insisted on making it a war for emancipation. The President was plied by argument, persuasion, and menace. For long he repulsed these architects of ruin, and manifested respect for his plighted faith, and his oath to support the Constitution. He contended that a decree of emancipation would be unauthorized and inoperative, and likened it to "the Pope's bull against the comet." His Secretary of State repelled the proposition, and demonstrated that it was monstrous and impossible. But the radicals were not to be foiled. They prolonged the struggle. They are men of indomitable energy of will, and had fully determined to secure control of the Executive power of the Government. At length they succeeded in obtaining a mastery over the President. He was made to believe that the Northern people required the war to be prosecuted for the abolition of slavery throughout the Southern States, and that nothing was needed but an avowal of this purpose to secure a fresh outburst of popular enthusiasm in support of the Administration, and in an evil hour he yielded to the delusion. From that moment he seems to have been in custodiam, with every avenue of approach vigilantly guarded. The White House is said to be beleaguered by radical Senators, Governors, and missionaries, during the recess of Congress, forming a self-constituted committee of permanence to manipulate the Executive, apparently superseding the responsible Cabinet, and wielding "a power behind the throne greater than the throne itself."

Governor Hunt then proceeded to discuss the practical operation and effect of the President's abolition Proclamation. He contended that in a legal sense it was altogether null and void. It was an attempt by one department of the Federal Government to usurp a power that belongs exclusively to the States. It assumes to repeal the fundamental laws of more than one third of the States in regard to a question of races purely internal and domestic. To contend that a measure so sweeping comes within the military power of the Commander-in-Chief was too absurd to admit of serious argument. The war power in this respect is limited to orders and regulations necessary to facilitate and strengthen the army in the field, and must be confined to the theatre of military operations. Where the commanders of the army have emancipated or appropriated slaves for the actual service of the army he deemed it legitimate, and all slaves who have become free by virtue of military law and usage are to be protected in their freedom at the close of the war. But the attempt to go beyond this limit is a naked usurpation of power. He had seen some efforts to justify it as a confiscation of rebel property; and yet those who use this argument commonly deny that negroes are or can be property. The power of confiscation and forfeiture is defined by the Constitution, and must be exercised according to law. It operates only upon the guilty, after due conviction. But this Proclamation confiscates the property of entire communities, confounding the innocent with the guilty, and making no distinction between the friends and enemies of the Union. The President, in a recent letter holds the following language:

"But the Proclamation is law and valid, or is not valid. If it is not valid, it needs no retraction. If it is valid, it can not be retracted any more than the dead can be brought to life."

It is only in governments purely despotic that valid law can be ordained by executive edict, and even there decrees are modified or retracted, according to the changing will and caprice of the monarch. This mode of government is peculiarly Asiatic and oriental. It has been extended over some portions of Europe after violent struggles. In England the attempt to make law by proclamation cost Charles the First his head, and James the Second his throne. But here in republican America, where the powers of domestic legislation remain in the States, and the limited legislative power of the Federal Government is vested in Congress by a written Constitution, it is gravely assumed that the President's Proclamation, like the laws of the Medes and Persians, is unchangeable and superior to all other laws, and even to the Constitution itself! Such a pretension will not be recognized by the people of this country until they are prepared to renounce self-government and demolish the fabric of constitutional liberty.

He contended that the Constitution is still the supreme law in all the States, that acts of secession by any of them are legally void, and whenever the rebellion is suppressed, the Southern States will return with their constitutional rights unimpaired, and the Federal Government will have acquired no powers not conferred by the original compact. It becomes important to consider the practical effect of the Proclamation in its bearing upon the war and the rebellion. He regarded it as the great stumbling block in the way of a restoration of the Union. We have abundant evidence that it has paralyzed Union men in the South and, strengthened the spirit of resistance. Until it is abandoned, he firmly believed that any approach to a genuine and lasting peace will be found impossible. We see many indications that large numbers of people in the South desire to return to the Union. But they naturally inquire upon what terms and conditions they are to be received? To what are they expected to submit? Are the States to remain States with their ancient rights under the old Constitution, or must they come mutilated, dwarfed, and divested of their essential attributes and powers? Are they to regulate the relations between the black and white population within their limits, or is this important function to be usurped by the Federal Government? Are the white men of the South to exercise again the rights of self-government, or shall they be ruled as a subjugated people and compelled to forced equality with the negro? These are questions which must be met and answered by both government and people, sooner or later. They are points upon which grave anxiety must naturally arise in the minds of the more considerate and reflecting men in the South who have become weary of this unnatural strife, and who would make a stand in favor of peace upon receiving an assurance of constitutional protection.

Now how stands the matter? What is the position of the Administration on this vital question?

According to the best light before us, its purpose is to continue the war until slavery is abolished, even though the Southern States and people should consent to lay down their arms and return to their constitutional allegiance. In the first place, this policy is announced by many leading Senators and Representatives in the confidence of the Administration. It is distinctly proclaimed by the Solicitor of the War Department, who declares that the Southern States are not to be received into the Union on the constitutional basis, but are to be held in subjection by military force as conquered territories, and large portions of the country distributed among the emancipated slaves.

In harmony with the same design, the Adjutant-General of the United States informs us (to his eternal infamy be it spoken) that he arrested and imprisoned in the guard-house a considerable body of American soldiers, because they refused to respond in cheers for the "negro policy" of the Government. And these were soldiers who had bravely fought under the glorious flag of the Union, in defense of the Constitution. And what is the intention of the President himself? He was recently visited by a delegation from Louisiana, representing a respectable portion of the people of that State, proposing to return to the Union, and offering to hold a constitutional election of representatives. Did he welcome them back and hail with joy this evidence of returning patriotism and reason among a misguided people?

Far from it. His responses were ambiguous. He answered "with buts and ifs and ands"—but finally refused to consent to an election under the old Constitution of Louisiana. And in his letter, already referred to, he assumes that his proclamation is an unchangeable law, which, being interpreted, means that the war must go on until slavery in all the States of the South shall be abolished.

It remains for the American people to consider and determine whether the war shall be waged and prolonged for this purpose, or prosecuted only for the preservation of the Constitution and the restoration of the Union as originally founded. For himself, he contended that whenever the Union is restored, it must be upon the basis of the Constitution. Any other conclusion involves a complete revolution in the frame and spirit of our Government. Instead of a federation of United States, possessing equal powers in their respective spheres, and bearing the same relations to each other and to the Federal power, who would wish to see one large class of States annihilated, their people outlawed, and their territory held by the strong arm of military power? It concerns the Northern people to avert any such catastrophe. Any government which is enabled permanently to hold a large portion of its territory and people in subjection by mere military strength, must become too strong for constitutional checks and restrictions, and in the sequel will exercise arbitrary power over the whole country. The examples of history are numerous and nearly uniform in support of the truth of this proposition. If we would remain free ourselves, we must not hold neighboring States in a condition of political servitude.

Of late it has been rather fashionable to assume that there are no Union men in the seceded States whose feelings or opinions are entitled to any regard. But this is an erroneous impression. In nearly every State of the South there was a large minority opposed to secession. The majority were carried away at a time of unparalleled excitement and delusion, and all popular delusions subside sooner or later. The minority were compelled, for the time being, to submit to the Government de facto; for our Government was unable to afford them any protection, and they were at the mercy of the rebel authorities. When the Union is restored and peace proclaimed, this large class of original Union men in the South will be found worthy of generous forbearance and sympathy. He did not allow himself to believe that the people of the North and South are to be enemies forever. They are enemies in war; in peace they will again be friends. Then the angry passions excited by the conflict will gradually subside, and more generous emotions will resume their sway in every manly breast.

He had a few words to say in perfect candor and friendship to those who assume that the only solution of our troubles is to be found in the abolition of slavery. Their argument is, that slavery was the cause of the war, therefore it should be extirpated. This statement of the case is far from being strictly accurate.

The free and slave States united voluntarily and moved on harmoniously for more than half a century, notwithstanding this difference in their domestic condition. It was the energy of party passions and the animosities engendered by sectional spirit which disturbed their union. The true nature and design of the Federal relation between the States has been widely misunderstood. The compact relates only to a few national and well-defined objects, leaving all besides to the separate and exclusive control of the States themselves. This fundamental condition must be observed, and allowed to regulate the popular action. Otherwise no possible confederation or union of States can be of permanent duration.

Formerly the emancipation of the slaves was urged as an inestimable blessing to the white race, who were degraded by contact with slavery; now, instead of a friendly boon, it is proposed to inflict it upon them as a punishment at the point of the bayonet. It ought to be borne in mind that whatever system of change may be proposed in regard to the negro population, whether gradual or immediate, its practical execution must at last devolve upon the white people among whom they dwell. They alone occupy the position to carry it into practical effect. Is it conceivable that they will execute a new code repugnant to their sentiments, under military coercion? Any system for the elevation or enfranchisement of the African, to insure success, must be adopted with the voluntary concurrence of the people with whom that race is in personal relation and contact. Otherwise it will be a failure, and "their last state will be worse than the first." He had no confidence in measures of amelioration and philanthropy which are to be accomplished by fire and sword and widespread desolation. If the structure of States is to be reformed, and a degraded race elevated to a better condition, more pacific agencies must be employed. Slavery has been seriously impaired by the war, and some of the States will doubtless take measures of their own accord for its gradual removal. But the whole subject must finally be left to the voluntary action of the States themselves. The arming of large bodies of negroes will not bring peace to the country or liberty to the slave. It is far more likely to produce an interminable warfare, and evolve scenes of cruelty and horror which will shock the civilized world, and compel every true American to weep bitter tears of national humiliation and remorse. It will probably make it impossible for the two races ever to dwell in peace on the same soil. These are consequences which the Government and people are admonished to foresee in time, and if possible to avert.

In confirmation of the opinions he had expressed in regard to the practical tendency of the abolition policy of the Administration, he might produce expressions from some of the most devoted Union men in the border States. He would content himself by selecting but one. It came from a noble and illustrious patriot who now sleeps in his grave, to which he was hastened by the calamities of his country. It was the calm, earnest voice of John J. Critten-

len. For many years it had been his good fortune to enjoy the friendship of that wise and patriotic statesman, whose loss the whole country mourns as a great national bereavement, and which he deeply felt as a personal affliction, severing another of the cherished ties which connected him with the past. In a letter received from Mr. Crittenden, a short time before his death, he held the following language:

"The fate of the country depends to a great extent upon the course and conduct of your great State. Her word bravely and patriotically spoken will have a mighty influence throughout the Union, and will control the policy on which the war is to be prosecuted; and upon that policy depends, mainly, the results of the war. If it is to be prosecuted simply and wholly for the restoration of the Constitution and the Union, it will be successful; but if it is to be perverted into a war for abolition and for desolation—a war for vengeance—then I should say the war will be fatal to the Union and to the country, if I had not a superstitious confidence that God will save us from our own madness. I think the people should express with manly firmness their opinion on the mighty questions of constitutionality and expediency that are involved in or connected with this war as now prosecuted and conducted by the Administration. They can not consider it as unimportant whether the war is to be prosecuted for the abolition of slavery or not, or whether the President had the constitutional power to issue his proclamation. These questions enter into and form part and parcel of the war. It seems to me that the policy to be observed, in the prosecution of the war, is an essential part of it, on which its issues for weal or woe must depend. It is my anxious desire for the preservation of the Constitution and Union, that makes me so anxious that no false step should be taken in the prosecution of the war, and especially none so mischievous as the course now pursued by the Administration."

These words of the departed and honored patriot had sunk deeply into his heart. Sometimes he almost fancied that he heard his voice, as if speaking from the tomb, reproaching him with apathy, and arousing him to one more effort for the salvation of the country. In the presence of the mighty issues which are to decide the destiny of our Government, we ought all to feel that silence is treasonable, and indifference a crime against our native land.

But the question arises, what is to be done? In what manner can we contribute to the restoration of the Union, and the deliverance of the country from peril? It may be said that we have no power to influence the action of the Administration, as now constituted. But we can exercise the rights of freemen, and discharge our duty in a manly, fearless spirit, leaving consequences with that overruling Providence, by whom nations are built up and destroyed. We can still express our opinions, (at least, in the State of New-York,) without fear of provost-marshals; we can exercise the right of suffrage, and contend for the cause of constitutional right and liberty, with patriotic energy and zeal. The time has come for the people to declare their will, with an emphatic voice which can not be doubted or misunderstood. We can exercise our constitutional right of petition to the Government of the United States. The President has doubtless been persuaded that the people of the North desire him to abolish slavery in all the States, and to prosecute the war for that purpose. He feared that Mr. Lincoln was kept in a state of honest ignorance respecting the true opinion of the country. He must be the victim of an illusion, which ought to be dispelled. It is time the President should be undeceived. Let it be made known to him, by clear and unquestionable evidence, that the people demand that this war shall be prosecuted solely for the restoration of the Constitution as it is, and the Union as it was, and not for the annihilation of States, or the forcible emancipation of Southern negroes. At any rate, he desired that the people of Niagara should speak out, and with this view he had prepared a Petition to the President, asking him to revoke his abolition proclamation, and proclaim the supremacy of the Constitution. It would be submitted to the meeting for its consideration. He intended to sign it, and hoped a majority of the people of this county would do likewise. If the voice of our own county is thus expressed, we may fairly infer that it is an index to the pop.

ular sentiment in other sections of the country. It will thus be seen how many of our citizens desire that the war shall be prosecuted and finally concluded according to the principles of the Constitution. He was confident that a large majority are in favor of making the restoration of the Union as it was the sole object of the war. If there be any who prefer a different policy, it is competent for them to resort to the same method of declaring their sentiments.

Indeed, he was informed that petitions are now in circulation, in some of the counties, urging the President never to end the war till the last negro slave is set free. This fact had suggested to his mind the idea of a counter movement. If one set of people may petition the President to disregard the Constitution, other people may properly ask him to adhere to it, and defend it according to his oath. Let both sides be heard, and it will soon be known where the true strength of the country is to be found on this question. If it should be objected that a repeal of the Proclamation would involve its author in inconsistency, it is easy to answer that its abandonment would be far more consistent and honorable and constitutional than its original promulgation.

If a false step has been taken, it is more noble and praiseworthy to recall than to persevere in it.

Our petition can not embarrass the Government in the prosecution of the war. Congress has given the President an unlimited command of men and money, and he has nothing to do but to use them. We have a right to ask that he shall wield these enormous powers in accordance with the organic law of the land, and it is not for us to assume that he will finally disregard the deliberate will of the people. If he should, it will remain for them to apply the proper remedy in due season.

To guard against any misconception, he desired to say that he was still ready to go as far as those who go farthest to uphold the Government in the exercise of all its rightful powers, and in the prosecution of the war for the constitutional purpose of maintaining the Union. He wanted no dishonorable peace, none which will not preserve the Union in its integrity. He would never consent to its dissolution. But every patriotic man ought to desire that a policy should b adopted which will insure the origina and only legitimate object of the war, i the shortest period, and with the smal est effusion of blood. If wise and en lightened counsels prevail, he believe that the mighty drama which had con vulsed the country would soon draw t a close, and peace, effulgent, blesse peace, will once more smile upon ou afflicted land. Who that has a hear within him does not desire to witnes this glorious consummation? For mor than two years, this war has raged o battle-fields innumerable, and thousand yea, hundreds of thousands, of fellow citizens and brethren have fallen by eac other's hands in sanguinary strife. Man of the fairest portions of the land hav been ravaged and desolated, towns de stroyed by fire, women and childre driven from their homes, amid scenes o agony, which no language can depict The spirit of havoc and rapine "has hel high carnival". It is the invariable ten dency of civil war to transform men int furies. The most intense passions of hu man nature are roused to the most vic lent action. It is probably the first tim in the history of civilized nations that domestic struggle so vast and destruc tive has been so long continued withou one word of parley looking to the future nor so much as one effort at pacification or a single appeal to the insurgent peo ple to return to their allegiance, and trust to the justice and magnanimity o a paternal government. The armies o the Union have been victorious. They have gained great and decisive advan tages. Whatever may be said by the leading spirits of the rebellion, large bodies of people in the South evince a desire to return to the Union, and enjoy peace and security under the protecting shield of the Federal Constitution. This is especially true in North-Carolina, Ten nessee, and Louisiana. At such a junc ture we ought to act a noble and gener ous part. Let us rise to the level of the occasion, discard all baser passions, and show that we are inspired by an exalted patriotism, and capable of the virtues o clemency and magnanimity. Then may we claim a proud and illustrious rank in the scale of nations, and history will at test that our conduct was worthy of a free, powerful, and Christian people.

PAPERS FROM THE SOCIETY

Diffusion of Political Knowledge

Prof. S. F. B. MORSE, Pres't C. MASON, Cor. Sec'y, 13 Park Row, New-York.

SPEECH OF HON. AMASA J. PARKER

COOPER INSTITUTE.

In meeting together this evening, my fellow-citizens, to discuss the issues before the country and to consult upon the public welfare, we are not only exercising a right dear to freemen, but we are also discharging a high political duty, the neglect of which, in the imminent peril now impending over us, would be grossly criminal.

Throughout the Northern States a great struggle is in progress between power and the people. It is a struggle for the maintenance of popular rights against the infringements and the usurpations of a centralized Federal power. The right of personal liberty, without which the government is worthless; of free speech and a free press, without which the people can not govern, and which are inconsistent only with arbitrary power; the right of protection against wrong and outrage, and of remedies in the courts for redress of injuries; the right to that great bulwark of personal liberty, the writ of habeas corpus, the establishment of which cost two hundred years of contest in England—all these have been invaded by the Federal Government. These struggles for the maintenance of popular rights have existed, with various results, in all countries and at all periods of history. In some countries these rights have been trodden out under the iron heel of despotic power; in others they have been partially recognized under the form of a constitutional monachy, and, comparatively, it is only within a very narrow limit of territory that they have been admitted to their full extent. It is indeed one of the marvels of the age that these popular rights, for the preservation of which our own government was instituted, and upon which it was built, should be trampled upon with impunity here, and should be in absolute danger of extermination. Fortunately our own form of government has furnished us with peaceful means of protection and redress. We can effect, at the ballot-box, a successful and bloodless revolution. If that be left to us—if it be not invaded by Federal bayonets, or controlled by Federal power, and if we fully understand the questions involved, and duly appreciate the high duty devolved upon us, we may yet be saved. Three years have elapsed since the election took place which brought the present national administration into power. Up to that time there was no nation upon the face of the earth so prosperous and so happy as our own. Thirty-four States, inhabited by more than thirty millions of freemen, enjoying every blessing that a free government could secure them, excited the envy and admiration of the world. Our nation was a first-class power; its influence everywhere felt and recognized; its commerce unequaled; rich beyond all estimate in its intelligence and industry, as well as material wealth, and with a future in prospect of boundless prosperity and glory.

And how is it now, after that Administration has ruled us less than three years? Our country is practically divided. A civil war has been raging for two years and a half, with no prospect of an early termination. A million of men withdrawn from the industrial pursuits of life, are in arms, engaged in deadly strife; hundreds of thousands of brave men have fallen in battle or died of lingering diseases, incident to the conflict. The nation, in its agony, sweats great drops of blood. Habiliments of mourning and sounds of woe have become familiar to us. Widows and orphans surround us on every side. Extensive regions of country have been made desolate. Ruthless guerrillas murder and burn and plunder. In the wake of armies, women starve and children cry for food. Pirates prey upon our commerce and drive it from the ocean. Bitter sectional hatred has taken the place of fraternal affection. A national debt, almost beyond computation, hangs over us and our posterity. And through this black cloud of miseries which hangs like a pall over the land, there comes hardly a ray of hope to our relief. All these accumulated horrors have gathered over us since the election of Mr. Lincoln, and are the consequences of the triumph of a sectional party based upon one single idea—that of hostility to the cherished institutions of the South. No one can for a moment suppose that the country would not have been still prosperous and happy if either of the other presidential candidates had been elected instead of Mr. Lincoln. Conservative men everywhere—through the press, on the stump, and in private warnings—predicted the direful consequences that would surely follow bringing into power the principles of Black Republicanism. They predicted it, not because the triumph of abolition doctrine would justify rebellion, but because, regardless of justification, human nature would not fail to rebel under such circumstances. We must take human nature as we find it. But warnings were in vain. An irrepressible conflict had been proclaimed, and it is still in progress. And though a majority of the people were not thus misled, Mr. Lincoln was constitutionally elected. Then came secession, and of course civil war followed. I concede, nay, I maintain, there was not the slightest justification for the rebellion. The wickedness of the leaders in that great conspiracy can not be over-stated. They should have submitted, and patiently have waited for relief until it could have been obtained by constitutional means through the ballot-box. They should have looked for protection against the mad schemes of the abolitionists, to the Constitution and the laws — to the Senate, the House of Representatives, and the courts. Constituted as they were, they would not have appealed to them in vain. The returning wave of public sentiment would have been conservative and patriotic. There was still time between the election and the inauguration of Mr. Lincoln to have averted civil war. But the fanatical party which had elected him was mad with joy. Its leaders elevated the Chicago platform above the Constitution. They would neither concede nor conciliate. When a kind word might have saved the Union, they would not utter it. The men who had sympathized with John Brown in his raid upon Virginia, and who have since canonized him—who hang his picture over their mantles, in token of their veneration and love—pressed on the advantage they had gained at the election, and determined that the war against slavery should be waged without quarter. The extreme Southern States passed acts of secession. The danger became imminent. Separation or civil war stared us in the face. Conservative men appealed to the leaders of the triumphant party, while yet the Border States were with us, and while they were still anxious to preserve the Union, but appealed in vain. They exacted their "pound of flesh," though it should take with it the life-blood of the Union.

Senator Chandler, who is now sent to this State to instruct us in political duty, openly advocated "blood-letting." The Peace Congress met with but little favor in that quarter. Delegates from the black Republican States were reluctantly sent, and men selected so as to represent the most radical ideas. In our own State, the Republican legislature postponed action, and there was great danger that we should be unrepresented in the Peace Congress. It was at this crisis that the conservative men of this State gathered in convention at Albany, in February, 1861, to see what could be done to save the Union and avert civil war. There has never been in this State an assemblage of men more high-minded and patriotic. Determined that their State should not go unrepresented in the proposed Peace Congress to be held at Washington, and hoping that the influence of this State might be cast on the side of fraternity and union, that convention appointed delegates — conservative men — to represent the State, in case the legislature should fail to appoint. That drove the Republican legislature to act upon the propositions, and it selected and appointed a delegation to the Peace Congress of highly respectable gentlemen, a majority of whom, however, were advocates of the most radical and unyielding policy. The consequence was the votes of the conservative majority of that delegation were of no avail. The vote of the State, being determined by a majority of the delegates, was cast in favor of no adequate measure of conciliation or hope. The Chicago platform triumphed over the Constitution. When the impartial historian shall write the history of these eventful times, he will charge the responsibility for all the direful evils which now afflict us to the extreme fanatics of the North and South. Both preferred disunion to an abandonment of favorite theories. The conservative Democracy of the nation, standing midway between these extremes, did all in their power to resist their machinations. They stood up for the constitutional rights of the South against the enroachments of Northern abolitionists, till they were overcome by the tide of fanaticism. They saw sectional parties gradually engendering sectional hatred, and that it must eventually lead to collision; but no warnings of theirs was heeded. Even in the spring of 1861, after the extreme Southern States had seceded, and while intermediate States were trembling in the balance, and when some of the more sagacious men, like Mr. Weed, fell back aghast at the ruin spread before them, and honestly sought the means to avert the imminent danger, the more radical leaders of the Republican party, and the same men who have since obtained such complete control over the President, would listen to no suggestion of conciliation. They pressed forward regardless of consequences. They were either blind to the dangers before us, or they courted the bloody drama which has followed. When the first blow was struck at Fort Sumter, all hope ceased. The whole North rose as one man to maintain the Constitution and defend the Union against a wicked rebellion. I insist that the course pursued by the Democratic party of the North at this crisis was sublimely patriotic and magnanimous. They forgot the wrongs of the Administration in their love for the government. They rushed to the national standard though it was borne by those in whom they had little confidence. They placed men and means at the disposal of those in power, till Senator Wilson, who is now perambulating this State to abuse us, cried: "Hold, enough." It made no difference that the Administration was at the same proscribing Democrats and filling their places with Republicans. The Democracy, always on the side of the country, whether it be against foreign or domestic foes, sought neither power nor place. They submitted without complaint to persecution. They acted the patriot while the Administration played the partisan. And how have they been treated in return by the men in power? They have been denounced as traitors, loaded with opprobrious epithets, imprisoned without warrant and without accusation, or lawlessly kidnapped and sent out of the State. While abolition newspapers that openly advocated disunion went undisturbed, Democratic papers were seized and suppressed, or denied transmission by the mails, for merely discussing measures of national policy. While loud-mouthed abolitionists, openly preaching disunion, were suffered to go at large, Democrats of unquestionable loyalty were imprisoned. The world will never believe that for the purpose of subduing rebellion at the South, it was necessary to make war upon the liberties of the North. Are we not entitled to the protection of the same Constitution at the North which we are called upon to defend with our life's blood at the South? Was not the Constitution made for the whole country—for the North as well as the South? Was it not designed to protect our personal rights in war as well as in peace? If not, it is of little value. The plea of necessity is always the excuse for oppression. The tyrant pleads it to justify his act—the highway robber as an excuse for his crime. I insist that there is within and under the Constitution of our country ample power to defend it against both domestic foes and foreign enemies. The tribunals of justice vindicate innocence as well as punish guilt. But the plea of necessity, if it can be admitted in any case, can never be made applicable to the Free States of the North so far removed from the scene of conflict. There has never been a moment since the civil war began when the courts of the Free States were not open for accusation and trial—not a moment when judges or juries would have hesitated to convict where guilt was proved. No fair-minded man can doubt but the arbitrary power so freely exercised, in violation of the personal liberties and rights of Northern Democrats, has been prompted by partisan prejudice, or that the arrests were the reckless acts of those who place a low estimate upon the value of personal liberty.

Could it have been necessary to arrest the Messrs Flanders in Franklin County, at the extreme north of the State, the farthest possible removed from the rebellion, and to imprison them for months in Fort Warren, without warrant, without accusation, and without explanation? Their newspaper had but a limited circulation, never extending to the disaffected district. They are gentlemen of high personal character, as loyal and as honest as any in the land. Was it necessary to the safety of the State to arrest the little hunchback newsboy who peddled newspapers on the New-Haven Railroad, and thus supported himself and his mother, and to imprison him in Fort Lafayette? Was it necessary, to enable the Government to put down the rebellion, that the Rev. Mr. Benedict, a pious and exemplary clergyman at Aurora, Erie County, should be seized and carried off to Washington and imprisoned there? Is the gospel of peace so dangerous to the welfare of the Government that it shall not be permitted to be preched in the pulpit by the clergy even so far distant from Washington as our northern frontier? The Apostles themselves would have stood but a small chance of personal liberty if they had lived or preached the Gospel of the divine Master in these days. The present National Administration, like that which ruled in Judea in the time of King Agrippa, would no doubt imprison St. Paul, if he were here, as "a pestilent fellow and a mover of sedition." Will the civilized world ever believe that it was really necessary to successfully put down the rebellion, that Fort Lafayette and Fort Warren should be converted into bastiles and crowded with freemen of the North, sent there in violation of every legal and constitutional right, those in power refusing all investigation and inquiry, and interposing the guns of the fortress in answer to the writ of habeas corpus? Will the lovers of freedom in any part of the world ever believe that suppressing newspapers, and stifling free discussion here, were among the means necessary to subdue men in rebellion in distant States? These were the first invasions by the Administration of our liberties, and the steps subsequently taken seemed designed for the completion of a system that, when carried out, shall leave us deprived of every constitutional right, if not of all hope of regaining it. To sustain the Administration in future aggressions, and to protect it from a just punishment in the Courts for past wrongs, "the indemnity act" was passed by an abolition Congress, and the fourth section of that act clothes

he President with absolute power over he persons and property of every citi-:en of the republic. It declared the or-ler of the President, or under his au-hority, a good defense in all Courts, to ny prosecution, civil or criminal, pend-ng or future, for any search, seizure, ar-est, or imprisonment. This atrocious ict thus makes the will of the President he law of the land, and places the peo-le at the mercy of the many thousand who act under his authority. You may e torn from your family; your whole roperty may be seized; you have no edress. Kidnapping, murder, robbery, ape, all are to go unpunished and un-edressed, if committed by the order of he President or under his authority. The odious doctrine of tyrants that "the King can do no wrong," is enacted as aw, in even a more objectionable form, n this Republic of ours, and the full laze of the light of the nineteenth cen-ury. Will not the people of the North f all parties seek protection at the bal-ot-box against an act of usurpation which would be tolerated in no absolute monarchy of the Old World? Step by step, as if feeling the way, these en-croachments upon the rights of the peo-le have been made. One by one our hands have been bound, and recently, as f to complete the plan and stifle even complaint of wrong, the writ of habeas corpus is suspended by the President's Proclamation. By this act the Courts are paralyzed. Their powers and func-tions in the protection of human liberty cease. Pending proceedings fall to the ground. Hereafter there can be no in-quiry into the cause of imprisonment. Sic volo sic jubeo. The innocent and the guilty are huddled together in one common prison. Provost-Marshals and military agents are spread over the land in thousands. Their cupidity is stimu-lated by raising the reward for arresting a deserter from five dollars to thirty. If they were all honest, which experience disproves, they could not fail to make many mistakes. In identity alone, hun-dreds have already been made. But they are hurried off, handcuffed and fet-tered, to the loathsome prison. If you are drawn as a conscript, though you may not be within the ages of liability, though you are clearly, for any cause, exempt, the decision of the military board against you is conclusive. No Court is allowed to correct the error. Though it be the result of partisan ma-lice, and you be seventy years of age, you must submit to the wrong. The writ of deliverance for the innocent is gone. Such, fellow-citizens, is now the condition of this once free North.

I say "fellow-citizens," perhaps I ought to say "fellow-subjects.' But, though bound hand and foot, the peo-ple of the North are still struggling to be free. One year ago the Democratic State Convention denounced these arbi-trary arrests as "a usurpation and a crime," and a majority of the people sustained that denunciation by the elec-tion of Governor Seymour. With that able and intrepid champion of popular rights at the head of the State Govern-ment, we continue the struggle with confidence and hope. You well know how unequal is the contest. The whole power and patronage of the Federal Government are brought to bear against us. Federal office-holders, both civil and military, swarm over the land like the locusts of Egypt. Federal Generals abandon their appropriate field of duty to engage in partisan strife and preach abolition doctrines upon the stump. Shoddy contractors give largely of their suddenly acquired wealth to sustain this Administration at the polls, for the end of the war would terminate their pro-fits. Corruption stalks abroad at noon-day. The mercenary are purchased, while the timid are frightened. Yet, in the face of all this power, and patron-age, and terror, nearly two hundred thousand freemen of Ohio have boldly denounced the arrest of Mr. Vallandig-ham by Burnside, and his banishment by the President, "as a usurpation and a crime." And this has been done in spite of wide differences of opinion ex-isting between Mr. Vallandigham and many who supported him as to the policy of the war. Irrespective of such differences, the vote was due, and was given as a condemnation of an outrage upon personal liberty. Nearly two hun-dred thousand citizens deliberately re-buked the act of tyranny by their votes, and the Administration rejoices beyond measure that it was not three hundred thousand. It well knows that the majority who voted in Ohio did not approve the act, for most of the leading Republican presses at the time admitted its illegality. Intolerance is a leading characteristic of the party in power. It repudiates the Jeffersonian doctrine, that "there is nothing to be feared from error while truth is left free to combat it." It would chain down the mind as well as the body. It denies the right of free discussion. Its presses teem with abuse of every Democrat who exercises the right of discussing public affairs. Following an imperial example, it compels whole regiments to vote in accordance with its will. Lieutenant Edgerly is stricken from the roll for voting the Democratic ticket, and in the same spirit, Secretary Stanton himself, with an impudence unparalleled, sends a telegram to Mr. Forney, on learning the result of the election in Pennsylvania, in which he charges, in substance, that the Democracy are rebels, like those driven from that State in June "with steel and cannon-shot." Shame upon such partisan injustice! It is a deliberate insult to the Democracy of the entire North, as well as of Pennsylvania. The head of the War Department can not so soon have forgotten the fervent appeals he made to the Democratic Governor of this State for aid in that emergency, nor the promptness with which it was furnished, nor the profusion of his thankfulness, expressed to Governor Seymour upon that occasion. Shame upon such ingratitude!

Let me be more specific on this point. On the fifteenth of June last, when the rebel army threatened Washington, Mr. Secretary Stanton, in his emergency, sent to Governor Seymour the following telegram:

"To his Excellency Governor Seymour:

"The movements of the rebel forces in Virginia are now sufficiently developed to show that General Lee, with his whole army, is moving forward to invade the States of Maryland and Pennsylvania, and other States.

"The President, to repel the invasion promptly, has called upon Ohio, Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Western Virginia for one hundred thousand militia for six months, unless sooner discharged. It is important to have the largest possible force in the least possible time, and if other States would furnish militia for a short time, to be credited on the draft, it would greatly advance the object. Will you please inform me immediately if, in answer to a special call of the President, you can raise and forward say twenty thousand militia as volunteers, without bounty, to be credited in the draft of your State, or what number you can possibly raise?

"E. M. STANTON, Secretary of War."

Governor Seymour answered promptly in the affirmative, and immediately set about raising troops. Not a moment was lost. Regiments were on their way in a few hours, and on the same day the following telegram was received:

"To Governor Seymour:

"The President directs me to return you his thanks, and those of the Department, for your prompt response. A strong movement of your city regiments to Philadelphia would be a very encouraging movement, and do great good in giving strength to that State. The call had to be for six months, unless sooner discharged, in order to comply with the law. It is not likely that more than thirty days' service, perhaps not so long, would be required. Can you forward your city regiments speedily? Please reply early.

"EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War."

You see what was asked of your city regiments, and the whole world knows how promptly they moved, and how gallantly they bore themselves in the field. They did indeed "give great strength to that State." Their example roused the slumbering energies of the people of Pennsylvania. It was the example and the effort of the citizen soldiers of your own city, thrown into the scale at the right moment and when it was nicely balanced, that enabled our army to make a successful stand against the invaders. I insist that there has been manifested nowhere else in the history of this war such promptness and energy as characterized the action of the Governor and his staff in this emergency. And so thought the President and Mr. Secretary Stanton. The latter wrote a letter to the Governor, expressing warmly his thanks, and also sent to the Adjutant-General of the State the following telegram:

JUNE 19, 1863.

To ADJUTANT-GENERAL SPRAGUE, S. N. G.:

The President directs me to return his thanks to his Excellency Governor Seymour, and his staff, for their energetic and prompt action. Whether ny further force is likely to be required will be communicated to you to-morrow, by which time, is expected, the movements of the enemy will e more fully developed.

EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

The letter was as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON CITY, June 27.

DEAR SIR: I can not forbear expressing to you he deep obligation I feel for the prompt and can-id support you have given to the Government in he present emergency. The energy, activity, nd patriotism you have exhibited I may be per-itted personally and officially to acknowledge ithout arrogating any personal claims on my art to such service or to any service whatever.

I shall be happy always to be esteemed your riend, EDWIN M. STANTON.

His Excellency HORATIO SEYMOUR.

The following is the telegram sent on the 4th October instant to Mr. Forney:

To JOHN W. FORNEY, Esq.:

Thanks for your telegram. All honor to the Keystone State. She upheld the Federal arch in une, and with steel and cannon shot drove the ebel invaders from her soil; and now, in Octo-er, she has again rallied for the Union, and over-whelmed the foe at the ballot-box.

EDWIN M. STANTON.

I repeat, every word of this missive is a gross insult to the Democracy. Who upheld the Federal arch in June? Who drove the invaders from her soil? Was it done by Republicans alone? Ask the Democrats of New-York who hurried to the rescue and shed their blood upon the battle-field. Ask the Democrats of Pennsylvania who were there also. Were the persons overwhelmed at the ballot-box really the rebel foe as charged, or were they the Democrats of the State, who had borne their full share in repelling invasion? How much more truthfully Mr. Stanton could have said the Democracy of the State have been overwhelmed by the appliances of Federal power and patronage. Pray, how many thousands did Mr. Stanton send to Pennsylvania to help achieve the result? Let the depleted and retreating Army of the Potomac answer. This abuse of the Democracy of the North is becoming intolerable. The State of New-York has been especially singled out for misrepresentation and calumny. While it is confidently believed that far more than its just proportion of troops have been claimed and furnished from this State, the Democracy of the State, with its Democratic Governor at its head, are charged with interposing obstacles to the prosecution of the war. The truth is carefully concealed from the public. It has not been permitted to know as the fact is, that about sixteen thousand volunteers have been furnished to the General Government by the State since Governor Seymour was inaugurated, on the first day of January last. And this is in addition to the fourteen thousand five hundred troops sent to the rescue when Pennsylvania was invaded; whereas, all the General Government has raised from the State under the Conscription law, including substitutes, is, up to this time, less than six thousand. Pray, what States of the Union, under abolition rule, has done so well, proportionably, in raising volunteer troops, as this State of New-York, under Democratic auspices? And yet the Democracy are stigmatized by the abolition press as "Copperheads and traitors," and by the head of the War Department they are classed with the "rebel foe." Rebuke such intolerance at the ballot-box. Let the Administration "call off its dogs" from the Northern Democrats, and give its whole energies to the putting down of the rebellion. The time, and money, and men, and effort devoted to controlling the Northern elections would, if properly concentrated and applied, have subdued the rebellion long ago. The Democrats have interposed no obstacle to a successful prosecution of the war. On the contrary, they have aided in men and voluntary offerings to an extent, it is believed, far beyond what those have done who are responsible for bringing this Administration into power and bringing on the war. I appeal to the experience and observation of citizens throughout the State to prove that, in the raising of more than 230,000 volunteers in this State, the Democracy were everywhere most active and efficient. Without their earnest coöperation, it could never have been accomplished. We complain that the war is not prosecuted to a speedy termination. We complain that its object and purposes are perverted to partisan ends. A war waged for the single purpose of suppressing the rebellion and restoring the Union would have ended long ago. A war for the extermination of slavery will be interminable. We complain that the President has forfeited his pledge as to the object and mode of prosecuting the war, and has surrendered himself to the influence of the most radical abolitionists, thus repelling the cordial support of conservative men of the North, and driving the South together into one solid column of resistance. The President said, in his inaugural address: "I have no purpose, directly or indirectly, to interfere with the institution of slavery where it exists. I believe I have no right to do so, and I have no inclination to do so."

In palpable violation of this pledge, he said, at a later day, in his Emancipation Proclamation: "I order and declare that all per sons held as slaves in the said designated States and parts of States, are and hereafter shall be free." The party in power pledged itself, by the adoption in Congress of the Crittenden resolutions, that the war should be prosecuted only for the restoration of the Union. This idea was long ago abandoned, and the purpose of subjugation is now openly avowed. In June last, General Butler, in a speech made at a partisan assemblage at Concord, New-Hampshire, declared the States in which rebellion exists to be foreign States, and advocated their entire subjugation — their reduction to the condition of conquered Territories — and the extermination of slavery. He swings, like the pendulum of a clock, from one extreme to the other. Wearing the uniform of the Union, and enjoying its pay, he recognizes the sovereignty of but the Northern part of it. He places himself upon the platform of Wendell Phillips, and Sumner, and Chandler, and the rest of that company of radical abolitionists who induced the President to violate his inaugural pledge and issue his Emancipation Proclamation, and whose machinations for the continuance of the war beyond the limit of a restoration of the Union, excite the alarm even of the more conservative members of the Cabinet, as we may judge from the recent speech of the Postmaster-General. General Butler's argument is a felo de se. To hold those States to be foreign States concedes the validity of their acts of secession. It takes away from us our right to subdue rebellion, and places us in the false position of unjustifiable invaders. It puts us in the wrong and makes us the aggressors; for if the States had a right to secede, we have no right to controvert their acts. General Butler thus places himself upon the rebel side of the question, and assumes a position palpably untenable. We hold the acts of secession to be void. The States have never gone out of the Union, and so Mr. Lincoln admitted in one of his messages to Congress. People, not States are in rebellion. The people in rebellion are to be subdued, and we have a right to subject them to the Constitution and the laws, because they have not the power to take their States out of the Union. The States are still in existence, with their State organizations and laws, with every right reserved at the formation of the Union. Let the people return to their allegiance, and let the States and the people again claim their representation in the national councils, and we may once more move on in harmony. Profiting by past lessons of sad experience, we may learn to avoid sectional controversies in the future. The indomitable energy and courage displayed on both sides will increase their mutual respect for each other. Reünited, they may once more share in the glory of a common ancestry, a common language, and a common destiny. A corrected public sentiment would exclude from the councils of the nation the extreme fanatics, both of the North and South, whose evil councils have brought on us all our national ills. Time will stamp their memories with a common infamy. Why may not this nation yet hope to be united, prosperous, and happy, and to move on with a vigor and strength not likely to be again weakened by domestic broils? We can not, under any circumstances, consent to disunion. To prevent it, we should exert the whole power of the Government, and should make every honorable effort at conciliation. It is believed that, even now, States are ready to return if they could be protected in all their rights under the Constitution. But the radical policy that unfortunately controls the Administration, is not willing to receive them. It demands more — subjugation — the obliteration of existing State lines and a dependent Territorial condition. It demands the extinction of slavery. It demands what will never be yielded, but what will protract the war indefinitely. It will be a long time before even the desolation and human suffering, falling now chiefly upon the women and children of the South, and at all times upon the loyal as well as the rebellious, can be the successful means of exacting such degrading terms.

Fellow-Citizens, our remedy for all these wrongs is at the ballot-box, and we must submit patiently till we can obtain redress by constitutional and lawful means. We respect and uphold the Constitution and the laws, and we complain of their violation by the party in power. The road to redress is still open to us. Federal bayonets have not yet, in this State, been suffered to drive us from the ballot-box. We have a ticket in nomination worthy of your cordial support. Its election would go far in its influence toward giving a proper direction to the war, and toward securing a restoration of our violated personal liberties. Moderate and conservative men of all parties should see how deeply the country is interested in our success, and coöperate with us. It will require all your efforts, all your watchfulness, to meet and guard against the corrupt appliances of a reckless Administration. See, then, that not one vote is lost. A single vote may decide this great struggle between power and the rights of the people, and may be the means of inaugurating a wiser national policy.

Rally, then, to the rescue. Arrest the encroachments of arbitrary power. Rebuke intolerance. Bring back the Administration to the path of duty. Hasten the time for the restoration of the Union and the termination of the war.

SPEECH BY HON. SANFORD E. CHURCH,

BATAVIA, OCTOBER 13, 1863.

FELLOW-CITIZENS:

You are assembled at a very critical and important period in the history of the country. Never before within your recollection and mine have interests so vast been at stake. In my judgment it is the duty now of every citizen to devote himself to National affairs. Questions of the most momentous character are crowding upon us with such rapidity that we are in danger of becoming bewildered and neglecting to discharge those duties which in a free government devolve upon the people, and which can not now be neglected without endangering the Government itself.

All questions which have heretofore agitated parties and arrayed men upon opposite sides, as important as they have sometimes been regarded, sink into utter insignificance when compared with the issues of the present moment—issues upon the determination of which depend the future destinies of the country. The glorious Union, constructed by our fathers, and cemented with their blood, and the free institutions secured by it, are now trembling upon the verge of destruction, and can only be rescued and saved by the dispassionate and patriotic efforts of all the people. In our action as citizens, at this time, we should lay aside all our partisan feeling and prejudice. If the election involved only the question whether one class of men or another was to fill the offices, we might allow our fancy, and even our passions and prejudices, full play, without endangering constitutional and vital interests. It is of slight moment to the mass of the people whether one man or another is chosen to discharge the duties of a particular office. The State offices would be reasonably well filled by the election of either ticket in the field, and so far as the particular duties of such officers are concerned, it would matter but little which was elected. But I regard the election this fall as vitally important, on account of the influence it will have in restoring our distracted country to its original vigor and usefulness, and in determining the future policy of the government with reference to it, and it will be my purpose to ascertain what the real issue to be decided by the people is, and what questions every citizen should examine and determine for himself, before he deposits his ballot.

For two and a half years we have been engaged in a civil war for which history furnishes no parallel. When the war commenced and became an existing fact, I deemed it my duty to sustain the Government, and to the extent of my influence and means I have labored (with what success, I leave others to decide) to furnish the Government with all the men and money necessary to crush the Rebellion and restore the legitimate authority of the nation. I occupy the same position to-day. So long as men are arrayed against the rightful authority of the Government, with arms in their hands, there is no other course to pursue but to meet them with force.

Whatever our views may be upon the causes which led to this terrible strife, and whatever blame we believe justly attaches to extreme men of the North, still the attempt forcibly to break down the authority of the Constitution over the whole country for fancied or real grievances, was an unlawful and criminal act which can not be justified or tolerated; while to admit the right of secession is to give up the supreme authority of the Government, even as to the powers expressly conferred upon it. Nor am I in favor of any peace based upon a separation. I will never consent to any but a country reünited and restored.

In expressing these views I but reïterate the sentiments of the Democratic party. At a convention recently held in Albany, composed of representatives of the highest character, ability, and patriotism from every Assembly District in the State, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That we reäffirm the platform adopted by the Democratic Convention of 1862, namely:

First. That we will continue to render the Government our sincere and united support in the use of all legitimate means to suppress the rebellion and to restore the Union as it was, and to maintain the Constitution as it is—believing that that sacred instrument, founded in wisdom by our Fathers, clothes the constituted authorities with full power to accomplish such purpose.

Nor have the members of the Democratic party in their individual action been wanting in energy and effectiveness in supplying the calls of the Government. Whenever men were wanted, a full equal portion have been given from the ranks of that party. Every battle-field will attest the bravery and patriotism of members of the Democratic party.

Whenever money was called for, they have opened their coffers and furnished the required sum. Without receiving or desiring the patronage of the Administration, and without any selfish motives except such as result from a desire to enjoy the blessings of a free government, they have, at all times and under all circumstances, evinced a readiness to aid in carrying on the war and restoring the country.

I make these remarks merely to say, that upon this question there is no issue. You will find occasionally a man so wedded to party and so blinded by passion or prejudice, as to denounce Democrats as copperheads and traitors; but I have found from considerable political experience, that epithets applied to an adversary never injure him, nor benefit those who employ them. The history of the world does not furnish a parallel to the unity of action exhibited in the Northern States, in sustaining this Administration in all its legitimate demands, and whenever an impartial history shall be written of those who have participated in the conflict, its brightest page will contain the unselfish and patriotic action of those against whom these epithets are hurled.

Those who claim that there is any issue upon this question of maintaining the authority of the Government, are either thoroughly deceived or are attempting to deceive others. Still more false and deceptive is the pretense which I see extensively put forth by public speakers and by the press, that there has been something in the action or sayings of Governor Seymour which ought to influence people in determining their action at the polls. I have examined several of their statements, and have failed to find a single specific charge made or a single act specified, and I therefore conclude that the general clamor on that subject is set up to hide the real questions that are at issue, and prevent, if possible, a consideration of them by the people. Governor Seymour quelled the riot in New-York before it became necessary to declare martial law, and he made an effort to obtain from the Administration at Washington, the privilege of furnishing men by volunteering instead of drafting, and he endeavored to secure to our State the credits to which it was entitled, by reason of having furnished an excess over Massachusetts and other States, on previous calls; and when a neighboring State was invaded, he promptly sent more soldiers to its defense than all the other Northern States combined, and confessedly contributed to, if he did not secure, the defeat of the rebel forces at Gettysburgh.

If these acts were in controversy in this election, I should feel entirely confident in submitting them to the determination of the people; but I fully agree with the New-York Herald, when it reminded these gentlemen that Gov. Seymour was elected in 1862, and that we have entered upon a new campaign with issues belonging to it.

No, fellow-citizens! the questions for you to answer are of a different character entirely, and you should allow no false issues and subterfuges to interfere with their proper determination. What, then, are the issues of the present campaign?

When the war was commenced, the President solemnly pledged the country, that it should be prosecuted for the restoration of the Union and the maintenance of the Constitution. The theory proclaimed to the people was, that the act of secession did not dissolve the Union, nor dissever the lawful connection between the States seceding and the other States; that the rebellion only suspended for the time being the authority of the Government, and that when that was restored, the States could then rightfully exercise all the powers and privileges appertaining to them under the Constitution.

When our army was defeated at the battle of Bull Run, and driven back into the very streets of Washington, a Republican Congress, under the advice of a Republican President, placed upon the records of the country, a resolution (which passed almost unanimously) reiterating, in the most authentic and solemn manner, the pledge before given by the President, and declaring the purposes and objects of the war.

I will now read to you the resolution, and I beg that you will ponder its words and import:

"Resolved, That the present deplorable civil war has been brought upon the country by the disunionists of the Southern States now in arms against the Constitutional Government, and in arms around the Capital; that in this national emergency, Congress, banishing all feelings of mere passion or resentment, will recollect only its duty to the whole country; that this war is not waged, on their part, in any spirit of oppression, or for any purpose of conquest or subjugation, or purpose of overthrowing or interfering with the rights or established institutions of those States; but to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution, and to preserve the Union with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired; and that as soon as these objects are accomplished the war ought to cease."

If the distinguished and lamented Kentuckian who penned and introduced this resolution had never done any other act worthy of public attention, the truthful and constitutional sentiments, and the glowing, patriotic words embodied in it, with the noble motives which prompted its introduction, would have been sufficient to immortalize his name and cause his memory to be cherished to the latest posterity.

Under these pledges, a million and a half of our young men have left their homes and all the endearments of home and friends, and enlisted under the banner of their country. Untold millions of treasure have been freely sacrificed by the people. They have been willing to give every thing—to sacrifice every thing, and only demanded the restoration of their country and the preservation of our free institutions.

Are these pledges being fulfilled? I answer, No. On the contrary, they have been and are being shamefully violated and disregarded. No sooner are our armies victorious in the field of battle, giving promise of a restored country, than the cloven foot of abolitionism reveals itself, and the whole purpose and objects of the war are avowedly changed. It is now deliberately proclaimed that the war is not to be prosecuted "to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution," nor "to preserve the Union with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired," but to destroy the Southern States and strike them out of existence—to subjugate their people, and desolate their country, and destroy their institutions. I do not make this charge against all the members of the Republican party. The great body of them I believe to be as honest and patriotic as any other class of citizens, and I believe that they have no wish to become aiders and abettors to this new programme which has been promulgated by their leaders; but it is expected that the force of party discipline will be sufficient to insure their support. We shall see.

I wish to be distinctly understood. I charge the radical and abolition leaders of the Republican party, who control its action and the action of the Administration, with the deliberate design to adopt and carry out a series of measures, the effect and object of which is to subvert the Union, and not to restore it—to overthrow the Constitution, and not to preserve it, and to carry on this war until these purposes have been accomplished, regardless of all consequences.

These measures consist in an attempt to subjugate the Southern States and reduce them to territories; and to absorb, centralize, and consolidate the rights and powers of the loyal States in the General Government. I make this charge in no spirit of party feeling or animosity, but with a solemn conviction of its truth, and of the duty of every citizen to sound the alarm before it is too late to prevent its consummation, and I would be the last to make it upon slight or unsatisfactory evidence. It is with feelings of sadness that I aver that the evidence to sustain this charge is overwhelming—a portion of which only I shall have time to present this evening. Charles Sumner has, perhaps, promulgated this scheme in the most authentic form. He occupies a prominent, if not a controlling influence in the Administration and the Republican party. In a recent article in the Atlantic Monthly he puts forth deliberately the proposition that Congress should assume jurisdiction over the seceded States, hold them as territories, establish provisional governments over them, or make their "admission or recognition depend upon the action of Congress." He says: "The essential feature of the proposition is that Congress shall assume jurisdiction of the rebel States." Which he explains to mean that Congress shall take and hold those States as conquered provinces or territories until the people will consent to ask to come into the Union with such Constitutions as Congress shall dictate and accept, and intimates that when the people ask to come into the Union without slavery, Massachusetts may be willing to admit them. In the mean time Massachusetts would be willing to control the political power of the country, and to superintend generally the affairs of the world. Similar views have been expressed by the Washington Chronicle, which claims to be the official organ of the Administration, and the Missouri Democrat, the leading radical organ of the West, and other leading Administration organs.

Mr. Whiting, Solicitor of the War Department, in a recent opinion elaborately written, with the approbation, as we are bound to presume, of the head of that Department and the President himself, declares that when the Southern people cease fighting and lay down their arms, still they can not return to the Union, except upon such terms as Congress shall dictate, and that they should not be permitted to return until they consented to change their Constitutions and abolish slavery. This paragraph will give us the substance of his opinion:

"If the inhabitants of a large part of the Union have, by becoming public enemies, surrendered and annulled their former rights, the question arises, can they recover them? Such rights can not be regained by reason of their having ceased to fight. The character of a public enemy having once been stamped upon them by the laws of war, remains fixed until it shall have been by our consent removed."

The New-York Tribune, with its widely-extended circulation, is understood to be the New-York organ of the radicals, and it has scarcely attempted to conceal its opposition to the restoration of the Union. Even before the war broke out, the Tribune advocated the policy of allowing the seceded States to separate. It contained the following sentiment:

"Whenever it shall be clear that the great body of the Southern people have become conclusively alienated from the Union, and anxious to escape from it, WE WILL DO OUR BEST TO FORWARD THEIR VIEWS."

It now advocates the new policy of subjugation, and of carrying on the war for the abolition of slavery. Next to Wendell Phillips, Mr. Greeley is unquestionably the most open and determined disunionist in the country.

Thad. Stevens, of Pennsylvania, a leading member of the House of Representatives, and of course in the confidence of the Administration, said:

"This talk of restoring the Union as it was under the Constitution as it is, is one of the absurdities which I have heard repeated until I have become about sick of it. The Union can never be restored as it was. There are many things which render such an event impossible. This Union never shall, with my consent, be restored under the Constitution as it is, with slavery to be protected by it."

M. F. Conway, a member of Congress from Kansas, and a leader in the Republican party, in a letter written in May last, stated:

"As to the Union, I would not give a cent for it unless it stood as a guarantee for freedom to every man, woman, and child within its entire jurisdiction. I consider the idea that every thing must be sacrificed to the Union utterly preposterous. What was the Union made for? That we should sacrifice ourselves to it? I, for one, would beg to be excused. As things stand, I would sacrifice the Union to Freedom any morning before breakfast."

These sentiments are now being avowed and advocated in every section of the country.

Mr. HAMLIN, the Vice-President of the United States, in a recent speech, avowed the same sentiments.

At the recent Republican State Convention of Massachusetts, which renominated Governor Andrew, these disloyal sentiments were firmly and boldly promulgated. I will read a paragraph from the speech of Governor Boutwell on that occasion, which is a fair sample of all the others:

"He said that a State could only exist by the will of the people within its limits, and that by adopting ordinances of secession the rebellious States have given up their organization under the Union. But the Federal Government had a prior authority over the people and the territory of each State, which can only be restrained by force. Wherever our armies penetrate, that power is asserted, and the people must remain under the guardianship of the Federal authorities until unconditional Union men shall form a new State government, and ask for readmission to the Union. When that time should come, he would make it a condition precedent upon their readmission that they should come in as Free States."

To show how the sentiments of this convention are regarded by its friends, I will read a paragraph from the correspondent of the New-York Tribune in relation to it:

"In their admirable speeches, Wilson and Boutwell, Dana and Elliott, ranged themselves fully alongside of Phillips and Garrison, and the convention, with united and enthusiastic voices, said Amen!"

Who are Phillips and Garrison? The former an avowed disunionist, and the latter always declared that the Constitution was a covenant with hell! and the Massachusetts Republicans have confessedly ranged themselves alongside of them on this subject, and Massachusetts has to-day a more controlling influence over the Administration than all the other Northern States.

General Butler, in a recent speech in Pennsylvania, declared that he was opposed to the reconstruction of the Union as it was, and he was ordered into that State to make these speeches under the full pay of a Major-General. These are only samples of an innumerable number of authoritative expressions, establishing the fact that a wide-spread conspiracy exists against the Union, and that an effort is to be made to use the Republican organization to carry it out. The Republican organization in this State is under the control of the revolutionists. At the recent State Convention held at Syracuse, an independent resolution was introduced, indorsing the emancipation proclamation. The principal speaker declared the object of this resolution in the following language:

"Sir, as a member of the old Republican party, I stand here to say, representing my constituents, that I believe the additional resolution is necessary, in order to avoid the possible construction of the resolutions already adopted, that we are ready to let these men come back into the Union with the institution of slavery guaranteed."

And although it was insisted that there were many members of the party who were not prepared to adopt this new policy, yet the radical majority adopted it.

To show that I do not misstate this abolition programme, I will read a paragraph or two from a speech recently made by MONTGOMERY BLAIR, a member of the Cabinet of Mr. Lincoln:

"But even while we are indulging these well founded hopes that our country is saved from destruction by the rebellion, we are menaced by the ambition of the ultra-abolitionists, which is equally despotic in its tendencies, and which, if successful, could not fail to be alike fatal to Republican institutions."

. . . "The abolition programme assumes, on the contrary, that, because violence has trodden down State governments and State rights, they have ceased to exist; that a loyal people, in whom they still survive and have being, and to whom the United States stands pledged to guarantee them forever, must also have perished; and that a congress of the other States may step in and take absolute authority over the whole region as vacated States and Territories, and legislate for it, founding this new usurpation upon fictions as absurd as those on which the rebellion founds itself."

In the State of Missouri, the radical party have progressed farther than in any other State, and have arrived almost at the brink of a war of extermination against all who do not subscribe to their fanatical heresies.

Frank Blair, who is a Republican member of Congress, and a Brigadier-General in General Grant's army, in a recent speech at St. Louis, felt himself called upon to denounce these radicals as enemies of their country. I will read a paragraph from his speech to show you how Republicans who are not abolitionists are becoming alarmed at the monstrous strides toward usurpation and despotism which the leaders of the party are everywhere making:

"And yet these men, while they openly avow that they are conspiring against this Government, turn round and coolly inform you that they are the only loyal men in the State; and the men who came back grimed all over with powder from our battle-fields, where they have been endeavoring to uphold the banner of our country and maintain the laws and Constitution in the face of the open foe—these men, when they come back here, are denounced by these upstart factionists as Copperheads. (Laughter and applause.) There is not the slightest difference of opinion tolerated by them. If there is a variation of a hair's breadth—if a man attempts to say one single thing that differs with the plan which they have laid down for exterminating all these Southern States—why he is denounced at once; not as men with political differences are usually denounced—they do not call upon the people and let them know that his opinions are dangerous, unsound, and unwise, but they denounce him as a Copperhead, by which they mean he is a man against the Government of the United States, although he may be a man who has exposed his life over and over again in defense of that Government."

You will not fail to observe that the epithet of Copperhead is applied to all, whether Democrats or Republicans, who do not vote the abolition disunion ticket and support to the fullest extent the abolition radical doctrines.

Now I propose to call Thurlow Weed to the stand as a witness. He has had a full opportunity to form a correct judgment. He is undoubtedly as familiar with the political history of the country and with public men as any living man, and I will do him the justice to say that I believe he is at heart a friend to the Union, and desires to see it restored. I will give you his words, deliberately written:

"I desire to make this record: If it comes to be understood that the views and policy of Messrs. Sumner, Greeley, Wendell Phillips, Ward Beecher, etc., etc., obtain in the conduct of the war, IT WILL RESULT IN THE DESTRUCTION OF OUR GOVERNMENT AND UNION, AND A TRIUMPH OF REBELLION AND SLAVERY."

How Mr. Weed can continue even a nominal connection with an organization controlled by men whom he denounces as enemies of the country, I am at loss to comprehend. But we know that he is right in the opinion I have read. You and I and every man knows that ten or twelve States can only be held in subjection by military despotism, and that the exercise of this despotism over the subjugated States, will render it a necessity to exercise military power over the other States. It will require a large standing army and a ruinous system of taxation. The idea of enjoying the institutions of our fathers—the liberty they fought for and bequeathed to us, under a Government holding one-third of its people in military subjugation, is too absurd to require illustration. When this doctrine shall prevail, and subjugation be consummated, we shall have seen the last day of American freedom. But it is sometimes said that Mr. Lincoln has not avowed himself in favor of this scheme, and although all the appliances of party machinery are in favor of it, yet he may be opposed to it. Well, I have no disposition to speak harshly of Mr. Lincoln, but the truth should be told. Mr. Lincoln is a negative man. He is operated upon. He moves by outward pressure, and not by internal power. It was said that he was opposed to the emancipation proclamation; indeed he said so himself, and yet he issued it upon radical pressure. Gov. Andrew declared that the highways of Massachusetts would swarm with soldiers if that was issued, and Greeley declared that 900,000 men would rush to the field with two muskets each, and although they procured the proclamation by these means, not one Greeley man has been known to have even one musket, and not a swarm in a Massachusetts highway has been seen except when the conscripts were going to swear to their physical inability to perform military duty. The President frankly told a committee of Border State men that he could not yield to their wishes lest he should lose the support of the radicals; and I assert that in every single instance where the test has been made, the radical or abolition wing of the party has prevailed with the President.

They demanded the removal of McClellan after the peninsular campaign, and it was done. When the army of the Potomac were driven back upon Washington, defeated and demoralized, and the Capitol was in imminent danger, he was restored, but after he had fought and won a brilliant victory with undisciplined and defeated troops at Antietam and drove the invaders from Maryland, and when in full march and in face of the enemy, upon the demand of the radicals, he was again removed, and what is most significant, the removal was made on the morning after the election in New-York in 1862, when the Democratic party was triumphant

The radicals demanded a sweeping confiscation act, which Senator Collamer, of Vermont, and other Republican Senators declared unconstitutional, and they got it.

They demanded emancipation and they got it.

When citizens from Louisiana asked the privilege of electing officers under the State constitution, the President substantially declined to allow it, intimating that their constitution would be changed or altered.

The citizens of North-Carolina and other seceded States have recently evinced a disposition to return to the Union and enjoy the benefits of their own Constitution, under the protection of the Government. Has there been any disposition on the part of the President to allow them to do so? Not the slightest. I have not the slightest doubt but large numbers of the people of the South would rejoice to assume again their position in the Union. Are they encouraged to do so? So far from it, Mr. Lincoln informs them and the rest of mankind, that his proclamation is "valid or invalid." It certainly does not require the President to issue an official document to make a man of ordinary comprehension understand that the proclamation, like every other instrument, is either valid or invalid. But the people of North-Carolina and other States have become tired of the tyranny exercised over them, and are longing to return to their allegiance to the Union, and with uplifted hands and anxious hearts, they desire to know of Mr. Lincoln whether he regards the proclamation as of any force or power beyond the actual duration of the war. They wish to know how his administration regard it. What they intend to claim. For the people of these States know, as we all do, that courts even are influenced by outside pressure and partisan clamor, and they ask Mr. Lincoln, I repeat, to say what course he intends to pursue, and the only response is: "It is either valid or invalid." What encouragement have the people of the seceded States to attempt even to return to the Union? As matters now stand, there is confiscation to take all their property, emancipation to take their negroes, a test oath to prevent their holding office in the Union, and a treason act to hang them. With these alternatives, I do not think that many will voluntarily return.

These facts furnish conclusive evidence to my mind that Mr. Lincoln either entertains these views of subjugation, or that he is under the control of those who do. There are but two modes of dealing with the fanatics. You must either yield to their views and wishes in every point, or be denounced by them, and as Mr. Lincoln has thus far not dared to disagree with them, and has thus far yielded in the end to all their demands, I conclude that he will continue to do so.

In addition to a subjugation of the Southern States, it is designed, as I have already stated, to consolidate all the power of the loyal States in the General Government, and in this scheme Mr. Lincoln has been a prominent actor. I have been amazed at the strides toward consolidated power made by this administration.

The conscription act authorizes the exercise of power directly from the Government to the individual, overlooking State authority and individual influence. The banking scheme is another and far more dangerous exercise of power. The conscription act, however unwise as a policy, may be technically constitutional under the power "to raise armies," but the banking law has no warrant in the Constitution. Nor is it pretended to be a "war measure," or that any "war necessity" existed for it. On the contrary, it was evidently the intention, under the pressure of the times, to fasten this scheme upon the country as a permanent institution. It is designed to wipe out all State banks and center in Washington all the monied interests of the Nation. The people of the United States struggled long under the leadership of that great and good man, Gen. Jackson, to eradicate the United States Bank, because it was deemed dangerous to our free institutions to give the Government control of the monetary interests of the nation, but this scheme is far worse than that. This destroys State banks, and places all banking operations under control of the officers of the government not only, but subjects the business of the country to the fitful and uncertain policy of those who happen to be in power. Besides, it will depreciate the stocks of the several States which now form the basis of banking, and throw upon the people an additional burden of hundreds of millions. Moreover, it establishes a precedent of the most dangerous character. If these institutions can be thus obliterated by National legislation, every other State institution may be. Our system of internal improvement, our schools, in short, every State interest, may become absorbed in the general Government. Federalism of the olden time would blush at such centralism as is now contended for.

But the crowning act of infamy is the late suspension of the Habeas Corpus. Heretofore we have rested secure under the shield of the Constitution and the protection of the laws. We could gather around our hearthstones in security, and retire at night confident that the unseen but potent shield would guard and protect us and our families and homes from invasion and violence. With a single stroke of the pen this writ of protection to personal liberty has been suspended, and for the time being obliterated. And why has it been done? No man can tell us a reason — no man has attempted to give a reason for it. I have inquired of officials, high and low, why this extraordinary act has been done, and no explanation has been or could be given. There was no reason for it. It was an unnecessary act of despotism. The courts, so far from evincing a disposition to thwart the action of the Government, have been over-cautious, and the State Judges, so far as my observations have extended, have fallen far short of maintaining State authority and individual liberty in a laudable desire not to obstruct the action of the Government in the present crisis.

But we are told that no loyal man will be injured. No loyal man injured! Who is to decide on my loyalty or yours? Why, the officer who makes the arrest, and if, in his opinion, we have interfered in word, act, or deed with the military or naval service, he is authorized to act as judge, jury, and execuioner. It is enough if men may be injured. What is a government worth which does not furnish protection to its people? They have a right to demand a fixed and affirmative rule of protection, and will not tolerate a system which places them at the mercy of petty officials.

But loyal people are injured and outraged every day by the suspension of this writ. Repeated instances have taken place within a few days of arrests of persons as deserters who have either never been enlisted or been honorably discharged, and they have been dragged into a military camp and confined for days and weeks. I know of one instance where a man who had been discharged was arrested three different times by different officers and taken into the army, and each time the officer received his reward. If your own son who had been in the army, and, it may be, passed through all the battles of the Potomac, should, after being honorably discharged, be arrested as a deserter, you would think that he ought to have an opportunity to bring the question before a court. The writ of habeas corpus simply allows a party to go into court and inquire why he is restrained from his liberty. If good cause is shown, he is remanded to custody; if not, he is discharged. A recruiting officer may enlist your boy, fourteen years of age, in violation of an act of Congress, and you have no civil remedy. There is no outrage upon personal liberty which may not be committed. The country literally swarms with officers of the Government, paid by taxation, and outrages are being and will be perpetrated.

I have called your attention, fellow-citizens, to these acts and schemes for the purpose of inducing you to examine the subject, and see where we are drifting. If we change our Union, tell me what kind of a Union we shall have? If we change the essential features of our Government, who can tell what our Government will be? If we override our Constitution, who is wise enough to tell us what will be substituted? If we strike ten from the bright galaxy of stars composing our Union, what power will ever restore them or give them vital action? If we commence to change our institutions, there will be no end but anarchy and despotism.

You have often heard it said, that free government was an experiment. The experiment consists in determining whether a people will permanently abide by the laws of a written constitution. In quiet and prosperous times, we would scarcely need a constitution at all. It is when adversity comes upon us — when temptation allures or necessity exists, that restrictions in organic laws are in danger of being violated. Written constitutions are of no value; they are worse than useless, except they are sufficient to restrain acts which we desire to perform.

The controlling influences of the Republican party have inaugurated all these measures and carried them through, and have besides infused into the whole body of the Republican leaders the poison of Abolitionism. They control the party and the Administration. In every State where the election has resulted in favor of the Republicans, the result has been claimed as a verdict in favor of the subjugation and consolidation policy, and, if this State should so result, it would be used as a tremendous "pressure" upon Mr. Lincoln and his administration in the same direction.

Now, fellow-citizens, I say that any man who is in favor of protracting this war one day beyond the time when the Union may be restored, is an enemy to his country. I have heard it said that the war has brought prosperity with it; but it is not a legitimate and permanent prosperity. We are in a state of unnatural exhilaration which will ultimately prove fatal to every business interest. The drunken man, reeling and staggering through the streets, imagines himself the richest man in the world, but when the artificial stimulus is gone he sinks into degradation and despair, and this is our condition now. By artificial means the business interests of the country are greatly inflated, but it will as certainly become depressed as that effect will follow cause.

A legalized irredeemable paper currency is the greatest curse which can afflict a people. It enriches the few, but it impoverishes the many. It pampers the idle, while it degrades the industrious, and the apparent benefits which it confers are most delusive and deceptive.

I am opposed to this whole scheme, because I know it will result in the destruction of the Union and the overthrow of the Constitution.

Subjugation, in my judgment, is impossible, and its attempt will procrastinate the war interminably. If it is possible, it is not desirable, because it would necessarily inaugurate despotism.

Whilst we will sacrifice all for the Union, we can not afford to continue this war for the visionary purpose of abolishing slavery, or the criminal purpose of experimenting for a change in our institutions.

No man in this administration dares to inform us what the amount of our present indebtedness is. The reports of the Secretary of the Treasury are utterly unsatisfactory on this point. I have endeavored from all the light I can obtain to estimate this indebtedness, and I maintain the opinion that if this war shall close during the present fiscal year, it will not be less than three thousand millions of dollars! I think it will be more, but I am sure it can not be less. I arrive at this conclusion from the known expenses of maintaining men in the field—from the reports of the Treasury Department—the estimates of Mr. Spaulding, Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means of the last House of Representatives, and the authorized statements emenating from Washington from time to time during the war.

Of this sum NewYork would be liable, if the Union was restored with the original wealth of the seceded States, for about one ninth, or more than $330,000,000! the annual interest on which is nearly twenty millions of dollars.

This indebtedness is about one quarter of all the taxable property of the country before the war. The proportion of this debt for the county of Genesee is about four millions of dollars, the interest on which is two hundred and forty thousand dollars, which you will be required to pay annually in some form. In fact, the amount to be paid by New-York will be much larger, because the property in the South has been largely reduced during the war. I have estimated at the lowest figure.

Besides, after the war has ceased, the annual expenses of the Government can not be less than $150,000,000. Assuming that we may realize $50,000,000 by Customs, it will leave two hundred millions to be raised by taxation, and if New-York pays only one ninth, it will add more than ten millions to the annual tax of the State, so that for interest alone upon our portion of the National debt, and of our portion of the annual expenses we shall be obliged to pay more than thirty millions annually, which is equal to our whole State debt, and this sum, remember, is in addition to State, County, and Municipal taxes.

The national debt of England is only about $3,400,000,000, and their taxable property is more than double the amount of ours, while their rate of interest upon the public debt is only three per cent, or half the amount of ours; so that while our debt is nominally $400,000,000 less than theirs, it is practically in its burdens upon the nation much larger.

I do not speak of these things because we should falter in the least to make this sacrifice, and much more, if necessary, to restore the Union, but shall we, ought we to do it, to further the views of the Abolitionists?

The burden of all taxation falls upon labor. The farmer, mechanic, and laboring men and all professional men suffer heavily, while taxation grinds the poor to the earth. What is it that literally enslaves one half the population of Great Britain and compels them to work from early morn till late at night for a scanty subsistence? They have a fine climate, good soil, and excel in manufactures, and they boast of a free constitution. Why, then, this degradation? It is because of the oppressive taxes which fall upon the back of labor. Heretofore, in this country, we have been comparatively free from taxation, and labor has received its reward and had the benefit of it.

If you take from the laboring man a portion of his earnings, which are necessary for the comfortable support of himself and family, you detract from his independence as a man and a citizen, and, therefore, the mock philantropists, in their fruitless efforts to liberate three millions of black slaves, will make ten millions of white slaves, and entail upon posterity degradation, misery, and crime.

I beg that you will bear in mind, also, that by an act of Congress the stocks of the Government are made exempt from all taxation. One quarter of all taxable property is thus withdrawn from liability, and its burden cast upon the remainder. Those who have money can invest it in Government securities, and then escape all the burdens of Government, while the farmer's lands and the home of the mechanic and laboring man must bear the burden which belongs to their more fortunate neighbor.

But I have already detained you too long, and I can not pursue the subject further.

I ask you to determine at the ballot-box, whether your influence shall be thrown in favor of this monstrous scheme of subjugation and consolidation. I put this question not only to Democrats and conservative men, but to those who have heretofore acted with the Republicans; and I am gratified to see many of them here to-night. Are you willing, in behalf of yourselves and your families, to try this new experiment? Are you in favor of carrying on this war for the visionary purpose of abolishing slavery, when its effect will certainly be to destroy the free institutions under which you have enjoyed so many blessings? Shall the influence of New-York be thrown in the scale of subjugation and disunion? Before you deposit your ballot for this destructive policy, consult your wives and children. Tell them that we have so far overcome the military power of the rebel States that an opportunity is afforded, by conciliation with the Union men of the South, to restore the old Union and maintain the Constitution, but that it is now proposed by the radical leaders to go farther, and carry on the war for the ostensible purpose of abolishing slavery, but really with the design of changing the whole character of the Government itself. Tell them that one quarter of all you possess is already mortgaged for the expenses of the war, and that this new scheme will not only encumber your property to a much greater extent, but will be a never-ending burden upon the industry and energies—nay, upon the very bones and muscles of your children!

I feel an abiding confidence that New-York will cast her imperial influence in the right direction. Whatever other States may do, our own Empire State will stand firm and true. Let others yield if they will, but let us stand firm, and we shall have the proud consolation of having rescued our beloved land from its enemies at the South and its enemies at the North.

DEBTS, TAXES,

PERMANENT CONSEQUENCES

FARMERS AND MECHANICS.

The permanent war debt of England is a modern experiment in social philosophy, and has a well known history, which our people may now review with advantage. Temporary war debt, to be paid out of the taxes of the passing year was common to the ancients, but a permanent war debt dates back only to Charles II. Indeed, the war debt, which has become a permanent burden on the productive labor of England, was not acknowledged as such until 1829, and after the whole debt had been incurred, when all attempts at diminishing the debt were abandoned by Parliament, leaving the interest on about four thousand millions of dollars to be paid perpetually by the labor of England to the children of those people who lent the money to the Government instead of paying it in taxes to support the war.

The beginning of the debt was curious. Charles had borrowed six and a half millions of dollars from the goldsmiths, (who were the bankers of the rich people), and given them an order on the exchequer for the return of the loan when the taxes of the year should be collected. But, when the time came for payment, the doors of the exchequer were shut against the goldsmiths. The owners of the money were ruined. London was filled with dismay. Bitter and loud reproaches fell on the king. He was assailed from the pulpits. Sermons were preached from the text, "Put not your trust in princes." Indications of violence were common in the streets.

To quiet this clamor, it was arranged that annual interest should be paid out of the revenues of each year to the owners of this money. Thus, the burden of the passing year was thrown on the earnings of following years. William and Mary, finding this precedent, followed it, and borrowed on terminable bonds, resembling our "five twenties," always promising and endeavoring to pay after the war. With various attempts to pay in time of peace, but steadily increasing the debt in time of war, the amount had reached six hundred and sixty-five milllons of dollars, in 1765.

The question of paying this debt was anxiously discussed; projects to this end were presented in Parliament; but, the discussion was turned aside by the introduction of a new financial scheme which turned the heads of men in power, and carried away the popular judgment. The fallacy was this: It was asserted that a small sum of money kept at compound interest, in the hands of commissioners, would ultimately pay the largest possible amount of public debt. The Reverend Dr. Price the reputed father of this fallacy, was as sincerely deluded as other reformers have been. He confidently showed that one penny, compounded from the birth of Christ, would produce globes of gold at the present day. The government believed it had found the lamp of Aladdin and applied it to finance. Accordingly the sum of only a few millions of dollars was borrowed and committed to a board of trusty men as a sinking fund, which was sure to redeem England out of any war debt which might be incurred.

From that time the English people cherished the war temper without compunction or restraint. No fear of pecuniary consequences tempered the taste for war. The poets and the pulpits called for blood. The exchequer called for loans, and got them, while it was thought quite impertinent to tax present wealth for the payment of war expenses, which the sinking fund was sure to pay.

Time, and two wars with America and perpetual war with France, brought England to Waterloo, and to four thousand millions of war debt. Then Professor Hamilton proved to the satisfaction of all that, the sinking fund was a mere fallacy, and that nothing but increased taxes or diminished expenses could extinguish one penny of the debt. The history of the fallacy is remarkable. At first, there were only a few millions set apart to pay in future all possible war debt. As the wars went on and the debt rolled up, Dr. Price seems to have had some misgiving of this theory, and strenuously insisted on borrowing more money to increase the sinking fund. So that, when the fallacy was exploded and the fund abolished, it was found that the cost of making these loans and managing the fund had wasted some three millions of dollars. How such a gross fallacy should have deluded a whole nation is now the special wonder of English statesmen. But, convenient

Faithful to the old idea of paying a war debt in time of peace, the Parliament resolved, in 1819, to set apart twenty-five millions of dollars in each year for this purpose. This would have extinguished the debt in 160 years. But the pressure was too great; and after a few years, the resolve to pay was abandoned, and never renewed. In 1829 the holders of these five-twenties were invited to bring in their bonds and exchange them for permanent bonds.

No one now can doubt that, the popular fallacy of the sinking fund made war the popular amusement of Englishmen during forty years. This amusement gave offices to the sons of unoccupied families and to the younger sons of the nobility. Of course, the clergy, dependent on these families, prayed earnestly for the war. Unlike feudal incomes, which bound only the products of a single tenant, this permanent debt bound the whole productive labor of all the industrial classes, and bound them for all time: while it gave to the unoccupied owners of the bonds a complete and perpetual security for a fixed income, however it might become harder for the laborers to earn that income. Owners of these bonds are loud in their praises of a national war debt; but the more prudent of them would dislike to see the debt increased.

But, in consequence of this perpetual burden on the labor of England one-eighth of the people of England is in the poor house, and a large part of another eighth has escaped from want to the Colonies.

By way of apology for William and Mary, it is said that it was vital to the people of England that a Dutchman should rule instead of a Scotchman. So when the war of our revolution was commenced, it was said to be vital to the people of England that an English governor should rule here rather than Washington. And when the war with France was begun in 1793, it was deemed of the greatest importance to the people of England that a Bourbon rather than a Bonaparte should rule France. Washington did rule in this country, and a Bonaparte does rule in France. Had these questions been decided the other way, would the condition of any laborer in the mines, the factories or the fields of England have been better than it now is? No one thinks it would have been better. But, had the wars with America and France been omitted, the laborers would have been spared the burdens of permanent debt

But, could these wars have been avoided? Let us see. The money borrowed for these wars was already laid up by Englishmen. It could have been taken, in the form of tax, and applied to the support of the wars, instead of being taken as loans on exchequer bonds bearing interest. Now, suppose the government had called together the owners of this money and asked them the question—shall these wars be made, and your money be taken to foot the bills, and you go to work again to lay up new estates If not then the wars ought not to have been commenced. For, will any one pretend that the classes of mere labor are to be benefitted by a war, which kills off the able bodied of their members, fills the ranks of their survivors with cripples, and the land with widows and orphans; and, then, when a new race of vigorous laborers has been produced, lays on these a perpetual burden which sends one-eighth of their whole number to the poor house. In the long peace, which followed Waterloo, while industrial arts have flourished in England more than in any other country or age, yet, in consequence of the war debt, Carlisle says of the laboring class, "Two millions are out of the boat, and five millions are hanging over the side."

The war debt of England was one hundred and fifty years accumulating, and was incurred under false expectations about the sinking fund. The best statesmen of England came with unaffected sorrow, to the conclusion that the debt could never be paid. While dwelling sadly on this subject, after Waterloo, the greatest of English statesman said in Parliament—"War is a game at which few would play if the people were wise." But, had he made this remark at the opening of the American Revolution or of the war with Napoleon, he would probably have been charged with treason

UNTIL the outbreak of the present war the United States enjoyed among nations the deserved reputation of being the only government which had ever paid off its debt in full, principal and interest, unaided by the tax-gatherer. The freedom of its industrial population and the abundance of its untaxed lands had called hither the enterprising of all nations, and its wealth and population grew on an unprecedented scale. The progress of the whole country may be briefly represented in the following figures from official sources:

Decades.	Immigration.	Population.	Manufactures.	Exports.	Valuation.
1800.....	——	5,303,937.....	——	$293,634,645.....	$479,246,636
1810.....	——	7,239,814.....	$145,385,906.....	383,401,077.....	——
1820.....	——	9,638,191.....	62,766,385.....	462,701,288.....	613,180,107
1830.....	151,634.....	12,066,020.....	111,645,466.....	536,104,918.....	——
1840.....	272,716.....	17,069,453.....	483,278,215.....	892,889,909.....	——
1850.....	1,479,478.....	23,191,876.....	1,055,595,899.....	1,131,458,801.....	7,115,790,180
1860.....	3,075,900.....	31,443,790.....	1,900,000,000.....	2,766,799,881.....	17,008,417,635

The column of immigration gives the whole number that arrived in each decade; and most, if not all of them, settled at the North and West. The population column is composed of the census returns each ten years. The manufactures are the official returns of the annual production at each period. The exports are not the annual exports, but the whole quantity exported for each period of ten years. The valuations are the official returns. The first, for purposes of taxation, was made in 1798, and the second, for the same purpose, in 1815. Those for 1850 and 1860 are the census returns. This return for 1860 indicates a very large increase in value, but it can not all be taken as an accumulation of wealth, since a very large portion consists of land settled at $1 a $1 25 per acre, and valued subsequently at much higher rates according to production. The large production in agriculture, manufactures, mining, etc., is always nearly all consumed in the year. That portion which is saved and invested in buildings, roads, ships, banks, companies, accumulated stocks of goods, coin, etc., as instruments of production and trade, bear but a small proportion to the whole annual production. The State and Federal expenses have been very small, comparatively, and the Government has not extracted much from the producers to support large armies, civil officers, government stockholders, and other non-producers, as has been the case in other countries. Nearly the whole of the earnings of the people had remained for their own enjoyment, and to accumulate in a manner to employ more extended industry, and therefore to swell the annual production. The great wealth of the country has thus been generally distributed among the people. It has long been a source of complaint with the agricultural sections, that the operation of the customs revenue has been to draw wealth from the producers of the national exports and put it into the pockets of the manufacturers. When the protective system was inaugurated at the peace of 1815, it was earnestly opposed on the ground that it would impoverish the agricultural States to enrich the manufacturing States, and this opposition, growing with the development of the protective system, led to the Compromise of 1831. That compromise was to operate by biennial reduction of the duties to 1841, when the rate was to be 20 per cent., not to be exceeded thereafter. As soon as that point was reached, the tariff was restored, against the protest of Mr. Calhoun, who said: "I shall not dwell on the fact that it openly violates the compromise act, and the pledges given by its author and by Governor Davis, of Massachusetts, that if the South would adhere to the compromise while it was operating favorably for the manufacturers, they would stand by it when it came to operate favorably for the South. I dwell not on those double breaches of plighted faith, although they are of a serious character, and likely to exercise a very pernicious influence over our future legislation, by preventing amicable adjustments of questions that may hereafter threaten the peace of the country."

The revenue of the Federal Government, since its organization, may be said to have been derived entirely from the customs duties. These have, ordinarily, been equal to the expenditure. In the war of 1812 an attempt was made to eke out the revenues by means of internal taxes, with no great success, however. The lands have given a certain amount of revenue, but it has been estimated that cost and expense of management have never been reimbursed: hence that the Government proper has received no aid from that source. The whole revenue and expenditure from March 4, 1789, to July 1, 1861, have been as follows: —

Customs revenue		$1,575,152,579 92
Land sales	$175,817,961 00
Taxes and miscellaneous	95,305,322 56	271,123,283 56
Total ordinary revenue		$1,846,275,863 48
Total ordinary expenditure		1,453,790,786 00
Total excess revenue		$392,485,077 48
Received for loans	$462,935,644 64
Paid " "	781,886,375 00
Excess paid		$318,950,730 36

The excess of loans paid includes the Revolutionary debt; the $60,000,000, principal and interest, paid for Louisiana and Florida; also the sums paid Mexico and Texas. It results that the customs revenues have paid the whole expense of the Government proper. When financial revulsions have overtaken the country, causing the revenues to decline, loans have been made which the swelling revenues consequent upon returning prosperity have discharged.

Those customs revenues have been derived entirely from a tax upon imports, or the goods that have come back into the country as the proceeds of produce sold. Without the produce, it is very clear, there could have been no imports, and, as a consequence, no customs duties. If, then, we turn to the Treasury tables to ascertain the extent of the exports, we shall have as follows: —

Net importations of goods, 1790 to 1860	$7,104,890,932
Domestic produce exported	6,466,900,519
Excess imports	$637,990,413

This excess of imports consists of proceeds of stocks, State and corporate, sold in Europe; earnings of American vessels abroad; and other items. It will be observed that the whole amount received from customs is 22 per cent. of the whole amount of imports. Those imported goods went to the consumers charged with that tax. Inasmuch as they were the producers of the merchandise exported to pay for the goods, the whole amount of the customs was in fact paid by them. If now we look into the character of the exports, we find them to have been as follows since 1820, when the regular official tables commenced: —

Total value domestic exports, 1820 to 1860		$4,856,863,368
Value of Cotton	$2,574,834,491
" Tobacco	455,181,067
" Rice	87,854,511
" Naval stores	76,181,210
" Food, etc	1,006,951,235
" Cotton and other manufactures	655,861,254
		4,856,863,368
Net import of goods		5,394,671,668
Excess imports		$537,808,300

This excess was met, as previously stated, by an excess of $347,419,646 in the exports of specie over the imports; by the exports of stocks; earnings of shipping, etc. Of the exports of food, a considerable portion was of Southern origin; and, of the cotton manufactures exported, two thirds of the value is due to the raw material. It results, then, that the origin of the exports has been as follows: —

Southern States	74 per cent.	$3,581,291,381
Northern States	26 per cent.	1,275,571,987

Thus the productions of the Southern States, although interchanged for Northern productions, has paid a large portion. The net imports and customs duties from 1820 to 1860 were as follows:

Net imports of goods		$5,394,671,668
Net customs duties	22.8 per cent.	1,231,456,168
Net customs paid by Southern products	$911,277,565
" " " Northern "	320,178,603
		$1,231,456,168

Thus the average expenditure of the Federal Government during the forty years embraced in this last table, has been $30,780,000, of which only $7,800,000 has been supplied by Northern productions.

Under this system of small Government expenses and absence of internal taxes, the whole country flourished, even although the accumulation of wealth in the manufacturing States was much more rapid than in the agricultural States. A great and disastrous change has taken place, however, with the outbreak of the present war. From a fertile country, filled with peaceful arts, an industrial population of saving habits and economical administration of public affairs, we became an immense battle-field, supplied with a hand so lavish that four years of strife have swallowed up the wealth earned in the peaceful pursuits of the nation's lifetime.

The expenditures and debt of the government for several years have been as follows, being four years of peace, and four years of war.

	Expense.	Debt at close.
1858.	$73,943,894	$44,910,777
1859.	68,965,070	58,754,699
1860.	63,154,733	64,769,703
1861.	66,691,329	92,989,709
1862.	474,644,778	514,211,372
1863.	714,709,995	1,098,793,181
1864.	849,681,207	1,733,810,119

The total for four years of peace was $272,755,026, and the four years of war $3,089,035,880. The expenditure for the three months ending March 31, 1864, were $287,016,014 or 15,000,000 more than for the whole four years ending with 1861. The expenses for the year 1865 are partly estimated on official data, thus the appropriations for the year are $1,300,000,000, but the next session of Congress will be called upon for deficiency bills, and the first quarter of the year already elapsed shows a vote of expenditure larger than the estimate. The estimates of the debt are on the same data, thus the official figure for July 1 was $1,733,810,119 and for Sept. 30, being the end of the first quarter of the fiscal year 1865, it was 2,026,949,092, an increase of $293,138,973 for the quarter, which would give for the year $1,200,000,000, making the debt next July 2,933,000,000. Something must be allowed however for growing disability to borrow. The loans hitherto have been a reflex of paper paid out. In order to have a clear understanding of the debt, we give the official statements at six periods, the beginning of the war, the end of each fiscal year, and the end of the first quarter Sept., 1864, of the fiscal year 1865

This table shows all the kinds of paper that have been issued by the Treasury department, and generally in the order of their issue. In the first portion of the table it will be observed that the 6 per cent. stock of 1861 being the fifth line of figures, has rapidly increased, while the 7 3-10 in the next line have decreased. This is caused by the conversion of the latter into the former stock. The 5-20's reached their limit under the old law 1st Feb., but under the law of June, 1864, the Secretary can issue 400,000,000 of those stocks, and 40,000,000, have been issued.

There is then 564,585,874 of paper interest securities that are of short dates, and constantly maturing, of these 223,000,000 are legal tender, and make with paper money 722,000,000 of paper currency, in addition to which is an issue of $55,000,000 National Bank notes. The table itself shows the course of the issues, and how much legal tender has been pressed in the last quarter. We have now to bear in mind that these loans are not the whole debt; they are simply that portion which has been audited and actually paid in paper. There are about $300,000,000 of debts due and unsettled, being for navy and other contracts, army pay, &c. But these debts do not represent the whole expense. They do not embrace that portion raised by taxes. The whole will stand nearly as follows for three years:—

Debt outstanding,			$2,026,949,092
Unpaid debt,			300,000,000
	Gold,	Paper,
Customs,	$190,669,057,	$267,181,201
Lands		756,101
Internal taxes,		190,090,000
Total taxes,			$458,027,302
Total expenses three years,			$2,784,976,394

It will be observed that the amount of gold collected for customs is applicable only to the interest on the public debt, which is paid in gold. It may therefore be supposed that as the gold is paid out by the government that it should not be charged in expenses at the paper value. This would be a mistake, since the gold customs are paid by the importers, who buy the gold in the market for paper, and add the amount in paper to the goods sold, hence the tax falls upon the people at its paper value. The mode in which this operates may be seen in any article, say 11-4 bed-blankets which weigh six lbs. per pair, the duties in gold are 40 per cent. and 24 cts. per lb.

These cost 10s. sterling		$2 42
40 per cent. is	97
24 cents lb.	144
Duties	241
Gold premium	150 360	6 01
Gold prem. on exchange		3 63
Total cost of blankets		$12 06

Thus, when gold, as in the summer, was at 250, the duty paid by the consumer was 250 per cent. on those articles, and 150 more for exchange, or thus, the tax received by the treasury was $2.41, and the tax paid by the consumer, in consequence of the depreciated currency, was $7.23 each pair of blankets.

The amount of gold collected in three years has been, it appears, $190,669,057, which, at the average price of gold, has risen to $267,181,201 in paper value, which, with the land revenues and the proceeds of the internal taxes amount to $458,027,302, and the whole reaches the immense

Amount of expenses	$2,784,976,394
Expenses 72 years, 1789 to 1861	1,431,790,786
Excess of present war expenses	$1,331,185,608

It will be necessary to deduct from this amount the sum that the ordinary expenses of the government would have reached in three years had there been no war. This would have been $200,000,000. Hence the war in three years has cost the Federal Government $1,131,185,608, more than the whole expenses of the government for 72 years previous, including the war of 1812, the Florida war, the Mexican war and indemnities, the purchase of Louisiana and Florida, and the annexation of Texas.

This is, however, very far from being the whole of the expense. Tthere was advanced by the people and never charged upon the government, nearly $80,000,000 in the first year of the war to fit out and forward volunteers.

In addition to that, towns, counties, and states have largely increased their expenses, and created debts for the objects of the war and for the support of the families of volunteers. But the most onerous and direct burden has been the money paid for commutation and substitutes. In order to convey some idea of the magnitude of this operation, we may recur to the official calls for troops, under each date as follows: —

	Total calls, men		3,304,743

There were a number of calls for troops in addition to these for temporary purposes, and which are not included in the table. It may be remarked that the call, in February, 1864, for 500,000 men, included what had not been obtained under the call of the previous October, and which amounted to 150,000 men, leaving the net aggregate call 3,154,743 men.

These calls, it will be observed, have borne with greater pressure upon the people each succeeding year, and within the last twelve months the number obtained has been 1,200,000 men. This solemn fact has made but light impression upon the public mind; but its startling truth was made clearly manifest in the United States Senate, in the debate of June 14, 1864. It will be observed in the above table that from Oct. 14, 1863, to the date of the debate, the calls had been for 850,000 men. On that day Mr. Wilson, chairman of the Military Committee, in reply to Mr. Conness, of California, said: —

"Does the Senator know that we have raised or re-enlisted since the 17th day of October last six hundred thousand men, not to count black men, and that within the last year we have put in the field seven hundred thousand men: that we have made an exertion such as few nations ever made, and few nations can make; that we have spent $125,000,000 in bounties; that we have drafted; that we have used the whole power and influence of the government to increase our military forces? Sir, we have put forth an effort that excites the astonishment and commands the admiration of the world; yet the Senator from California, whose constituents are not drafted nor called upon, rises to-day and rebukes the administration, rebukes us, and talks glibly of the timid counsels of men who are quite as hopeful, determined and brave as himself. Mr. President, I do not question the devotion or the courage of the men of California. They have proved their devotion to the country on more than one occasion. But, sir, that Senator should remember that some of us live in communities where the calls are over and over again, where sons, brothers, relatives, friends, neighbors, all have been summoned to the field of duty, and have responded to these calls. While we, their representatives, are ready to vote men and to vote money, we want to make these sacrifices of men and of blood bear as lightly as possible upon our people. Humanity and justice alike demand it. Gen. Grant is in front of Richmond. This rebellion is 'coiled,' to use the language of Gen. Hooker, at Richmond, and within ten miles of that capital of treason. We have sent forty-eight thousand men to reinforce Gen. Grant since the commencement of the march (six weeks) toward the rebel capital. Within thirty days we have gathered up over the country these reinforcements, two thousand of whom are the one hundred days' men raised in the State of Ohio."

Mr. Wade. Over two thousand have gone.

Mr. Wilson. Two thousand of them are already there, and others are hastening to that field of duty. The government is casting a drag-net over the country, gathering up all the soldiers it can, and hurrying them forward to the support of Gen. Grant. If we had fifty thousand, or one hundred thousand fresh men to send to his support to-day, this rebellion would, I believe, go down within sixty days to rise not again.

Mr. Conness. I ask the Senator why we have not got them?

Mr. Wilson. We have raised men during the past eight months as rapidly as we could do it, and we have put them into the field. Since the 17th day of October, we have put seven hundred thousand men in the field, and it is an unparalleled exertion of the power and the patriotism of the people.

Since these great exertions thus described by Mr. Wilson, 500,000 more men, instead of the 50 or 100 thousand that Mr. Wilson believed would finish the rebellion in sixty days, have been raised. Grant's army has swallowed them nearly all, and the reader knows with what result. Under these repeated calls, which Mr. Wilson shows press so heavily upon the people, the price of substitutes has risen from $500 to $1000 per man. The million of men obtained have cost an average of $600 each, giving the astounding sum of $600,000,000, that has been raised by individuals, towns, and counties. The counties of New York have contracted bounty debts to the amount of $60,000,000, and other States have been heavily charged. The whole of the bounty and substitute money is estimated at $750,000,000, which sum must be added to the war expenses. There are also $100,000,000 extra expenses that have been paid by states, towns, etc. The whole expense is then approximated thus:

Federal expenses	$2,784,976,394
County bounties, &c.	750,000,000
State war expenses	100,000,000
Total, 3 years	$3,634,976,394

We now come to the fact that the armies are no farther advanced than they were last year, before the draft of this 1,000,000 of men and the expenditure of the following money within the year:

Increase Federal debt	$758,219,572
Customs	170,000,000
Internal taxes	100,000,000
Total Federal expenses	$1,028,219,572
Bounties, 1,000,000 men	500,000,000
Town, county, & state expenses	150,000,000
Total, one year	$1,678,219,572

There is now, apparently, no alternative but to proceed with the drafts, and there will be required as many men for the coming year as for the last, but in consequence of the growing exhaustion which Senator Wilson pointed out, the price of men rises, and a like number of men will cost a thousand millions, to be taxed upon counties, while the federal expenses will be $1,050,000,000.

There is no occupant of land but feels the pressure of the bounty tax, it presses directly upon the land, while it is very clear that there is no prospect of its cessation.

It is very apparent from what has been here shown that the annual expense of the government will henceforth, with the continuance of the war, be a light portion of the annual burden compared with that caused by drafts.

It is the avowed intention of the present administration to continue the war for other purposes than the restoration of the Union. It will, therefore, continue one year, at least; and, if the administration is reëlected, it will not end short of three more years. The expenses will increase because of the double influence of rising prices and scarcity of men. But we will estimate the expense at the same as the last three years, as follows: —

	Call for men.	Money.
1862–3–4	3,304,743	$3,634,976,394
1865–5–7	3,000,000	4,000,000,000
	6,304,743	$7,634,976,394

Total for six years.

If we suppose that the war may terminate in another year when 1,000,000 more men shall have been called out, the situation must then be $1,000,000,000 of debt, in the shape of county bonds, to pay for the troops. Every individual knows how many men his county has been compelled to furnish in the last year to make up the million of men. A like number must be again furnished, and for each man the county must run in debt $1,000. A county of which is required 50 men must issue $50,000 bonds, in addition to those now out, if the men can be got at that price, which is very doubtful. The whole number of men of the military age, when the war began, was 5,000,000; of those drafted there were 30 per cent. unfit for service. Hence there were only 3,500,000 able-bodied men. Now if all the men in the above calls had been fresh men the whole strength of our country would have been exhausted. They were, however, large reënlistments at higher rates. To get another million the price must be much higher.

In addition to the county bounty debts the federal debt will be, as we have seen, fully $3,000,000,000 bearing interest $180,000,000 per annum, in gold. This will be the case, because the whole of the debt will be funded in gold interest stock as it falls due, and it will all be due in two years.

The sinking fund and expenses of the government will be annually $370,000,000 including interest. The town, city, county, and state expenses will be added, thus:

Federal expenses	$370,000,000
County bounty debt interest	60,000,000
City, town, and state expenses	100,000,000
Annual expense	$530,000,000

This immense burden must be imposed mostly upon the farming interests. It must be paid out of the annual productions of industry. This is a fact which must be steadily borne in mind. A great parade is sometimes made of the assessed or supposed value of property as compared with the debt, to show how small is the latter as compared with the supposed property. The assessed value of property in the northern states is given, as follows: —

Population	18,808,102
Real estate	$9,674,947,031
Personal	1,955,820,248
Total	$11,630,757,279
United States debt	$2,326,949,092
State & bounty debt	750,000,000 — $3,076,949,092

Thus the debt is but one third of the property, and therefore alleged to be small. That is a very fallacious mode of estimate. The valuation for all purposes of taxation is entirely nominal, and can in no wise be applicable to the payment of debt. The amount is the accumulated savings of the people for 200 years since the country was settled. It is only the annual earnings of the property, real and personal, that can be applied to the purposes of taxation and payment of debt. Thus the land of Ohio is valued at $687,518,121, but the same land has been there since the flood. It had no value whatever until the hand of man began to draw forth its annual fruits, and the assessed value is in proportion to that yield. A farmer who took 100 acres of wild land, after a few years made it yield a handsome annual living for himself and family. The State then valued land at, say $5,000, and taxed it, — the tax to be paid out of the products. The cattle, furniture, implements, &c., are personal property, the savings of many years, and are necessary aids to production. It is obvious at once that the surplus product of the farm is that which remains after the consumption of the producer and his stock is deducted. The proceeds of that surplus pay store and medical bills, &c., and taxes. Now, it is evident, that if the latter are more than the surplus products the producer must consume less, scrimp his family, or refuse to pay. There can be no application of the farm and personal property to the public debt, because it falls alike upon the whole nation, and a nation cannot be sold out. The federal government, for instance, holds many millions of property, but neither the Capitol nor the White House could well be sold for the benefit of creditors.

The annual earnings of manufacturing establishments may be estimated from the data furnished by the census, page 190 : —

Annual production of 110,000 factories and shops,		$1,754,650,000
Cost of labor, 1,001,460 males and 273,530 females	$600,000,000
" " Raw material,	939,335,000	— 1,539,335,000
Net amount of production,		$215,315,000
Capital employed by 110,000 concerns,		$949,000,000

This net amount supports the families of the manufacturers, keeps good the capital, wear and tear of machines, &c., and leaves a profit, or surplus, which is employed in new machines, stock, or other investments, and from which alone the tax can be paid. If the amount of tax is sufficient to absorb all the surplus, the manufacturing capital would soon be dried up, and the national wealth consumed. It is very evident that this net surplus averaging $1,900 per annum, is the fund from which the public debt is to be paid. The buildings, tools, machines, &c., which constitute the capital of $949,000,000, that is enumerated as personal property, can in no wise be applicable to the public debt.

Again, there is about 500 millions of railroad stock, called personal property. Of what value would that be if the railroads are worked at a loss? Clearly, the only way in which that stock can aid the government is by a portion of the dividends. There are $500,000,000 of railroad bonds, which are taxed, a portion of the interest paid on them, but their value consists only in the interest paid.

The $530,000,000 per annum which, as given above, is to be raised to meet the present public obligations, is to be taken from the annual production of industry, — with this proviso, that the $2,000,000,000 which has been taken from other employments, where it earned an annual income, and which has been placed in government bonds, is exempt from taxation; as a consequence, the burden upon capital employed in other industries must be doubled.

To illustrate. Suppose two factories of 00,000 capital each were earning $16,000 r annum each, each being taxed 3 per nt. on its production, would pay $5,000 x to government. If one of them with- aws his capital, sells his stock, discharges s hands, and invests the capital in Fede- l stocks, he will be free from local tax; then e government, to raise the same amount of oney, must tax the other factory double.

The mode of raising the tax now is by in- rect taxes, or taxes on goods to be consumed. is is a very delusive plan, and has by no eans answered the expectations of the pro- sers. The mass of people, or those who ve a stake in the community, suppose that ey avoid the taxes by refusing to purchase e taxed articles. This is fallacious reason- g. Thus, we find that the interest on the blic debt is $72,000,000 in gold, which is ised by gold-taxes on imported articles. is carries the prices of those articles very gh, and they are not consumed. The amount tax raised will then fall to, say, $40,- 00,000. What then happens? Either the bt will not be paid, or a more efficient tax ust be laid to reach those who have vaded the indirect tax. The weight of the bt cannot be escaped from. There are no eans of paying but by taxes. If one tax not paid, another must be tried. There e many, however, who are indifferent to the owth of the debt, because they think the xes can be avoided. This is not the case; ot only must the county-taxes, but the fed- al debts be paid by land.

Again, suppose the land-owners generally efuse to buy taxed manufactures. The man- facturers will stop works, will discharge hands, nd stop buying wool or other material. The nternal taxes will fail to give revenue, and he loan will come back upon the farmer, who as failed to sell his wool, for a direct tax.

There is no escaping the inevitable result hat the whole industry of all the people will e taxed to its utmost to meet these terrible ills that are now rolling up. What this na- ion is now going through, England has gone hrough. She expended, in fruitless wars, noney, which left her, on the 11th March, 863, with a debt as follows: —

BRITISH DEBT.

Amount,	£779,802,139	— $3,999,010,695
Annual int't,	26,320,444	131,602,220

The average rate upon this debt is 3¼ per cent. This burden has borne very heavily upon the English people. During its operation, in the last fifty years, it has constantly drawn money from the working many and given it the few. The result has been to make workers very poor and capitalists very rich, although those capitalists have been required to pay taxes. The present United States debt, as compared with the English, is as follows: —

United States Debt.		British Debt.
Federal debt,	$2,026,949,092
State "	135,486,047
City "	100,000,000
County "	500,000,000
Total	$2,762,435,139	£3,999,010,695
Interest	165,746,107	131,602,220

Thus, the existing debt is $34,000,000 annually more than the British debt. By the end of another year, it will be $150,000,000 per annum more. Now, under this burden, the British Government reduced its taxes to a system. It removed all exemptions; every man is taxed alike before the law. And to reach equality as nearly as possible, it levies an income-tax, the return of which shows the amount of annual income in the nation. This, in pounds and dollars was as follows, for the past year: —

The tax at present, 9d. in the pound or 3¾ per cent., is laid upon the gross income, so that the tax becomes an integral part of the annual expenses of each individual. The amount of income under each general head is as follows: —

AMOUNT OF INCOME.
Lands, manors, &c.	£55,005,120	$275,025,600
House property	57,761,745	288,808,725
Mines and iron works	5,515,699	27,578,495
Railway, canal, gas, &c.	19,908,473	99,542,365
Farms	16,554,930	82,772,650
Trades, professions, &c.	87,555,625	437,777,125
Dividends, funds	29,083,200	125,416,000
Public companies	6,134,256	30,671,280
Salaries, &c.	20,071,240	100,356,200
Quarries, fines, pensions, &c.	714,649	3,573,245
	£298,304,937	$1,471,521,685
Tax	11,048,148	55,240,740

Under the head of lands, manors, &c., figure the sums derived by owners of land from rent; under the head "farms," is the income derived from the land of the occupiers who pay rent. The total is the amount of gross income of the whole nation. From this income is to be deducted the support of the owners, and the net is the surplus. The annual increase of the income is indicated by the increase of the tax. If the same amount of tax gives an increase next year, that increase will be 3¼ per cent. of the actual increase of annual savings. On this process it has been computed that the average annual surplus in Great Britain is £120,000,000, or $600,000,000. This is the sum from which, under the present burden of taxation, improvements may be carried on, railroads, houses, and ships built, banks, companies, and stores, and other forms of capital, be created.

Now, it will be borne in mind, that England is a rich nation; and yet her estimated net-income is barely more than, as we have seen above, the American people will be required to pay annually for interest, without discharging the principal.

It is well known that the English Government honestly intended to pay the war debt; and a law for that purpose was passed in 1819, which, if it had been enforced, would, by this time, have extinguished about one-fourth of the whole. But the yearly cost of the peace establishment had been so enormously increased that this, added to the interest on the war-debt, was all that the nation could endure without endangering revolution and repudiation. Even this pressure sends one-eighth of the people to the poor-house; and if England had not the Colonies as well as the poor-house she would want more soldiers at hand to prevent revolution.

England is the richest nation on earth, and more able than any other to pay the principal of a war debt. Wealth, available for the payment of such debt, must be measured by money incomes, and by resources which labor may convert into money after paying the laborers and the interest of the capital employed. Among these resources gold is king, and iron is queen; and incomes in gold and silver are their beautiful children.

The coal raised from the English mines last year was eighty millions of tons. The iron made and sent out of England was about four millions of tons.

Taking these as rough measures of ability to pay, and comparing them with the ability of the United States to pay a war-debt, we find their power to be about seven times as great as our own. We raised about eleven millions of tons of coal in the last year — about one-seventh of the quantity raised by England. The iron products were not very far from the same proportion. But it may be thought that the taxable incomes would be a more just measure of comparative ability to pay. N if incomes may be measured by the amc they yield in taxes, we are able to give exact figures. The revenue derived from income tax last year was $11,241,101, w that of England amounted to $53,240,00

Here we find that the proportion does differ essentially from the proportion of t coal to ours. Should it be said that our comes have not yet learned to pay taxe may be replied that, under present arra ments, our incomes are likely to pay rather than more in the future. Those have seen the figures, and made the estima declare that England taxes five times as m wealth as the United States, and the inc tax confirms it. The indications from c iron and incomes look in that direction. I however that may be, it will not be q tioned that the ability of England to pay war debt is much (if not many times) gre than ours. She cannot pay hers; can we ours? This is the question.

When the English statesmen found that principal of their war debt could not be p they next inquired how they could pro for prompt payment of the interest.

1. They did all in their power to red the interest to the lowest possible rate. S part of the debt was contracted at high r of interest. But by good management, thro a series of years, they brought it down to th and one-half per cent., which is the pres rate. With a long peace, great commer prosperity, and a vast increase of the g production, they may be able to reduce rate still lower. But, meanwhile, the inte was accruing.

2. The English statesmen employed th ingenuity in devising a system of taxes wh could be endured, and yet be sufficient. T stern resolve to pay promptly inspired people to endure bravely. The return peace made personal abstinence hopeful welcome. But the experiment was new; while war raged, they had continued to l row: now they saw that borrowing must ce when the hope of payment was gone; they knew not, even then, on whom the pr sure of the tax for interest must ultimat fall. The simple doctrines, since develo by J. S. Mill, were vaguely perceived. T thought that taxing beer at the brewery tobacco at the warehouse laid the burden the brewer and the merchant, but Mill ught them that the laborer must ultimately l the whole pressure on his pipe and cup, cause the beer and the tobacco would cease be produced unless the capitalist was first id his interest and profit, and the manufacrer his share; while every tax must be ded to the commodity and collected from e consumer, taking from the wages every ch addition; otherwise the capital would go other occupations or other countries.

Then it was obvious that the day-laborer eded as much beer and tobacco as the mer-ant or the landlord; but while the latter uld bear this burden without stinting his ead or his shoes the day-laborer could not.
the day-laborer was pinched experimentally all points until sickness completed his disırangement, and he sought refuge in the or-house or got a free ticket of leave to the olonies. The poor house and the Colonies re not taxed.

To mitigate the pressure on the class of bor the corn-laws were repealed, so that la-rers might have a chance for cheaper food.
hen the income tax was imposed to give me relief to labor. But, "once a pauper ways a pauper." The poor house flourished.
eliefs have been and still are tried, but yet e pauper class outgrows all others. It in-udes one-eighth of the whole people.

The laborer is not taxed on his wages, but e is taxed on everything bought with his ages; and, on most articles, he pays the me tax as the landlord or the merchant.

Look at it in another light, and the result even worse. All the wealth produced in e year to pay this interest is produced by anual labor, which is applied, in wages, to e machinery, raw material and provisions reviously laid up by the capitalist. Capital n float to any country where it will give the st return to the owner. The average profit f capital in the whole world must be gained England, or the capital will migrate. Not the laborer; he is bound by habit, family, id language; and the larger his class, the maller his pay. The whole product of labor pplied to capital goes first to remunerate the apitalist: after him comes the tax-gatherer;
r his share is taken out of what would otherise go to the laborers, and what remains is ages. The capitalist may advance the tax, ut to be returned to him by the merchant, ho collects it, in the advance price of the ommodity, from the consumer; and the labor-rs, being nine-tenths of the whole people, pay the great body of the tax. In England, there is one relief for labor: what is collected as tax from the incomes of the rich is so much saved to the tax on labor. But, with this exception, labor must produce the interest on the war debt. Under this course of things, capitalists grow richer. England is the richest country on earth, because she has the coal and iron and machinery on the easiest terms; but this does not diminish her paupers. Nor can any power on earth change this case, unless by lowering the rate of interest or raising the income-tax.

When the permanent funding of the public debt was adopted as the future plan of the exchequer, the owners of these bonds were pleased. Capitalists were ready to buy them, instead of engaging in commerce or manufactures; and it was common to speak of them as a part of the capital of the kingdom. The labor which was at work in the fields, the mines, and the factories, knew nothing and thought nothing of what was being done in its behalf. But men began at length to examine the nature of this capital, represented by 4,000,000,000 of dollars of bonds. They found that the bonds not only did not answer to any of the descriptions of capital given by economists, but that they were to the productive capital of England a minus quantity: they represented so much capital which had been carried to America, India, France, and Spain, and had been entirely consumed in war, no part of it appearing in any new form of wealth in England; but it did re-appear in the ghostly form of so much poverty, which could be appeased only by taking 140 millions of dollars from the labor and incomes of the people every year to lay this ghost, before the laborers could feed or clothe their families. It raised the laborer to early tasks, pricked him on when his strength failed, and haunted his dreams when he slept.

But, heavy as this poverty was, it was not attended by the common miseries of war — there had been no destruction of private property in England. England endured, with great composure, the destruction her soldiers and subsidies carried to homes in other lands; and her laborers had not new homes to prepare for themselves before applying their shoulders to the yearly burden of an eternal debt.

prover and conveyer of a commodity has added a value; and, at every change, the merchant has advanced the tax, and taken it out of the laborer's share, so that the commodity may be kept low, and compete in the market of the world with like commodities produced in countries not so taxed.

3. If we turn now to the prospect before American labor, we have only to apply the experience of English labor for the last forty years. If the interest on our debt were three and a half per cent., and if incomes in our country could and would pay as largely as the incomes of Englishmen, yet there would be against our labor the comparative advantage the English enjoy in the maturity of their manufactures and commerce, and the ease with which they obtain coal and iron to send their products over the world. But, unfortunately, our debt has been contracted at five and six per cent.; and, by a strange oversight, our bondholders are excused from the payment of taxes. Any attempt to reduce the rate of interest, or to tax these bonds, will be resisted by arguments and influence, which nothing but the fear of repudiation would subdue. And to oppose these arguments would be an attempt at repudiation. But, meanwhile, it is obvious, that, with the nearest and earliest possible close of the war, the labor of this country must hereafter carry a yearly load more than twice as heavy as that which the labor of England has carried during the last forty years.

Questions more profound, more obviously affecting men's daily bread, and far less hopeful of solution, than ever agitated the North and the South, are sure to spring up on this subject. Every day men will look with more anxious interest for the appearance of a statesmanship which will compose our affairs, and quiet the apprehensions about prolonged and ineffectual war. Thoughtful men are weighing the value of a constitutional government, which gives a worse promise for labor than the constitutional monarchy of England now gives to English labor. Nor can the true state of this case—the actual and future condition of our public finances—be much longer kept out of the winter-evening talk of our farmers, mechanics, and tradespeople, who meet around their home-fires, and inquire what the future of the country promises for them and their children. They will see the condition of English labor consequent on the payment of their interest; they w observe that the pressure on labor here w be twice as great as there; they will inqu what relief our labor may expect from t income tax; and when they are told th English labor was relieved, last year, by income tax of fifty-three millions, while t American income tax, last year, was on eleven millions, they will look despairingly the prospect before them and their children

CONCLUSION.

The financial scheme of the English par which prosecuted the war against Ameri and France rested largely on the fallacy the sinking fund. Mr. Pitt did not clear foresee what a load he was preparing f English labor to carry through all time. B English labor had groaned forty years und the burden, and the groans had reached o shores by every emigrant ship before 186 The English poorhouse was well understo here before Dickens laid bare its enormiti — before Oliver Twist was born.

Our rulers knew what they were doin and why, when they neglected to levy a collect the amount of the war burden in ea year of the war; but instead of taxing, we on to run up a war debt, which they w knew could never be paid; and which th knew as well then as now must drain its i terest, forever, from the yearly earnings productive labor, except so far as income t might relieve it. And what relief will elev millions of income tax give to a yearly tax hundreds of millions to be earned in ea year, to stop the gap made in the commo wealth by borrowing for war purposes fo thousand millions of dollars?

The best apology for our rulers is found i the example of the rulers of Europe on th same subject. In nearly all the Europea countries the rulers have run up a war deb of which only the interest can be paid; debt which they dare not increase, for fear resistance from the tax-payers—a debt th interest on which is only to be collected by strong government. The peace of Europe i insured, mainly, by the danger of revolutio which would be incurred by increasing th war debt. Is such to be our governmen and such our security for future peace? An such fortunes reserved for the children o the people who filled the world with the fam of their constitutional liberty, and their co sequent prosperity?

GENERAL McCLELLAN'S LETTER OF ACCEPTANCE.

ORANGE, NEW JERSEY,
September 8, 1864.

GENTLEMEN: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter informing me of my nomination by the Democratic National Convention, recently assembled at Chicago, as their candidate at the next election for President of the United States.

It is unnecessary for me to say to you that this nomination comes to me unsought.

I am happy to know that when the nomination was made the record of my public life was kept in view.

The effect of long and varied service in the army during war and peace, has been to strengthen and make indelible in my mind and heart the love and reverence for the Union, Constitution, laws, and flag of our country, impressed upon me in early youth.

These feelings have thus far guided the course of my life, and must continue to do so to its end.

The existence of more than one government over the region which once owned our flag is incompatible with the peace, the power, and the happiness of the people.

The preservation of our Union was the sole avowed object for which the war was commenced. It should have been conducted for that object only, and in accordance with those principles which I took occasion to declare when in active service.

Thus conducted, the work of reconciliation would have been easy, and we might have reaped the benefits of our many victories on land and sea.

The Union was originally formed by the exercise of a spirit of conciliation and compromise. To restore and preserve it, the same spirit must prevail in our councils, and in the hearts of the people.

The reëstablishment of the Union in all its integrity is, and must continue to be, the indispensable condition in any settlement. So soon as it is clear, or even probable, that our present adversaries are ready for peace, upon the basis of the Union, we should exhaust all the resources of statesmanship practised by civilized nations, and taught by the traditions of the American people, consistent with the honor and interests of the country, to secure such peace, reëstablish the Union, and guarantee for the future the constitutional rights of every State. The Union is the one condition of peace — we ask no more.

Let me add, what I doubt not was, although unexpressed, the sentiment of the Convention, as it is of the people they represent, that when any one State is willing to return to the Union, it should be received at once, with a full guarantee of all its constitutional rights.

If a frank, earnest, and persistent effort to obtain those objects should fail, the responsibility for ulterior consequences will fall upon those who remain in arms against the Union. But the Union must be preserved at all hazards.

I could not look in the face of my gallant comrades of the army and navy, who have survived so many bloody battles, and tell them that their labors and the sacrifice of so many of our slain and wounded brethren had been in vain; that we had abandoned that Union for which we have so often periled our lives.

A vast majority of our people, whether in the army and navy or at home, would, as I would, hail with unbounded joy the permanent restoration of peace, on the basis of the Union under the Constitution, without the effusion of another drop of blood. But no peace can be permanent without Union.

As to the other subjects presented in the resolutions of the Convention, I need only say that I should seek, in the Constitution of the United States and the laws framed in accordance therewith, the rule of my duty, and the limitations of executive power; endeavor to restore economy in public expenditure, reëstablish the supremacy of law, and, by the operation of a more vigorous nationality, resume our commanding position among the nations of the earth.

The condition of our finances, the depreciation of the paper money, and the burdens thereby imposed on labor and capital, show the necessity of a return to a sound financial system; while the rights of citizens, and the rights of States, and the binding authority of law over President, army, and people, are subjects of not less vital importance in war than in peace.

Believing that the views here expressed are those of the Convention and the people you represent, I accept the nomination.

I realize the weight of the responsibility to be borne should the people ratify your choice.

Conscious of my own weakness, I can only seek fervently the guidance of the Ruler of the universe, and, relying on His all-powerful aid, do my best to restore union and peace to a suffering people, and to establish and guard their liberties and rights,

I am, gentlemen,
very respectfully,
your obedient servant,

GEO. B. McCLELLAN.

General McClellan's Views of the War and the Country.

The Harrison's Bar Letter.

Camp near Harrison's Landing, Va., July 7, 1862.

MR. PRESIDENT: You have been fully informed that the rebel army is in our front, with the purpose of overwhelming us by attacking our positions, or reducing us by blockading our river communications. I cannot but regard our condition as critical; and I earnestly desire in view of possible contingencies, to lay before your Excellency, for your private consideration, my general views concerning the existing state of the rebellion, although they do not strictly relate to the situation of this army, or strictly come within scope of my official duties. These views amount to convictions; and are deeply impressed upon my mind and heart. Our cause must never be abandoned; it is the cause of free institutions and self-government. The Constitution and the Union must be preserved, whatever may be the cost in time, treasure or blood. If secession is successful, other dissolutions are clearly to be seen in the future. Let neither military disaster, political faction, or foreign war, shake your settled purpose to enforce the equal operation of the laws of the United States upon the people of every State.

The time has come when the Government must determine upon a civil and military policy covering the whole ground of our national trouble. The responsibility of determining, declaring, and supporting such civil and military policy, and of directing the whole course of national affairs in regard to the rebellion must now be assumed and exercised by you, or our cause will be lost. The Constitution gives you power sufficient even for the present terrible exigency.

This rebellion has assumed the character of war; as such it should be regarded; and it should be conducted upon the highest principles known to Christian civilization. It should not be a war looking to the subjugation of the people of any State, in any event. It should not be at all a war upon population, but against armed forces and political organizations. Neither confiscation of property, political executions of persons, territorial organizations of States, or forcible abolition of slavery, should be contemplated for a moment. In prosecuting the war, all private property and unarmed persons should be strictly protected, subject only to the necessity of military operations. All private property, taken for military use, should be paid or receipted for; pillage and waste should be treated as high crimes; all unnecessary trespass sternly prohibited, and offensive demeanor by the military towards citizens promptly rebuked. Military arrests should not be tolerated, except in places where active hostilities exist; and oaths not required by enactments constitutionally made, should be neither demanded nor received. Military government should be confined to the preservation of public order, and the protection of political rights. Military power should not be allowed to interfere with the relations of servitude, either by supporting or impairing the authority of the master, except for suppressing disorder, as in other cases. Slaves contraband under the act of Congress, seeking military protection, should receive it. The right of the Government to appropriate permanently to its own service claims to slave labor, should be asserted; and the right of the owner to compensation therefor should be recognized.

This principle might be extended, upon grounds of military necessity and security, to all the slaves within a particular State; thus working manumission in such State; and in Missouri, perhaps in Western Virginia also, and possibly even in Maryland, the expediency of such a measure is only a question of time.

A system of policy thus constitutional and conservative, and pervaded by the influences of Christianity and freedom, would receive the support of almost all truly loyal men; would deeply impress the rebel masses and all foreign nations, and it might be humbly hoped that it would commend itself to the favor of the Almighty.

Unless the principles governing the future conduct of our struggle shall be made known and approved, the effort to obtain requisite forces will be almost hopeless. A declaration of radical views, especially upon slavery, will rapidly disintegrate our present armies.

The policy of the Government must be supported by concentration of military power. The national forces should not be dispersed in expeditions, posts of occupation and numerous armies; but should be mainly collected into masses, and brought to bear upon the armies of the Confederate States. Those armies thoroughly defeated, the political structure which they support will soon cease to exist.

In carrying out any system of policy which you may form, you will require a commander-in-chief of the army: one who posesses your confidence, understands your views, and who is competent to execute your orders by directing the military forces of the nation to the accomplishment of the objects by you proposed. I do not ask that place for myself. I am willing to serve you in such position as you may assign me, and I will do so as faithfully as ever subordinate served superior.

I may be on the brink of eternity; and as I hope for forgiveness from my Maker, I have written this letter with sincerity towards you and from love of my country.

Very respectfully,

Your obedient servant,

G. B. McCLELLAN,
Major-General Commanding.

"LET US REASON TOGETHER."

By HON. GEORGE F. COMSTOCK,

OF SYRACUSE,

Late Justice of the Court of Appeals.

THE WRITER of the following pages will only venture to say of himself that he brings to the subjects of discussion a mind somewhat accustomed to the examination of questions of constitutional and public law, and an anxious wish to be right in the views which he presents. To him it is a source of unspeakable amazement, that the simplest and most obvious principles underlying the fabric of society and government, in this country, have become so unsettled in the public mind as to be in danger of absolute overthrow. He will endeavor to reassert some of those principles with all the simplicity and plainness of argument at his command, and to show how fearfully and fatally we are departing from them. If he feels obliged to speak with the utmost freedom of political parties and their action, this must be pardoned, because it is a necessity of the occasion. The awful crisis in which we stand compels a choice between the great parties which divide the suffrages of the people, and that choice must be soberly and intelligently made. In times of smooth and peaceful administration the ascendancy of this or that political party does not involve the safety of the government or people; but now, in the hour of supreme peril, when the differences between those who have the conduct of national affairs and their opponents are so broad and so fundamental that whichever party is right the other is fatally wrong. There is no longer a middle ground, upon which the man of hesitation and doubt can permit himself to linger or stand.

What, then, is our situation? By what processes have we reached it? and to what results are we tending? Let us reason together on these momentous subjects. It certainly ought not to be assumed that a majority of the people of this country do not prefer to stand by a Constitution and Government under which they have been prosperous and happy beyond any example afforded in history. Yet it is true—alas! too true—that at the present moment this Constitution and the beneficent Government which springs from it, are passing away in the roar and whirlwind of revolution. The danger is extreme that we shall lose both the principles and forms of our institutions, and that society itself will receive incalculable injury, while we are engaged in a great and passionate struggle of arms—a struggle not merely to preserve the territorial unity of the republic, but to extend over it a government not derived from a written constitution, and unknown to any law which has the sanction of civilized men. It may not yet be too late to arrest the downward course of events, by calm appeals to the intelligence, the reason, and the conscience of the people.

One of the delusions of the hour is, that the Union must be maintained at the expense of the Constitution, and even after the Constitution is overthrown. This is a sentiment which demands unity of territory and people without a Constitution! Such is the Union of bleeding and prostrate Poland with despotic Russia, and such is the Union which it is now proposed shall be forced by the power of arms upon millions of unwilling people. The sentiment may be paraphrased thus: Perish the Union under the Constitution; perish the Constitution itself, which made the Union and is the Union; perish the independence and sovereignty of the States; perish the States themselves, with their constitutions and laws; perish all things else, so that the National unity be maintained. A fitting adjunct to this novel theory of our nationality is the dogma that in the different parts of our empire there must be uniformity of social systems and institutions; and to compel this very uniformity has now become the primary object of the terrible struggle which is desolating the country. This precise statement of fact admits of no candid denial, because the National Administration to-day stands pledged before the world, by the repeated and solemn proclamations of its chief, to accept no peace—no submission from the rebellious States—without the immediate surrender and destruction of the institution of slavery

But a National Union outside of the written compact of the Constitution! who can define such a form of government? Who can say what are the limitations of its power, and what the rights of the people, and of the States subject to its dominion? If the Union has outgrown and can outlive the Constitution, what shall we call it? What are its characteristics? Do the States remain, or are they to be extinguished and blotted out? If they remain are they to be provinces, merely, of a central authority, or will the people who inhabit them retain the power of self government, through local laws and local administrations? What and where is to be the dividing line between the sovereignty which the people exercise, through their State Legislatures, Governors and Judiciary, and the sovereignty and power of a National Union, which of necessity is to exist without restraint; when we have rejected the restraints of the Constitution? Will there be any such dividing line? Most assuredly there cannot be, because the partition of powers cannot exist at all, any more than a partition of land or territory can exist without some deed, compact or constitution, in which the boundary is defined. Conflict and chaos, therefore, are the necessary conditions of such a Union, until the States yield their attributes and become mere departments of a consolidated empire.

In France and in Russia national unity is a perfectly simple and intelligible conception, because the whole mass of sovereignty is possessed and wielded by a single government. In those magnificent empires there are no republics with the attributes of States, possessing political and sovereign power But such is not the unity of the American people and States. We have a Union or central government, and we have local and State governments. One of these conclusions must, therefore, be the basis of all government in this country: either—1. The Union must have all power and the States must perish; or—2. The States must have all power and the Union must perish; or—3. The powers of sovereignty must be divided by an inflexible organic law, assigning to each its due proportion, and erecting an impassable barrier against invasion or transgression by either. That organic law is the Constitution. Under it the Union and the States both exist, and may exist forever. But the very idea of National Union, without the Constitution as its basis and life, is absurd and impossible. Infinitely more than this, it is a revolutionary and chaotic idea, engendering discord and strife, and sapping the foundations of government and society. The direct consequence of this vague and shadowy conception of a Union with attributes and functions not derived from a written constitution, has been to mingle social theories and moral questions with national politics, producing hatred and strife between the great sections of the country, and culminating in the civil war which now desolates the whole land,

Our safety then must be found in a faithful adherence to the Constitution, because we thereby preserve from annihilation or disturbance the just sovereignty of the States, and the local laws and institutions which have immediate relation to the happiness and wants of every individual. Our highest duty lies in the same direction. The Federal Government has no more right to invade one section of the Union for a purpose outside of the Constitution, no more right to propagate by force of arms in one State the theories, sentiments and opinions of other States, than it has to invade the Kingdom of Brazil to abolish slavery, or the Turkish Empire to abolish poligamy. And if such is become the fixed and determined character of the war, as now vaged by the National Government, we are enacting a stupendous crime, unsurpassed in atrocity by any recorded in the history of nations. The laws of the civilized world denounce such a crime, and it is equally condemned by the dictates of unchangeable and eternal justice.

It is an elementary and fundamental truth of our political system, that the Constitution and the Union are essentially the same. If a difference of phraseology can be employed in describing them, it is this: the Constitution is the compact or instrument from which the Union sprung, and Union is the condition of the States and of the people under the Constitution. So from the marriage contract springs the relation or condition of matrimony: and it is quite as intelligible to speak of the relation of husband and wife, without any agreement of the parties, as to speak of the Union of the States without the written Constitution which brought them together. It is true, that men and women may find their affinities, but the American States do not live together by affinity. They are united only by the legal bond of the Constitution.

And what is this Constitution in its grand and fundamental characteristics? After nearly eighty years of National existence under it, this is a question which springs suddenly into a living and vital significance. So smooth and peaceful have been the events of our history—so few and so light have been the shocks felt by the political and social fabric—that we forget how we became, and why we are a Nation. We have looked at the grandeur of results, and minds which do not or cannot discriminate have contemplated our nationality and our Union as they do the nationality and unity of other empires or republics of the past or present. We seem to have outlived the Constitution, and to have grown into a national unity resting on ideas, habits and emotions; and from this illusion have sprung theories and convictions fatally hostile to the Union established by the Constitution and to the peace of the country. The suppositious sins and errors of local communities have troubled the consciences of other communities as sins and errors of the whole nation. The opinions and sentiments of the North opposed to those of the South, aroused angry and dangerous discussion. Ambitious statesmen seized upon the subject of strife, and converted it into a political issue. A thousand pens and ten thousand tongues united in the chorus of invective and denunciation; and the invasion prompted by the blinded patriotism and burning conscience of John Brown, became the true and appropriate illustration of the ideal and emotional Union which seemed to have taken the place of the legal and constitutional Union established by our fathers.

Standing, as we do, in the presence of a great revolution which is rocking society to its base, we look around us for some safe standard of political duty and conduct, for some prop to steady and support the tottering fabric; and where shall we find it but in the Constitution? If we appeal to those moral and social impressions which prevail in one State or class of States, we are met by directly opposite convictions in other States and communities, and we thus invoke the very issue involved in the terrible struggle which has caused a shudder in every truly Christian and benevolent heart throughout the civilized world. In demanding uniformity of institutions, habits and thoughts, we demand no less than a surrender by those who differ from us of their own institutions, habits and modes of thought; and when we seek to enforce this demand by the power of arms, we appeal to the spirit of intolerance and conquest which in all ages has been so fatal to the peace of the world. Holland and the Netherlands were once dependencies of the Spanish monarchy, but they rejected the Roman Catholic religion with its adjuncts of the Inquisition and torture. An intolerant monarch, fanatically devoted to his religion, invaded those provinces, and ravaged them with fire and sword to "preserve the life of his nation," to maintain the unity of his empire, and to enforce uniformity of religious faith and observance. From the Spanish point of view, Protestantism was the cause of a war which, after a struggle of eighty years' duration—marked by every circumstance of atrocity and horror—resulted in separation and disunion; and Protestantism must, therefore, be abolished. In a sense altogether and exactly similar, slavery in the Southern States is the cause of the war, shocking to the humanity and civilization of the age, which now rages between the sections of this country. Philip II was a fanatic, a propagandist, and consequently a tyrant. He merited and has received the execrations of mankind. Let the casuist—let the ministers of religion answer how much better we shall stand before the Throne of Eternal Justice, if, overleaping constitutional barriers in pursuit of our own theories of national unity and social organization, we carry fire and sword and desolation into sister communities, having equal dignity and rights with us. The wail of anguish from the whole land, the shrieks of the wounded and dying, the smoke of burning cities and towns, have ascended to heaven, and as certainly as there is a Judge of all the Earth, so certainly must all men answer for the part they take in this terrible drama.

If the revolution which is shaking the pillars of society cannot be arrested, it is because it has proceeded too far for the utterance, the comprehension, and the acceptance of the plainest and simplest constitutional truths. But let us never despair while there is ground for hope. We say, then, it is a fundamental truth, to be accepted or rejected by men, as they wish to save or destroy the political institutions of their country, that under the Constitution of the United States there is no shadow of right, in peace or war, by its laws or its military power, to spread or to propagate the opinions or sentiments of any class or section, upon social and moral questions. Let this great truth sink into the minds of the people; let it be carried at once into their political action, and, while on the one hand it leaves all the material power of the nation free to be exercised in the enforcement of law, on the other it puts aside issues and purposes which are revolutionary and aggressive, and which impart to the pending contest its bitterness of sentiment and a despairing energy of resistance.

How then did we become a nation, and what is our mode of national existence? The colonies were separate appendages of the crown of Great Britain. By their declaration of independence they announced themselves to the world as "Free and independent States, with full power to levy war, conclude peace, contract alliances, establish commerce, and to do all other acts and things which independent States may of right do." By the Treaty of Peace with Great Britain they were acknowledged to be "Free and independent States." By the Articles of Confederation, adopted during the revolutionary struggle, they styled themselves "The United States of America," but declared thus: "Each State retains its sovereignty, freedom and independence, and every power, jurisdiction and right which is not by this Confederation expressly delegated to the United States, in Congress assembled." Those articles then set forth the terms of "a firm league of friendship between the States, for their common defence, the security of their liberties, and their mutual and general welfare." Less than ten years later they were superseded by the CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES, which, like the Confederation, was a compact between the same States, separately accepted and ratified by each; a compact which delegated certain named powers and functions to the United States, but reserved all other powers, in the following exact and comprehensive language: "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people." The grand distinction between the Confederation and the Constitution was, that the former established no government to execute the specified powers which were granted, while the latter did establish one in the three departments—Legislative, Judicial, and Executive. The Confederation was more a treaty than a government. The Constitution is more a government than a treaty. If we have to-day any rightful National Government it is this Constitution. No other has ever been ordained. It is not a Government of ideas, emotions, or traditions. Its powers are derivative, and they are defined by a written instrument. They are ample for the national purposes intended, and they are, according to Northern opinion, incapable of revocation by the States which granted them.

There are many good and intelligent people, who will be astonished to know the smallness, not in dignity and importance, but in number and specification, of the powers of sovereignty which the States, by this Constitution, granted to the Union. In these enumerated powers, legislative and executive, and in a judiciary department to interpret the Constitution, treaties and the laws of Congress, is comprehended the whole sovereignty of the Union, while all the other attributes of sovereign and independent communities are reserved to the States. The Government of the Union is certainly of great dignity and importance. It regulates commercial and diplomatic intercourse with other nations. It holds in its hands the destinies of peace and war. It coins the currency of the country. It establishes postal communications, and it has certain other relations to the general happiness and welfare. But with all its dignity and power it cannot pass a law for the observance of the Sabbath; it cannot enact a single regulation of internal trade; it cannot prescribe the requisites of a deed or will; it cannot regulate the protest of a note; it has nothing to do with the marriage relation, with parental or filial duties; it cannot punish adultery, polygamy, or petit larceny; it cannot suppress immorality of any description; it has no general jurisdiction over crime or the civil rights of the citizens of the States; it cannot dissolve the indenture of an apprentice, and it cannot MAKE OR EMANCIPATE A SLAVE. Of course we are speaking only of powers to be exercised within the States.

There are few minds which consider, and none which can grasp the infinite number and variety of the relations which, in a civilized and commercial country, exist between political sovereignty or government on the one hand and the citizen on the other. They are indeed without number, and wholly incapable of specification; and we arrive at some just conception of our political duties and situation when we reflect that in all these relations, except the few enumerated and specified in the constitutional grant of power to the National Union, it is State sovereignty and State law which impose their restraints upon us and throw around us their protection. All government is organized human society, and the range of subjects over which it extends its visible and invisible influence is therefore boundless and infinite. If, then, we take the number one thousand to represent conventionally the total mass of political sovereignty, we cannot hesitate to affirm that nine hundred and ninety-nine parts belong to the government of each State, while only one is held by the common agent of all the States, the Government of the Union.

Not merely the Declaration of Independence, the Articles of Confederation, and the Constitution of the United States, but the fundamental laws and constitutions of the States themselves, announce their sovereignty in the most unmistakable language. The Constitution of Massachusetts declares as follows:—"The People of this Commonwealth have the sole and exclusive right of governing themselves as a free and independent State." And again: "The People inhabiting the territory of Massachusetts Bay do hereby solemnly and mutually agree with each other to form themselves into a sovereign and independent body politic or State, by the name of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts." The organic law of New Hampshire is cast in the same language. The Constitution of Maine declares that, "We, the people of Maine, do agree to form ourselves into a free and independent State, by the name and style of the State of Maine." In the first Constitution of New York it is ordained and declared "that no authority shall, on any pretence whatever, be exercised over the people or members of this State, but such as shall be derived from and granted by them." Similar declarations of sovereignty may be found in the fundamental ordinances of all the States In Louisiana, where the President is now engaged in regulating the elective franchise, and in establishing a government to be based on military force and the consent of one tenth of the people, the State Constitution declares:—"We, the people of Louisiana, do form ourselves into a free and independent State;" and further, "no power of suspending the laws of this State shall be exercised unless by the Legislature or its authority." The President has not merely suspended but annulled those laws, and proposes to force upon nine tenths of the people, whether loyal or disloyal, another constitution and different laws!

There is a further and most conclusive illustration of this subject. Nothing so distinctly marks political sovereignty as the right of succession to the land or soil of a country, when there is no individual owner—in other words, when the private owner dies without a will and without heirs entitled to the inheritance It is a fundamental principle of the Constitution of Great Britain that the Crown is the original proprietor of all lands within the realm, that all private titles are derived from the Crown, and that the King succeeds by escheat when the title becomes vacant by intestacy and the want of heirs. When the American Revolution separated the colonies from that Empire, each colony succeeded as a State to this prerogative of the Crown. The State governments, as political sovereignties, became the original and ultimate proprietors of all lands within their boundaries, and no other power on earth exercised the slightest dominion over their soil. This principle of sovereignty, which prevails incontestably in every State in the Union, is expressed with entire accuracy in an organic statute of New York: "The people of this State, in their right of sovereignty, are deemed to possess the original and ultimate property in and to all lands within the jurisdiction of the State; and all lands the title to which shall fail from a defect of heirs, shall revert on escheat to the people." And again says another statute: "The sovereignty and jurisdiction of this State extend to all places within the boundaries thereof, but the extent of such jurisdiction over places that have been or may be ceded to the United States, shall be qualified by the terms of such cession." Probably, in all the States, locations have been granted or ceded to the Union for forts, arsenals, hospitals, military or naval schools, etc., and in those localities the Union exercises such a degree of political sovereignty as the States have thought proper to yield, and no other.

Now it would seem to be a doctrine to be accepted by every person of common intelligence, that the sovereignty of a country is that authority, whether wielded by king or people, under and from which the land within its boundaries is held by subjects or citizens, and to which the land returns when private ownership ceases. The principle has been received for ages, and if we try the question by this standard, there can be no hesitation in affirming that in this country original and primary sovereignty belongs to the States, as organized political societies.

This sovereignty, as we have seen, comprehends the innumerable mass of political powers which are wielded to meet the ever varying and extending wants and wishes of human society. It nevertheless lacks something of completeness and perfection, because each State, on entering into the Union, agreed by the compact of the Constitution to surrender certain particular powers, exceedingly few in number, although conceded to be of great importance to the general welfare and defence. The powers surrendered, as we have also seen, are enumerated with great precision of language, while all others are reserved.

Our political system is, therefore, a compound one, because with us sovereignty, in its complete and perfect sense, is compounded by that which belongs to the Union and that which belongs to the States. If to the latter we add the limited and special powers granted to the Union, the result is government in the fullness of all its attributes. As the powers of government are thus wielded by two agencies, with a line of distinction or separation between them which is marked by the Constitution, so the allegiance of the citizen must correspond exactly with that division. To the Federal Government he owes allegiance in respect to the powers which the States in the Constitution have granted to it, and he owes to it no other allegiance, deference or duty. To the State of which he is a citizen, and whose laws protect him in the great mass of his interests and social relations, he owes all other allegiance. Allegiance to the Federal Government is special, because its powers and functions are special. Allegiance to the State is general, because its powers and sovereignty are general, and exist without enumeration or specification, or grant from any other power.

Now, those who advocate the doctrine of secession as a Constitutional right simply maintain that as the government of the Union is incontestably a grant of certain powers by the States, so the States can revoke the grant, and thus dissolve the allegiance of the citizen to that government. This pretension is met by the antagonistic proposition that the grant is irrevocable and perpetual. So we think—so we maintain. And this is the true question between the Union and the rebellious States. It can only be in a mind and conscience darkened by error or passion that the soldiers and bayonets of the Federal Government have any other mission upon the soil of those States than to enforce the powers granted to the Union by the Constitution. It is a mission of force whenever resistance exists. When resistance ceases the mission is accomplished; the Union remains, the States remain; and government, no longer obstructed in its functions, resumes its peaceful sway. This is the doctrine of all true and enlightened loyalists, of all men who have a sincere and intelligent wish for peace, with the restoration of order and law; of all men who have a rational hope of saving from the fathomless gulf of anarchy the political and social institutions of this country. Whoever has purposes of a different character, whoever invokes the terrible agencies of war and desolation for the dissemination of his own theories and wishes, upon social and moral questions, is a propagandist and revolutionist, whether he be the busy Politician of a Ward, a Preacher of the Gospel, a Senator in Congress, or the President of the United States.

Rejecting, as we do, the heresy of secession, the States cannot absolve the citizen from the obedience which he owes to the constitutional powers of the Union. But as he owes to the State all other obedience, it is a conclusion of common sense and public law equally plain, that there is no power in any branch of the Federal Government which can dissolve the allegiance due from the citizen to the State. This divided yet harmonious allegiance, resulting from the partition of powers between two sovereignties, is the grand and chief characteristic of our institutions. Each of these sovereignties acts directly upon the citizen and demands equally his obedience. The sovereignty of the Union is not over the States or the laws amd constitutions of the States. On the contrary, it is wholly derived by a grant from the States as the original and primary sovereigns. It is a sovereignty over the citizen precisely commensurate with that grant. Every attempt to exercise over him a power not conferred by the Constitution, is simply an attempt to interfere with his allegiance to the State, which is a duty not less solemn and sacred than his allegiance to the Union. In the sum total of allegiance due from the citizen, the whole belongs to the State, except the portion substracted by the terms of the written Constitution and transferred by the States to the Union. The exertion of armed power by one sovereign to subvert the allegiance of the citizen or subject of another, by assuming to itself the sovereign power, is identical with an effort to overthrow such other sovereignty. Invasion and conquest are the principles involved in such an effort, and this is condemned by the laws of the civilized world. The invaded sovereign and people have not only the right, but it is their duty to repel such invasion.

This very doctrine that the Federal Government acts only upon individual in the exercise of its enumerated powers, is exactly the opposite of secession by States. In it lies the strength and majesty of the Union. It exhibits the Union as supreme in the exercise of its granted powers over all the citizens of this country, while it admits the supremacy of the States in the exercise of all other powers. It is a doctrine which alone gives to the judicial arm of the government the power and right to arraign, to try, and to punish the individual for treason to its sovereignty, while it clothes the government with the thunders and panoply of war, to put down armed resistance to its just authority.

The Constitution of the United States recognizes and defines the crime of treason against its sovereignty, and primarily it consists in "levying war against them. Nothing can more distinctly proclaim the sovereignty of the Union to be over individuals, and not over States, or the laws and constitutions of States. Confining our attention to domestic war against the United States, the traitor is the party who levies the war, and the party who levies the war is the traitor. But treason, like other crimes, is an individual offence, to be charged by indictment, tried by jury, and punished according to the laws of the land. To impute treason to a State involves an utter absurdity. A State cannot be indicted and tried for treason, any more than it can for a misdemeanor or a burglary. A State cannot be imprisoned or put to death. It cannot be subjected to forfeiture or punishment of any description, because it is incapable of the commission of crime. It cannot forfeit its sovereignty, its constitution and laws. A State no more owes allegiance to the Union than the Union does to a State, and neither owes such allegiance. But the citizens of each State owe part of their allegiance to the Union and all the residue to the States. Citizens in greater or in smaller numbers may be rebels and traitors, by "levying war," but the States, as political societies, cannot. If such, at the present moment, is not the true relation between the Union and the rebellious people of the South, then Jefferson Davis is not a traitor to the government of the United States. We repeat, States cannot rebel. Nor can they secede. They are fixed in the Union forever, and can no more forsake it than a planet can forsake its orbit around the sun. The citizens of a State combining in sufficient numbers may gain possession of the powers of administration in a State government and wield those powers against the Union; but sovereignty is not lost or destroyed, although its powers are misdirected. A sovereignty may be subjugated by force, but it cannot be a rebel.

But, say the advocates of war overleaping the bounds of the Constitution, of desolating and exterminating war, "Slavery, by rebellion, has sinned away its day of grace." We answer neither virtue nor vice, nor social institutions, whether good or bad, can be guilty of the crime of rebellion. They cannot be indicted and tried. They are incapable of personification except in the rhapsodies of transcendental politicians and preachers who seek to pervert a war to enforce obedience to a fixed Constitution and established laws, into a war of aggression and conquest; a war upon ideas, habits and institutions. Such are the wars which in all ages have desolated the earth. Certainly the owner of slaves may be a rebel, and so may a Roman Catholic or a Presbyterian. So may the sinless Puritan of Massachusetts. The defence of a principle or an institution may prompt the action of the individual. But Government, in the maintenance of its just authority, deals with the individual and not with the principle, opinion or institution which animates his conduct. Undoubtedly, Governments whose sovereignty is unlimited may enact laws which bear upon social relations and moral questions. But the sovereignty of the United States has no such attribute or function to be exercised within the States. How stupendous the crime, then, of attempting to accomplish by the terrible agencies of force, of fire and sword, that which the national sovereignty is utterly powerless to ordain by law!

The relation between the Union and the States is that of co-ordinate sovereignties, the former having the right to execute its enumerated powers within the territory of the latter. To execute those powers the Union has a Judiciary, an Army and a Navy. Whosoever resists their execution is guilty of the offence of treason. If resistance assumes the form of organized war, all engaged in it are guilty of that offence. War may be made upon them, they may be wounded or slain in battle, even as an armed band of smugglers may who forcibly defy the law. Such a war may even assume vast proportions, according to the strength and numbers of those engaged in resistance; and questions may spring up during its continuance to be determined by the rules which regulate the conduct of belligerent nations. Prisoners may be exchanged, and captures on the sea may be condemned as prizes of war. But the moment that armed rebellion is suppressed, and the war ended, all such questions pass away; constitutions and laws resume their peaceful sway, and disturbance no longer exists in the fixed relations between the Government and the citizen.

Standing on the principles herein enunciated, on the one hand we hold the sovereignty of the Union strictly to its circumscribed powers, while on the other we maintain the allegiance of every citizen of this land to the Constitution and laws. On the same principles we also maintain that the Union is a perpetual and unchangeable relation of the States to each other and to the national Government. If we are right, the Union is not dissolved, but is now composed of thirty-four States, fixed in their positions by a perpetual Constitution as the planets are fixed in their orbits by an irreversible law of nature. If to-morrow every rebel should lay down his arms and return to allegiance, the Union would remain not only perfect in theory, perfect in all its parts, but undisturbed in the exercise of its constitutional and accustomed functions and powers. But as the Union cannot be perfect with less than all the States, the States would also remain in all their perfection as local sovereignties, with their constitutions and laws unimpaired. And there is no power on earth, except armed and lawless power, to change the Constitution and laws of a single one of these thirty-four States. We say the Union is perpetual because the States with their just sovereignty and rights are perpetually its members, and there is no Union without the parts of which it is composed. The assurance of perpetuity is in the unchangeable law of the Constitution, made by the States themselves, in the benefits of Union, in the love which it ought to inspire, and in the power of coercion to compel individuals everywhere to submit to its authority. When all the citizens who compose the sovereignty of a State are obedient also to the sovereignty of the Union, when their allegiance is rendered to each sovereignty according to the constitutional partition of powers, the State, by a logical and constitutional necessity, is in the Union, and all parts of our noble political system work harmoniously together.

In opposition to those principles which alone can save the government and preserve society from the shocks of revolution, we find the leaders and guides of a great political party disseminating over the land crude and monstrous theories which admit and proclaim the Union already dissolved, and the Constitution already overthrown. Animated by one ruling and all pervading wish, that of overthrowing the institutions and sovereignty of the Southern States, they find the doctrine of a fixed and perpetual Union under the limitations of the Constitution, a Union such as the fathers of the republic ordained, standing directly in their way, and this must therefore be disposed by some new conception of the crisis into which they have plunged the country. We purpose to notice these deformed and misbegotten theories. But first let us recall what but recently seemed to be the opinion of the whole country concerning the rebellion and the duties of the situation.

On the 4th of March, 1861, Abraham Lincoln was inaugurated President of the United States. The people of six States had then passed ordinances of secession, and had organized the Southern Confederacy. On that imposing occasion Mr. Lincoln, after taking a solemn oath "to protect and defend the Constitution," in the course of his inaugural address said "If the destruction of the Union by all or a part only of the States be lawfully possible, the Union is less perfect than before the Constitution, having lost its vital element of perpetuity. It follows from these views that no State, upon its own mere motion can lawfully get out of the Union; that laws and ordinances to that effect are equally void, and that acts of violence within any State against the authority of the United States are insurrectionary or revolutionary according to circumstances. I therefore consider that, in view of the Constitution and laws, the Union is unbroken." As Mr. Lincoln then said, so the country believed. Widely as men differed as to the policy which had brought the crisis upon us, and as to the mode of treating it, the sentiment that the Union was indestructible and the Constitution in force, with all its authority and all its limitations, met with a universal response. As Mr. Lincoln then said, so we have now said, and maintained with all the power of argument and illustration at our command.

Again, less than two months later, on the 22d of April, 1861, after the flame of actual war had been kindled, Mr. Seward, the President's Prime Minister, thus expressed himself in a diplomatic paper: "The condition of slavery in the States will remain just the same whether it (the rebellion) shall succeed or fail. There is not even a pretext for the complaint that the disaffected States are to be conquered by the United States if the revolution fail, for the rights of the States and the condition of every human being in them will remain subject to exactly the same laws and forms of administration whether the rebellion shall succeed or shall fail. Their constitution, laws, customs, habits and institutions, in either case, will remain the same. It is hardly necessary to add to this incontestable statement the further fact, that the new President, as well as the citizens through whose suffrage he has come into the administration, has always repudiated all designs, whatever and wherever imputed to him, of disturbing the system of slavery as it is existing under the constitution and laws. The case would, however, not be fully presented if I were to omit to say that any such efforts on his part would be unconstitutional."

Such were the sentiments of the President, as enunciated in his name and by his authority, and such we are told were the views of "the citizens" by whose suffrage he had been elevated to power. Since then how fearful and how rapid has been the descent into the abyss of revolution and crime.

And again, two months later, on the 22d of July, 1861, when eleven States had seceded from the Union, when we stood in the midst of the terrible realities of war, the Congress of the United States, in order to arouse and confirm the loyalty of the people in all sections of the country, and to repel all charges that the war was to be prosecuted for any unconstitutional and revolutionary purpose, unanimously resolved, "That this war is not waged in any spirit of aggression, or for any purpose of conquest or subjugation, or purpose of overthrowing or interfering in the rights or established institutions of the States, but to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution, and to preserve the Union with all the dignity, equality and rights of the several States unimpaired, and that as soon as those are objects accomplished the war ought to cease."

Such then were the issues and purposes of the war as proclaimed by the President and the Congress of the United States. It was to be a war to maintain a Union unbroken by ordinances of secession, unbroken even by the actual presence of rebellion and war, a war to maintain an existing and perpetual Union of equal States by the suppression of armed resistance to its authority. Let us mark the shameful contrast. Now, in the same Representative hall from which the foregoing resolution was sent forth to arouse the patriotism of the people, an unsexed woman proclaims a new purpose of war, to wit, the overthrow of States and Constitutions by conquest—proclaims a new Union founded on the emotions of passion and hate, of love for the negro and hatred for the whites—a Union unknown to the political system of this country; and this is done with the President of the United States sitting on her right hand, Vice-President on her left, and the Speaker in the chair! A responsive echo to this passionate female voice is found in the public declaration of Mr. Chase, a cabinet minister, and perhaps the greatest of the leaders of Republican opinion, who tells us "the Nation is to be born again," This is the very language of the Dantons, the Marats and the Robespierres of the French Revolution. It is the language of revolution and anarchy in all ages and countries.

That the sudden and violent enfranchisement of the four millions of slaves in the Southern States has now become the leading principle and animating purpose of the war as carried on by the National Administration, we suppose, is no langer a disputed proposition. When the President, in September, 1862, launched his preliminary, and on the 1st January, 1863, his final thunderbolt of emancipation, a great body of his supporters failed to see the vast and revolutionary scope of that edict. Many were unconscious themselves of a purpose to overthrow the constitutions and laws of eleven States of the Union. The meaning of the edict was sufficiently plain because, by its very terms, it declared the slaves to be "forever free," and pledged the armies and navies of the Union to "maintain that freedom." But as this political decree could not have its literal effect without overthrowing the constitution and subverting the fundamental principles on which the Union is based, timid and halting Republicans interpreted it as a mere order of a military commander inviting slaves to join the invading forces, but totally powerless to change the constitution and laws of States; and therefore powerless to affect the legal status or condition of any human being. This was in substance denying to it any effect whatever, except as an illusive and deceptive invitation to slaves to abandon their masters. But with this false and erroneous interpretation of the Presidential manifesto, it received the plaudits of a united party. The hesitating Seward, who had denied even the possibility of such an invasion of the sovereignty and constitutional rights of States, approved it as a "war measure," while the exultant Chase grasped its literal, its terrible import.

The false interpretation of this imperial decree has been removed by its author. The President in his message and "amnesty" proclamation of December, 1863, has plainly announced to the world his purpose of continuing this devastating and exhausting war, not merely until resistance to the laws of the Union has ceased, but until the laws and constitutions of the States maintaining the institution of slavery shall be changed by the compulsion of arms. And those who approved the proclamation of emancipation under a frivolous interpretation which deprived it of all legal significance are now understood to have surrendered their transient scruples, and to yield to it their support without that or any other reservation. We state what we suppose to be now an admitted fact when we say, that nowhere in all the councils of the republican party is there a single voice raised in favor of the Union of the States without emancipation, and with the equality and rights to which the Constitution entitles them. We know that the words "Union and the Constitution" have not wholly passed from use. But they mean simply unity and consolidation under the pressure of power to be enforced by a desolating and exterminating war, and not the union of co-equal sovereignties ordained by the Constitution.

It is, however, a conclusion plain even to passionate fanatics and heated partisans that the Constitution does not justify the proposed invasion of equal States and the intended destruction of their institutions. Every mind must assent to the doctrine that if we proceed according to the Constitution, it must not be transcended, and that simple obedience to its authority is the object and the limit of war. But the purpose to use the military power of the nation, in order to overthrow all the laws and constitutions of States by which slavery is maintained, has diffused itself throughout a great political party, and this purpose must find some doctrinal justification or be abandoned. Out of this necessity various theories have arisen to justify a war of invasion and conquest outside of the Constitution.

The first of these theories is the illogical and illshapen conception of Mr. Sumner. According to his view of the political situation, an abolition war is justified upon the doctrine that State sovereignty was lost, and the Southern States themselves extinguished by their ordinances of secession and their resistance to constitutional authority. This being assumed, it is then asserted that the States, in a sense both geographical and political, have become mere provinces or territories of the Union, and as such may be governed absolutely. From the right to govern absolutely, necessarily flows the right to annul all local laws and overturn all local institutions.

To these conclusions, we oppose the self-evident proposition that a State or sovereignty cannot commit suicide. A political State is composed of its people, their laws and constitution of government, and perpetual succession and sovereignty are its necessary attributes. It may be invaded and conquered by lawless power, but it cannot cease to exist by the force of a legal or logical proposition. The very conception of forfeiture implies that the whole of sovereignty with its infinite mass of power is held of some superior sovereign, and this is a contradiction in terms. That which has a superior cannot be a sovereign. The separate sovereignties of the Union and of the States have been elucidated in those pages. As we have shown each is exercised upon different questions or subjects with a constitutional line of partition between them, and each is perpetual, if the Constitution is perpetual. But from the very nature of the system, if all the States should withdraw from the compact the sovereignty of the Union would be lost. But the Union cannot withdraw the sovereignty of the States or of any of them. It can enforce obedience to its constitutional authority, but there its rightful powers end.

Equally false and illogical is the Sumner theory in another aspect. The States which formed the Union were certainly never territories of the Union. The Union sprung from the States and not the States from the Union. As pre-existing sovereignties their soil never belonged to the Union. By inevitable logic, if the separation of States is possible, they return to their original situation, with all the attributes of perfect and separate sovereignty. The separation of a State, if possible, is simply a revocation of the enumerated powers granted to the Union. So far it impairs the sovereignty of the latter and reannexes to the State the portion which had been granted away. Jefferson Davis says this separation is possible, and so says Mr. Sumner. We hold them both to be wrong, and that ordinances of secession are void and inoperative to all intents and purposes whatever. If they are not void, then Mr. Davis is right as to all the consequences and results which flow from the separation. Then the seceded States are in the rightful possession of a perfect sovereignty, and Mr. Sumner proposes a war of invasion and conquest, for which there is not only no warrant in the Constitution, but which is condemned by the rules of Christianity and the law of the civilized world.

Opposed to the Sumner theory of State suicide, but equally false, is another, probably of still wider influence. One of its most prominent advocates is Mr. Stevens, "The Chancellor of the Exchequer" in the House of Representatives, whose speech is before us as we write. Like Mr. Sumner, he declares the seceding

States to be out of the Union, but with infinitely better logic, instead of remanding them to a territorial and provincial condition, he holds them to be foreign powers, and that the war against the "Confederate States" is a war against a foreign nation. He, too, like Sumner, is an Abolitionist; and, upon this doctrine, he relieves himself from the restraints of the Constitution. He says: "'The Union as it was and the Constitution as it is,' is an atrocious idea;" and thus throwing off all constitutional restraints, those who darken their intelligence and delude their consciences by this doctrine, write "emancipation" on their banners, and march their invading hosts against the sovereignty, institutions, and laws of a foreign power. By a singular incongruity of logic and of thought, these theorists, after conquering and subduing the Southern States as a foreign power, propose to punish the citizens of those States as domestic traitors. Confiscation, widespread and universal, desolation and destruction, are the concomitants of this humane and enlightened policy!

Now, the transparent vice of this theory is, that it accepts the secession of States not only as a fact, but as a fixed conclusion of public law. To this conclusion, also, we oppose the doctrine of the perpetuity of the Union and the irrevocable compact of the Constitution. As Mr. Lincoln said, in 1861, as all loyal men then said so we say now: the Union is legally and constitutionally unbroken, and the only mission of our army is to vindicate its just authority, and that mission, we say here, should be attended by the mightier agencies of conciliation and kindness.

Words need not be wasted on a doctrine which proclaims the Union already dissolved. If Mr. Thaddeus Stevens is right, so, we repeat, Jefferson Davis is right; for they both agree in the essential proposition that the seceding States are a foreign power. But, in imputing to them that character, it is necessarily implied that they are rightfully independent of all other powers on the earth. What can be more absurd in logic or atrocious in morals than a doctrine which assigns to the Southern States a place outside of the Union for the purpose of carrying on a war against them outside of the Constitution, yet instantly returns them to the Union for the purpose of confiscation ar punishment for treason to its authority Such an absurdity needs no refutatio If the doctrine is right in its first ar fundamental proposition, that the sece ing States are a foreign power, then th war is without cause and cannot be righ fully prosecuted a moment longer. W have no cause of war with the South: a foreign nation; and, in the name of ou raged humanity and Christian civiliz tion, let it come to an end. If there be settled maxim in the law of the moder world, it is, that the independence of n tions ought to be respected, and th no social or moral theories can justify a invasion of their sovereignty or soi Christian Europe has for ages not onl tolerated but maintained the polygamou Empire of Turkey. This great princip lies at the very foundation of the peace the world. More than any thing else, distinguishes modern civilization from th intolerance and barbarism of other time "Death or the Koran" was the battle-cr of the Mohammedan hosts, as they swe over the nations to disseminate the rel gion of their prophet. "Death or Ab lition" is now the motto of a great polit cal party and the Oriflamme borne at th head of our invading armies.

But the President of the United State has also a doctrine and a policy of hi own, which are exhibited in his lates message to Congress, and in the contem poraneous so-called "Amnesty Proclama tion." Unable to withdraw himself fro the fearful and revolutionary pledge co tained in his Proclamation of Emancip tion, and rejecting the interpretatio which falsified its meaning, he has in vented a grotesque and novel theory t relieve himself from the inconvenienc of the Constitution which he swore t maintain in peace and in war. Accord ingly he has found in the pardoning func tion of his office a power to overthrow the constitutions of eleven States of th Union. By an inversion of logic of thought and sentiment which would b astonishing were it not so common, the attribute of pardoning mercy which the Constitution has bestowed on the chief magistrate of the Union is converted into a power which the whole government of the United States does not possess, and into a terrible engine of oppression and wrong.

ory forms of expression, this latest manifestation of the President's views and policy may be stated in the following sequence: 1st. All persons who have been engaged in the present Rebellion are guilty of treason. 2d. The President has, under the Constitution, the pardoning power. 3. He will graciously pardon the greater number of those persons provided they will support his Proclamation of Emancipation and all other proclamations, past or future, relating to slavery, and will take an oath to that effect. 4th. He will recognize new State governments without the institution of slavery, which governments are to be created and organized by the suffrages of one-tenth of the voters in the States who take such oath. Necessarily the existing constitutions, laws, and sovereignty of the States are annulled and destroyed. 5. The other nine-tenths of the people refusing to take the oath are outlawed, even if they were never rebels, or if, having been rebels, they are willing to lay down their arms and submit to the Constitution and laws of the United States. We beg to be understood as stating in this sequence, with entire and absolute accuracy, the policy of Mr. Lincoln as announced to the country in his last message and proclamation.

Now if this policy, like that of Thaddeus Stevens, regards the seceded States as foreign powers; or if, like that of Mr. Sumner, it considers them extinguished and degraded to mere Territories, then besides the fatal objections already considered, it is liable to the further and equally fatal one, that the President has no shadow of authority to recognize or admit new States into the Union. If he can do this, then by the power of arms and a presidential edict Cuba can be annexed. If he can do this, then he may admit the Territory of Nevada as a State with such a constitution as he chooses to dictate. These assumptions need no further refutation.

But the President probably regards the Union as unbroken, as stated in his inaugural address, and all the States as held in the Union by the perpetual bond of the Constitution. Such is our doctrine. But by inexorable logic it follows that acts of secession and war are the treasonable acts of the individuals engaged in them; and the States being in the Union are necessarily there with their sovereignty, their constitutions, and laws. How, then, can the President overthrow that sovereignty and expunge those constitutions and laws by the punishment or the pardon of individuals, or by any power known to the Constitution? The very conception of punishment or pardon implies that the persons who are subjects of either of these dispensations owe allegiance to the Union. But that is impossible, unless they are citizens of a State which is a member of the Union.

But again, the President's amnesty is conditioned on the emancipation of slaves, and an oath to observe and obey all his proclamations on that subject. Now, a conditional pardon or amnesty is a punishment for the supposed crime. A remission of a sentence of death, on a condition of perpetual imprisonment, is simply a punishment for the offense by a perpetual imprisonment. But neither the President nor Congress has any power to punish. They can only make war against armed insurrection or treason. The power to punish, by a sacred provision of the Constitution, belongs to the judiciary alone, which must proceed by indictment and trial. But without indictment, trial, or sentence, the President proposes by his conditional pardon or amnesty, to punish by a universal confiscation of property. The alternatives are outlawry and exile, or death. Submission to the laws simply and purely he refuses to accept. Submission to the laws is submission to all the chances of indictment and trial according to law. The President demands, not this submission, but without trial he exacts a punishment which can be inflicted only after a trial and conviction in the courts. We repeat, a conditional pardon is a punishment precisely commensurate with the condition imposed.

This punishment, we add, is universal. Millions of people rebel, and millions are to be punished. Such an atrocious and vindictive assertion of sovereignty was never before heard of, or even conceived, in the history of the whole world. A large number of the people of England engaged in the rebellion of Monmouth against the throne and sovereignty of James the Second. Some three hundred of them were punished, not by the king, but tried and condemned according to law. "The bloody assizes," and the name of Judge Jeffries, have received the execrations of mankind. Mr. Lincoln, without the attributes of a judge, hurls the penalty of confiscation against a million of offenders. But infinitely worse, he punishes the innocent with the guilty. The impressed soldier and voluntary rebel fall equally under his condemnation. Women and minors, non-combatants and Unionists, equally with the open traitor, are assumed to need a pardon which mercifully spares their lives on condition of submitting to a different form of punishment.

But the crowning feature of this extraordinary policy is its assertion of authority, not merely to overthrow State governments, but to re-create them by the vote of one-tenth of the people who by the pressure of arms may be willing to accept the proffered amnesty. These new governments are to be "recognized," and necessarily the power of the Union is pledged to sustain them against the other nine-tenths of the people who may adhere to their existing constitutions and laws. Of this nine-tenths, all who have been rebels may be willing to lay down their arms and submit to the authority of the Union, claiming only the rights to which they are entitled under the laws of their States. Yet unless they are willing also to accept the pardon of the President with its punitive conditions, they are excluded from citizenship and subjected to the political domination of the remaining one-tenth, and this relation between the majority and the minority is to be maintained by the military power of the nation. In the result the pardoned traitors in all the rebellious States amounting to one-tenth of the voting population may wield all the powers of sovereignty over more than equal numbers of subject and enslaved people who, having never been disloyal, decline to accept a vindictive pardon for their loyalty. In this manner Mr. Lincoln and his Generals are now proceeding to organize new civil governments in the Southern States. If the powers thus assumed by him were known to the Constitution, their execution would nevertheless be a monstrous and gigantic wrong. But in the consummation of such a scheme the Constitution itself must be trampled under foot. The President has no power to admit or "recognize" States, or to organize or reorganize civil governments in them. He is commander-in-chief of the Army and Navy, and he may execute the laws of the Union. But he is not the sovereign of this country, nor can he establish such a tyranny in any portion of it until constitutional liberty is crushed beneath the iron heel of military power.

This one-tenth of the voting population composed of repentant and pardoned rebels, of camp followers and parasites of power, sustained by the soldiers and bayonets of the United States, is not only to wield the sovereignties of eleven States but the same minorities will bring these sovereignties into the Government of the Union. Each spurious State will be entitled to two senators in Congress, and the number of its representatives in the other house will be undiminished by the exclusion from civil rights of the proscribed nine-tenths of the people.

Now, one-tenth of the white population of the seceded States amounts to but little over half a million of souls. Their representation in the Senate of the United States will equal that of eleven loyal States having a population of more than sixteen millions; and in the other branch of the National Legislature it will equal that of States which number over eight millions. Such is to be the Government of this Union under the administration of Abraham Lincoln. Let us conceive a President of the United States chosen by electoral votes counted in the Capitol at Washington on the appointed day and based on eleven State sovereignties thus "recognized" and created. The Union would be shaken from center to circumference. It needs no prophetic eye to foresee that the days of such a Government must be speedily numbered.

We have done with the policy of Mr. Lincoln. We have done also with the other wild and fantastic theories which have been invented to drug the intellect and appease the consciences of men whose overmastering wish is to escape plain constitutional restraints and duties so that the spirit of intolerance and the lust of conquest may have free scope to accomplish their unholy purposes. We have, as we persuade ourselves, presented the undeniable truths of our political system—truths which impose upon every citizen in every station not only the restraints of the fundamental law, but the very highest corresponding moral obligations; and we have dissected and examined all the false conceptions and ideas of the situation, which having assumed a tangible form, and having responsible authors, seemed to challenge discussion.

There are still other illusions floating in minds incapable of rational deduction or consecutive thought. One of these takes the form of a postulate like the following: "The rebels having rejected and repudiated the Constitution, are not entitled to demand its protection." This exceedingly shallow sophistry, perhaps, has done more to unsettle minds and plunge the country into the vortex of revolution, than even the mischievous dogmas which we have examined. Shallow as the sophistry is, it deserves to be rebuted for the evil it has done.

The rebellious people of the South most certainly have rejected the Constitution and laws, and have resisted them by force. What, then, is their offence? Every mind must answer, it is simply treason. It is no more and no less. They are in the eye of the law criminals, and that is all. Their offence is defined by the Constitution, and the laws have provided the mode of punishment. Now the greatest criminal, equally with the most exalted saint, is entitled to the protection of law. He is entitled to be tried by his peers, and, if convicted, to be punished only according to the law. When law is broken, Government must keep within it, and may inflict the punishment which it prescribes. If Government goes one step further, it becomes itself the offender, and resistance to its usurpation is an undoubted right. When citizens defy the laws, the business of Government is to compel them to submit to the laws. The feeblest mind can comprehend and apply the principle. The rebels resist the authority of the Constitution, and force may be used to compel their obedience to it. But as their obedience is only due to the Constitution and the laws, the use of force by the Government to overthrow the Constitution, and to set up in its place some other authority, instantly reverses the relations of the parties and changes the principles of the contest. And thus a lawless rebellion may be converted at once into a necessary self-defence, justified by the laws of nature and of all nations. If such has now become the relative situation of the Government and the present rebellion, it is an unspeakable misfortune, into which the country has been plunged by the blind infatuation of party, which embraces every wretched delusion and inverts all principle and truth.

But the rebellious people of the Southern States do not demand the protection of the Constitution. On the contrary, they say they are outside of the Constitution; and so says the miserable sophism we are refuting. And this postulate being agreed on, the rebels demand not the protection of the Constitution, but peace and repose. Accepting the formula, "you are outside of the Constitution," they press these terrible questions upon us, "Why then do you invade us? Why then do you march your armed hosts to desolate our land? Why do you wrap a continent in the all devouring and devastating flame of war? If not for the sake of your Constitution, why is humanity compelled to shudder at the scenes you are enacting?" How shall we escape the inexorable logic of these all searching enquiries? Let those whom constitutions and laws cannot bind, come forward and answer.

In the meantime, a powerful political organization is sweeping on in its work of destruction. One class of revolutionists adopts the theory of State suicid and the degradation of States to territorial and provincial subjection. Another maintains that the States, bound to the Union by a a perpetual constitution, have passed into the condition of foreign powers, and are to be conquered and subdued as such in opposition to the laws of the civilized and Christian world. Others, like the President, find in the pardoning power, mercifully bestowed on the national executive, an authority to inflict universal punishment without trial, to overturn States and re-create them by the terrible instrumentalities of war and desolation. Thousands seem to be profoundly ignorant of all political institutions and restraints, while numbers equally great are reckless of every social and constitutional obligation. To all these add the numberless throng of official dependents and expectants, of mercenaries and parasites, and we have a great political party whose brief but disastrous domination has brought and is bringing upon the country greater calamities than would the visitations of God in the forms of pestilence and famine.

Let us not despair. The time for the great yet peaceful uprising of the people is approaching. There are millions of loyal and Christian hearts which are not in a war of aggression, conquest and revolution, which are not in a war whose duration is interminable, because it necessarily awakens the fiercest passions of human nature, and arouses a resistance to be maintained by the tremendous energies of despair. There are millions hearts which sigh for the peace and pose of a constitutional governmen and there is an all-pervading intelligen which is able to comprehend the cris and the obligations it imposes. Reas will resume her throne, and conscien will assert her imperial sway over t wills and the conduct of men.

EXTRACT.

What you need, as it seems to me, is to be fully impressed with a belief in your mission, and in your capacity to fulfil it. That mission is to save the Constitution of the United States. By saving it I mean, of course, that you are to save it for the whole Union—for the South and the North, for the East and the West—with every right which it protects completely reëstablished. I can see no other mode of saving it; for it is to my mind apparent that a war prosecuted against the South, for the acquisition of power over their domestic institutions, which the Constitution expressly withholds from the Federal Government, can result in nothing but the establishment of a system under which there can be no local rights of self-government left for any section or any State. This it is your mission to prevent. You cannot prevent it by uniting with those who proffer support of the war without the slightest protest against the unconstitutional policy with which it is prosecuted. In all the late popular proceedings looking to the establishment of what are styled "Loyal Leagues," I have not seen one word of indignant remonstrance against the unconstitutional measures of the Administration. You cannot expect, and need not look for such remonstrance from assemblies largely composed of those who are the peculiar political supporters of the Administration, and who are more or less responsible for its measures. Public opinion, if it is to make itself heard and felt against all violations of the Constitution, must make its utterances through the action and the voice of those who have never failed to protest against t policy that has created for us so muc peril. If that public opinion fails to r cognize this necessary channel of expre sion—if it yields itself to a fatal apath or will not see how it can at once save Government and change an Administr tion—then all will be lost, and there wi remain to us only the consolation that w have individually done our duty.

You are then (permit me to add) seek, by every constitutional and upright method, to obtain the control of all t organisms of government. If, in t meantime, you cannot induce the presen Executive of the United States to chang his policy, then, remembering his pos tion, possess your souls in patience unt you can give him a constitutional su cessor. Let everything be prepared wit one fixed and unselfish purpose—namely to make every successive election revers the doctrines, and dogmas, and usurpa tions which you know you should con demn. By this course of action instea of weakening you will strengthen you government, for you will make it appa rent to the whole world that the presen arbitrary rule is to be succeeded by period when the CONSTITUTION is onc more, in all its beneficence and all it power, to be "THE SUPREME LAW OF TH LAND." Fail to do this, and the Nation losing heart and hope, will lose sight o the methods by which a constitutiona succession can be preserved to a bette day, and will yield itself to the despai which welcomes despotism, or to the rage wh welcomes monarchy

A PAGE OF HISTORY.

From the N. Y. Journal of Commerce.

I am losing my patience in reading Gen. McClellan's Report. The injustice to him, and the atrocious wrong to his noble army and the country, are enough to make the blood of honest and patriotic men boil within them.

AMOS KENDALL.

There is no passage in history which is more deeply interesting, none on which the pen of the historian will dwell with more eloquence, than that which relates to the condition of the United States, its army and its capital, on the last day of August, 1862. The report of Gen. McClellan now for the first time collects and makes clear the various incidents which are to fill this important page in our national record. We regret that the Congressional edition, the Rebellion Record edition, and other cheap editions of the report are incomplete and inaccurate, omitting entirely some portions which present the most interesting and important view of the relations of Gen. McClellan to the Cabinet, the army, and the country. The edition published under Gen. McClellan's authority is accurate. The omission was doubtless unintentional, some pages of copy having fallen from a compositor's desk, or been mislaid, in the Government printing office, and the reprinters who have followed that edition have produced imperfect copies.

Gen. McClellan was not at that time removed from the command of the army, but the army was removed from his command by an ingenious device of the War Department. He was treated with contemptuous indifference by Gen. Halleck. When ordered to abandon the Peninsula he was so anxious for an interview with Gen. Halleck, and a free consultation, that he proceeded from Harrison's Bar to the nearest telegraph station, and there, finding that the wires were broken under water, he crossed Chesapeake Bay, arriving at Cherry Stone Inlet, on the east shore, about midnight. He immediately telegraphed to Washington, informing Gen. Halleck that he had come all this distance to consult with him, and requested him to come to the War Department end of the wire. Gen. Halleck came and sent a brief and somewhat ill-humored reply. While Gen. McClellan was deciphering this reply (it was in their private cipher), the operator informed him that Gen. Halleck had left the Washington office without so much as saying good-night, and that further telegraphing was useless! Gen. McClellan returned to his army, brought it away from the scene of its noble exploits, stood himself, last man of all, on the deserted ground, and left the Peninsula with the conviction that a great error was in progress at Washington. At Fort Monroe he wrote a despatch to Gen. Halleck, mournfully eloquent, speaking of the services of his brave army, and begging Halleck to recognize them. He said:

"Please say a kind word to my army, that I can repeat to them in general orders in regard to their conduct at Yorktown, Williamsburgh, West Point, Hanover Court House, and on the Chickahominy, as well as in regard to the seven days and the recent retreat. No one has ever said anything to cheer them but myself. Say nothing about me. Merely give my men and officers credit for what they have done. It will do you much good and strengthen you much with them if you issue a handsome order to them in regard to what they have accomplished. They deserve it."

Verily they did deserve it. They were an army of heroes, brought home from fields of as gallant fighting as the world ever saw. But there was no reply to the request of their general. They received no kind word, no cheer, no thanks. They were hurried home, to be hurled into the jaws of death under a commander selected to displace the general who had hitherto shared their fortunes. McClellan came to Alexandria. What was his position and relation to the army? He himself did not know. The process of depriving him of his command was going forward. Pope's Army of Virginia absorbed the Army of the Potomac. For seven days that noble army disappears from history. It had no existence. McClellan was left at Alexandria, still the commanding general of the Army of the Potomac, but there is an eloquence which every heart must feel in his simple narrative of what remained to him of his once magnificent command. Less than one hundred men, most of these invalids, wounded men, orderlies, and members of bands, were the sole representatives of the Army of the Potomac! So grand is the contrast which this narrative affords between the days which preceded and those which followed the last of August, that it may by some be suspected as intentional that the narrative is omitted from the incomplete editions of the report. But we prefer to regard it as accidental, especially in view of other and numerous errors which occur in the same editions.

The secret history of political manœuvring at Washington at this time would, if made public, explain the whole responsibility for the disastrous campaign of Pope. The blood of our thousands, lost on those fatal plains of Manassas, is chargeable directly on the intrigues of Washington politicians of the radical party, who only desired to remove McClellan from the public view, because they feared that the splendor of his genius, the devotion of his army, the nobleness of his character, might bring him before the people as a fit man to lead the whole nation through war to peace and union under the Constitution. For this they intrigued, and for this they wasted thousands on thousands of young lives, poured out on fruitless battle-fields. And some of this secret history may be recovered from a close examination of the despatches and orders issued at Washington, between the 29th August and the 2d September, 1862. Five days—brief time—but filled with great events. The politicians had succeeded; McClellan was debased and disgraced. He asks Halleck for specific orders as to what he is to do at Alexandria. Halleck replies, giving general orders and finding fault. "Ammunition, and particularly for artillery, must be immediately sent forward to Centreville for General Pope. It must be done with all possible despatch," telegraphs Halleck, at 1:45 o'clock on the 30th. McClellan replies at 2:10. "I know nothing of the calibre of Pope's artillery. All I can do is to direct my ordnance officer to load up all wagons sent to him." Halleck finds fault that Franklin was not sooner sent forward. McClellan replies that Franklin had no transportation, and finally marched without wagons, and of course without ammunition or subsistence.

Then McClellan sends a despatch which will be memorable in all future time:

"I cannot express to you the pain and mortification I have experienced to-day in listening to the distant sound of the firing of my men. As I can be of no further use here, I respectfully ask that if there is a probability of the conflict being renewed to-morrow, I may be permitted to go to the scene of battle with my staff, merely to be with my own men if nothing more; they will fight none the worse for my being with them. If it is not deemed best to intrust me with the command, even of my own army, I simply ask to be permitted to share their fate on the field of battle. Please reply to this to-night."

No sleep that long night in the little camp at Alexandria. Every moment they expected the answer permitting them to share the fate of the army—a fate which all the wisest soldiers were looking to with the most solemn apprehensions. But no answer came. Not even the common courtesy of a reply was given, till the next day came Halleck's cold despatch:

"I cannot answer without seeing the President, as General Pope is in command, by his orders, of the department."

It was too much trouble for any one in General Halleck's office to send to the President the night before, or even that morning, and say, "The fate of the nation hangs in the balance; McClellan asks leave to go to the field as a volunteer, may he go?"

But the insults were not yet ended. This same day, the 31st August, General Halleck telegraphs McClellan:

"As many as possible of the new regiments should be prepared to take the field. Perhaps some more should be sent to the vicinity of Chain Bridge."

McClellan replies that it is General Casey's province to attend to the new regiments, and General Barnard's to order others to Chain Bridge. "By the War Department order I have no right to give them orders." Here was one of those ery common Washington complications nder the present management. "I have ot seen the order," replies Halleck. It as the last insult of the War Depart- ent, that order, devised in the same pirit which a few weeks later dictated the rder sending the victor of South Moun- ain and Antietam to report at Trenton. he order was derisive. "General McClel- n commands that portion of the Army f the Potomac that has not been sent rward to General Pope's command." ow they must have chuckled at the War epartment over the keen wit of this rder. It was issued on the afternoon of ugust 30th, and after the receipt from eneral McClellan of his dispatch of 2:10 . M., saying :

"I have no sharpshooters except the uard around my camp. I have sent off very man but those, and will now send em with the train, as you direct. I will so send my only remaining squadron of valry with General Sumner. I can do more. You now have every man of the rmy of the Potomac who is within my ach."

Certainly it was sharp satire, very keen nd biting wit, which dictated, after that st sentence, the words of the order : Gen. McClellan commands that portion the Army of the Potomac that has not en sent forward !"

But the morning of the 31st brought to ashington some startling intelligence. alleck had been for four days busy re- ucing McClellan's position, finding fault, eglecting and even insulting him. The resident and Secretary of War had elded to the radical politicians who ere hounding the young general, and on e evening of the 30th, when the War De- rtment issued its order, Washington dicalism was jubilant, and all believed at there was truth in Pope's despatches nd that he was sweeping the rebel army th the besom of destruction. McClel- n was down, and a great victory won Pope. Men who were in Washington at night will remember the triumph of e radical faction. But the next day a ange came over the spirit of the radi- l dream. Halleck telegraphs McClel- n that he had not seen the order, and evidently begins to think that possi- y they have been a little too fast in ashington. The news from Pope is t rose-colored to-day. McClellan be- ns to loom up again in the minds of e managers.

"You will retain the command of everything in this vicinity not temporarily belonging to Pope's army in the field. I beg of you to assist me in this crisis with your ability and experience. I am entirely tired out."

So says General Halleck at 10:07 P. M. on the 31st. Well he might be tired. The experiment had failed. The whole plan of abandoning the peninsular campaign and disgracing McClellan was proving a disastrous failure. The "ability and experience" of McClellan was now worth thinking of once more. At half past eleven that night McClellan telegraphs Halleck that Pope was defeated, the road filled with wagons, and stragglers coming toward Alexandria ; that Pope's right is entirely exposed, that he fears the gravest consequences. He adds : "To speak frankly—and the occasion requires it—there appears to be a total absence of brains, and I fear the total destruction of the army."

"I shall be up all night," says McClellan from Alexandria. "I shall be up all night," says Halleck from Washington. It was a fearful night. The morning brought truth from Pope's army and wisdom to the heads in Washington. McClellan is sent for. All day disastrous intelligence comes in. McClellan is ordered to take command of the defences of Washington, but his orders are limited. They do not yet dare to face the indignation of the radical politicians, who would have seen Washington destroyed rather than McClellan restored. But the morning of the 2d leaves them in doubt no longer. The hope of the nation hangs on the man they had disgraced and ridiculed on the 30th. The President and General Halleck seek McClellan at his house and "commit everything" to his hands, directing him to go out and meet the returning army.

The crossing of the Potomac that day by McClellan is a scene for long remembrance. The shouts that went rolling over the hills, the exultation of men who had regarded themselves as doomed, but who now welcomed order. wisdom, genius, "ability and experience," all which they had proved and known—this has been described and is recorded. How the general took the shattered army, restored its morale, led it into Maryland, and in fourteen days won the victories of South Mountain and Antietam ; how Halleck complained of his slow march to South Mountain, and radicals everywhere growled sullenly over the salvation of the Capital by McClellan—this is already history.

It is sometimes curious as well as instructive to look back. We find outside of General McClellan's Report a piece of history which is illustrative of some of the points in it. When, on the memorable 2d of September, 1862, the President and General Halleck sought him at his house and begged him to save the capital and the nation, the radical faction who had accomplished his overthrow and disgrace a few days previous, were in the highest excitement. The indignation which they expressed was not measured by any ordinary terms of language. A very curious circumstance, which took place that day, may serve to illustrate the fear in which the Administration stood of these radicals who had surrounded and possessed them. The order restoring General McClellan to the command of the army, and placing the fate of the nation in his hands, was made in writing, probably after the interview of the President with him. In the Report this order does not appear. It is given in a foot note in the New York edition of Sheldon & Co. But the curious fact is this. The order was telegraphed to the New York papers on the evening of the 2d September, 1862. We published it the next morning, simultaneously with other newspapers. It was as follows:

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY,
ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, Sept. 2, 1862.

By direction of the President, Major General McClellan will have command of the fortifications of Washington, and of all the troops, for the defence of the Capital

By order of the Secretary of War.

E. D. TOWNSEND, A. A. General.

But this order seems to have raised a storm among the radicals which neither the President nor the Secretary of War cared to face. Can it be possible that at this moment, when the fate of the nation was trembling in the balance, such a consideration as political capital controlled the movements of the highest officials?

It would seem so, for the order was re-published in an amended form, suppressing the names of the President and the Secretary of war, and so far relieving them from any apparent connection with the restoration of McClellan to the command. On the 3d September, a despatch came from Washington, stating that the order should read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, Sept. 2, 1862.

Major General McClellan will have command of the fortifications of Washington, and of all the troops, for the defence of the Capital. By command of Major General HALLECK.

E. D. TOWNSEND, A. A. G.

Can any one assign a sensible reason for this change of a plain order, except the desire to suppress the names of the President and the Secretary of War in connection with it, for the sake of preserving favor with the radical enemies of McClellan?

Why was the order originally couched in such dubious language? Every one remembers that it was not till explained by telegraph that the people even understood that McClellan was in command of the whole Army of the Potomac. It was undoubtedly ingeniously worded to avoid the storm of radical indignation which was anticipated. Instead of a frank, noble order, expressing clearly the duties of the general on whom the very destiny of the republic was that day reposed, we have this ingenious phraseology sent forth to the nation, to deceive them into the idea that McClellan was only placed in command of the forts. So the radical papers declared at the time. It was only General Halleck's o der, placing McClellan in the fortifications—just t work he was suited for.

But mark the astounding truth now first made pla and public, though our readers will remember that v long ago inferred it from other facts. Under th order, ingeniously worded, and under no other order word of command from President, Secretary of War, General Halleck, bearing no authority but that whi this tricked-up form of words doubtfully gave him, Ge McClellan led the army into Maryland and gained t victories of South Mountain and Antietam. Halleck, will be borne in mind, expressly tells McClellan, his despatch of October 26, 1862: "Since you l Washington * * I have given you no orders." Neith had any one else, up to the close of Antietam. T simple truth was that McClellan, the only man Washington fit for the occasion, as the inaction every one else abundantly confesses, having be charged with the defence of the Capital, mount his horse when he thought the time a proper one, a went into the field to victory and the salvation of t Capital and of the nation. President, Secretary War, Halleck, all were paralyzed so far as anythi they said or did remains to indicate. They look idly on while McClellan saved them and the count Halleck indeed sent grumbling thunder after him o the wires. Thus, on the 9th Sept., Halleck telegraph "Until we have better advices about the numbers the enemy at Drainsville, I think we must be ve cautious about stripping too much the forts on the V ginia side."

Again, on the 13th, he growls: "You are wrong thus uncovering the Capital." Again, on the 14t "Scouts report a large force still on the Virginia si of the Potomac. If so, I fear you are exposing yo left and rear." Again, on the 16th, at 12.03 P. M Halleck telegraphs: "I think you will find that t whole force of the enemy in your front has crossed t river. I fear now more than ever, that they will cross at Harper's Ferry, or below and turn your le thus cutting you off from Washington."

One can imagine the smile of McClellan as he re that last despatch amid the thunders of the cannon the evening of the 16th—the evening before Antieta And Halleck, after these daily fits of tremor a nervousness about McClellan's uncovering the Capita after despatch on despatch, begging McClellan not get so far off from the Capital and leave them to t invasion of the rebels; after discouraging every step McClellan's advance in Maryland, up to the hour of t victory of Antietam, this same General Halleck co plains of the slow advance of McClellan in Maryland —talks about the astonishing fact that he marched on a few miles a day!—and writes an official report, a suming the credit of the campaign, saying that "M Clellan was directed to pursue him" (the enemy) in Maryland, after Pope's defeat. A year ago we e posed the untruthfulness of this assumption. Now it proved untrue. No such direction was given, but t whole Maryland campaign stands out as the work McClellan, untrammelled only because the people in Wa ington were so thoroughly frightened that for once th permitted a military man to conduct a campaign his own plans.

But what is to be said of the treatment these sam men gave McClellan when he had relieved them fro their fright and saved the Capital and the nation?

History will doubtless find the truth about these ma ters. McClellan will be honored by the remotest gen rations of Americans. Silent when ill treated, swi when called to serve his country, firm, faithful, true steel, trustworthy always, he is to-day nearer than an other man to him who was first in war, first in peac and first in the hearts of his countrymen. Washingto for a glorious memory; McClellan for a living leader!

FOR THE

Diffusion of Political Knowledge.

S. F. B. MORSE, Pres't. C. MASON, Cor. Sec., 13 Park Row, N. Y.

Remarks of Mr. Brooks in the House of Representatives, March 7th.

The Biggest Deficiency Bill ever known in the World's History.

Over 102 Millions beyond the Estimates.

War against Napoleon cost only $906,000,000 in Six Years.

WE SPEND $1,000,000,000 IN A SINGLE YEAR.

Lawless Use of the Public Money.

Thirty Millions to carry Elections under the mock name of Transportation.

Mr Brooks. Mr. Chairman, when the deficiency bill, then under seven millions, was before the House some time ago, I expressed my surprise at its magnitude, and referred to the estimates to show that the appropriations were far beyond what the Secretaries asked. I have none of those remarks to retract. I rise now to remind the House that the objections I then made to this bill have greater force to the extraordinary additions made to this bill as it reaches us amended, that is, added to, by the Senate. The original estimates submitted to the House for deficiencies for the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1864, were only $4,180,581 13. These were made up of estimates—

For civil list, foreign intercourse, and miscellaneous	$1,311,371 13
For Interior Department, (Indian)	4,210 00
For Navy Department	2,865,000 00

And here I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that though it must have been as well known then as now that the time of enlistment of a large body of our troops was about expiring, yet there was not a call for a dollar of "deficiency" from the War Department. The Secretary of War admitted, by his silence, that he had all the money he wanted. The Committee of Ways and Means, however, paid but little attention to the deficiency estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury, (4,180,581,) and the House of Representatives paid less, for both committee and House shot far beyond the original. As the bill went to the Senate it appropriated $7,469,109 65. The Senate sent it back to us with additional appropriations for deficiencies of $98,953,608. So the deficiency bill, as added to by the Senate, stands forward with the gigantic appropriation of $106,424,718 20. The Committee of Ways and Means have amended that bill by striking out $151,000, and the deficiency bill, as amended by the Committee of Ways and Means, asks us to appropriate $106,271,218. The table may be stated thus :

Amount contained in original (House) bill	$7,469,109 65
Senate amendments thereto	98,953,608 75
Total	$106,422,718 40
Amount inserted by Senate, in which the Committee of Ways and Means recommended non-concurrence	151,500 00
Total amount in bill as now reported	$106,271,218 00

Mr. Stevens. The gentleman from New York will not fail to say that the Committee of Ways and Means do not ask that sum. That is the amount of the bill as returned from the Senate. The Committee of Ways and Means ask only about eight millions. All the remainder has been sent from the Senate. I will say to the gentleman that the committee have concluded to ask the House to non-concur in all the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. Brooks. I take the report of the action of the Committee of Ways and Means as annexed to the bill itself, in which they recommend concurrence in the first, second, fourth, fifth, sixth, sixth and a half, eighth, ninth, tenth, thirteenth, fourteenth, and sixteenth amendments of the Senate.

Mr. Stevens. That is so, but at a subsequent meeting of the Committee they thought it best to non-concur, if the House would agree to it.

Mr. Brooks. I am correct, then.

Mr. Stevens. Correct in reference to the first action of the committee.

Mr. Brooks—I am both pleased and amazed at the change of action now first announced upon the part of the Committee of Ways and Means. I am pleased because the idea of non-concurrence shows they are appalled with the magnitude of the Senate appropriations as well as so humble a member of the House as myself. But I am more than amazed that they propose to take from this House, by the simple proposition to non-concur, the deliberate and detailed action of the House upon these enormous expenditures, and abandon the constitutional powers and functions of this House to examine in detail all these amendments of the Senate, and to throw that whole power from us into the hands of a mere committee of conference to be appointed by the Chair. To non-concur with the Senate upon this bill in its present stage is to abandon all our right, all our authority, all our duty to examine the details of expenditures proposed by the action of the Senate, and to throw the whole discussion and deliberation, which justly belong to this House, exclusively into the hands of a committee of conference

The result of such action has recently been seen on the whiskey bill. That bill was lost in this House by a large majority, defeated over and over again, the House having affirmed its intention to pass a retroactive law upon the stock of whiskey on hand; yet the House was by mere parliamentary action, or by the action of a committee of conference, deprived of its legitimate power to impose a retroactive duty, as it intended upon the stock on hand, and the Senate, by concurrence with the adhering action of the House was enabled to pass the bill almost as originally intended by the Senate, despite all the resolves and re-resolves of the House.

I warn the House, therefore, in a bill of this enormous magnitude, disposing of over a hundred and five million dollars, not to abandon at this stage of the bill its legitimate function of examination in detail by bestowing it upon a mere committee of conference.

Mr. Colfax, (the Speaker.)—The gentleman will allow me to correct him as to a matter of fact. The reason why the bill did not have the retroactive feature in it when it finally passed, is because the House did not appoint a committee of conference at the last, but upon the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Stevens] adhered to its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate, and allowed the Senate to recede from its amendments, thus leaving the bill without the retroactive feature.

Of course the gentleman will be just to the Chair by saying that in each instance a majority of the members of the committee on the part of the House agreed in their votes with the majority of the House.

Mr. Brooks.—I was far from casting any imputation whatever upon the action of the Speaker. He fairly represented on the committee of conference the majority of the House. I was but showing that though the House had determined by forty majority to have the thing its own way and repeated that determination over and over again by ten and fifteen majority, yet by parliamentary action the determination of the House was reversed and the bill passed without this retroactive feature.

Mr. Colfax.—It was because the House refused to raise another committee of conference, but under the operation of the rules voted an adherence. The Senate then receded, and the bill passed.

Mr. Stevens. The bill as it passed is precisely as the House agreed to it.

Mr. Brooks. I understand all that. I comprehend the parliamentary tactics, comprehended them at the time, and if I had not intended to vote with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I should have resisted his proposition. It is because he is the old parliamentarian that he is now taking, that he would still wish, if he could, to take, from the discussion and examination of this House the details of this bill by the action of a conference committee, by transferring the forum of discussion——

Mr. Dawes—The gentleman makes a mistake. The reason why we have not a tax upon whiskey on hand now, is not because of parliamentary tactics. There is no trace of parliamentary tactics about it, and a reference to the facts will show it. The House put a tax on whiskey on hand. The Senate struck that out as an amendment; it came back to the House, and the House concurred in that amendment; and the reason why there is no tax upon whiskey on hand today is because the majority of the House, in its legitimate functions, and in discharging its duty, without the aid or skill of my friend from Pennsylvania (Mr. Stevens) at all, concurred in the action of the Senate. It was done by the concurrent action of the two Houses, and not by any committee of conference; and that is the reason why there is no tax on whiskey on hand.

Mr. Brooks. I comprehend all that thoroughly.

Mr. Dawes. Then the gentleman has less excuse for misstating it.

Mr. Brooks. I comprehend it perfectly and do not misstate it. I will not take time to discuss this matter. I simply state the fact that this House, at one time by forty-four majority, and at other times by majorities of ten and twelve, resolved and re-resolved to tax the whiskey on hand, and the whiskey on hand is not taxed despite the resolution of the House. The country understands that, and we will not dispute about the ways and means by which it was done. I say it was parliamentary tactics and conference committees. Other gentlemen think differently. The great facts are before us: the modus operandi we will not dispute about.

Mr. Chairman, whiskey is an exciting and entrancing question, and I have been led altogether from the figurative speech I have on hand to the discussion of a far more exciting and thrilling topic than that of a mere bill of deficiencies.—But tempting as is the theme, I must recall the attention of the House, however, to the dryer topic which we have on hand, namely, this $106,271,218 appropriation, as a Deficiency for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1863, and ending June 30, 1864.

I call the attention of the House first to the fact that in this deficiency bill there are for the War Department alone appropriations amounting to about ninety-nine millions, when at the beginning of the session, in the estimates submitted by the War Department through the Secretary of the Treasury, not one single cent was asked for by the Secretary of War for a deficiency in his appropriations. And yet now, when all the facts relating to deficiencies must have been just as well known to the Secretary of War in the beginning of the session; and now that Secretary comes before the Senate, and through the Senate before this House, without any estimates whatever being submitted to this House, and asks an additional appropriation of over ninety-eight millions to make up a deficiency in the appropriation for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1864.

Why, sir, the whole expenses of this Government in the year 1815, during the last war with Great Britain, that contest which this then comparatively feeble nation carried on with the greatest Power upon earth, were but $48,244,495. The expenses of the Army for that war were, in 1813, $19,662,013 02; in 1814, $20,350,806 86; in 1815, $14,794,294 22; and yet the deficiency asked for by the Secretary of War for one single year amounts to four and five times the cost of any one year of the war of 1812.

The whole appropriations of this Government in 1847-48, the years of the Mexican war, were but little over sixty millions per annum. The actual expenses of the War Department were, in 1847, $35,776,495; in 1848, $27,838,374. And that war, which was not upon our own soil, but was costly in the transfer of troops from our own country to a foreign country; that war, in which our troops, landing at Vera Cruz, passed on through the tierra caliente, the hot region of Mexico, to its mountains, to Churubusco and Chapultepec, on to the Garita of Mexico; that glorious war, in which we humbled Mexico and brought the Mexicans to our own terms, cost this Government but $35,776,495, the highest sum in the year 1847; and yet here is a war deficiency bill of over ninety-eight millions for the War Department alone for one year, or over sixty-three millions beyond what the war with Mexico cost a year.

There is something wrong in all this; there must be something wrong; and hence the House should not abandon its functions, but should look into these expenditures, and see when, how, and where this money has been appropriated, and where these enormous sums of money have gone, who have had them, in what quarters they have been paid, why they are called for, and what they are to effect. Sir, if these disbursements for the War Department are to go on for three, four, or five years longer, it will be beyond the power of this country or of any other country on the face of the earth to endure them.

The Secretary of War in his estimates for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1864, (see Treasury Report, page 30), asked for and had appropriated $885,479, 511. The Secretary of the Treasury, when he submitted that report to Congress, felt sure in his own mind that $885,479,511 was ample and enough for all the expenditures of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1864, and hence not a single cent additional was then called for either by the Secretary of the Treasury or by the Secretary of War himself. And yet here in February and March we propose to add to this already appropriated sum of $885,479,511, a deficiency in this bill of $98,500,000. What calculations are all these? Can man thus carry on war, or provide the men and means for carrying on war?

More than that. Recall a little of the past history of our legislation during this session. At an early period of the session, before the Christmas holidays, there went through this House, in twenty minutes by the clock, a deficiency of $20,000,000 for bounties—a million a minute—uncalled for by the Secretary of War, or by the Secretary of the Treasury in his estimate. I made some quiet remarks on that occasion. I called the attention of the other side of the House to the subject, but I found that my remarks were not pleasant to the other side, and I refrained from discussing the subject at length, leaving the responsibility with those to whom it belonged.

In a few days after the Christmas holidays, the Secretary of War called upon us to change that bounty appropriation of $20,000,000, and in a very few minutes, opposed only by an honorable gentleman from Ohio, on the other side, there went quietly through a bill for bounties, which I said then had in it $100,000,000. Now, under the continuance of the bounty system to April 1, that bill has in it at least $124,000,000 to be added to the estimate of the Secretary of War. Take not my word for it. I quote from the Chairman of the Military Committee in the Senate (Mr. Wilson):

"I suppose that we have, since the 17th October, paid and agreed to pay for these bounties from ninety to one hundred million dollars. It must be over ninety millions, for we have paid bounties, I think, to very near three hundred thousand men. * * *

"I suppose if the payment of these bounties is extended and we go on raising men at the rate we are now raising them, that we shall raise during the coming month somewhere from sixty to eighty thousand men, paying a portion of them $400, and another portion $300."

Which, counting seventy thousand men at the average of $350 per man, will make $24,500,000; so that if you take the actual expenditures and appropriations of the Department as now put upon paper as recorded in the Treasury report, at $885,479,511, add to that $98,500,000 deficiency and $120,000,000 for bounty, there will have been appropriated for the War Department of this Government alone, for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1864, the gigantic sum of $1,103, 979,511.

Mr. Kellogg, of Michigan. I wish to correct the gentleman in one respect, if he will permit me.

Mr. Brooks. Certainly.

Mr. Kellogg, of Michigan. The payment of these bounties is extended over the whole term of enlistment, and only a small portion is to be expended this year.

Mr. Brooks. Not a small portion—a considerable portion.

Mr. Kellogg, of Michigan. One fourth, I think.

Mr. Brooks. What I am speaking about is the appropriations for this year. I do not suppose that the bounties will be all expended in th year.

Mr. Kellogg, of Michigan. About a fourth of the moneys to be expended in bounties will be expended this year.

Mr. Brooks. More than that. But, nevertheless, it is the sum of money appropriated that I am speaking of—the appropriations of Congress for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1864. The more money that is saved the better; but all these bounties are to be paid in some time or other.

I hold in my hand a record of the expenses of the British army from 1810 to 1816, in each year—those terrible years of struggle in which the little island of Great Britain and the lesser isle of Ireland were coping against the gigantic power of Napoleon, who had taken the French armies in triumph from the sands of Egypt to the snows of Moscow—that little island which was subsidizing all the other powers of Europe to fight her battles against that mighty Napoleon.—The expenditures in the British army in the year

1810 were $84,415,000; and in 1813, on the closing scenes of the battle of Waterloo, they were $171,035,000. The aggregate expenditures for the seven years from 1810 to 1816 inclusive, were $906,730,000. The details were thus:

Expenditures of the British army in the years—
1810	$84,415,000
1811	90,680,000
1812	119,345,000
1813	124,935,000
1814	147,345,000
1815	168,975,000
1816	171,035,000
Total	$906,730,000

But, sir, for the single fiscal year of 1863-64, we, who are coping with no Napoleon, with no combination of powers for our overthrow—but with a few rebellious States, starting without resources and full of all the elements of weakness, we have appropriated more money in a single year to subdue the rebellion than was appropriated for the whole British empire in the six years from 1810 to 1816 to subdue the august Napoleon, at the time combining all the continental nations of Europe for British overthrow.

I do not allude to these things for the purpose of creating alarm or exciting the fears of the country, only to arouse the country to comprehend the magnitude of this war, and to begin now to lay the necessary taxation to support it, so that we may not in the future find ourselves unable to sustain the credit of the country. That is my object and intention in calling the attention of the House to the enormous expenditures of the War Department.

A thousand million dollars per annum, Mr. Chairman, a billion dollars—I do not know how it is with others,—but I must confess that to my humble mind these sums are so appalling that I can hardly begin to comprehend their gigantic magnitude when we are called upon to transmit them to our children as a public debt. I confess that I often turn back to the olden times in the history of this Government. I was here in this House at a time when the expenditure by this Government of forty-four, forty-six, or forty-eight millions was regarded as an enormous extravagance, and that was not long ago, in 1849-50, 1851-52. I recollect when the then chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, then an honorable gentleman from Alabama, well known to the present chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, educated in a country where cotton even was not raised, but in northern Alabama, where corn and wheat were the productions, and where a dollar was estimated by the price of a bushel of corn or the price of a bushel of wheat—I recollect well how appalled he was at the enormous magnitude of the expenditure by this Government of forty-four, forty-six, or forty-eight million dollars. Indeed, he had a mind so constituted that members who served with him upon the floor of the House will remember that he could not comprehend anything above half a million dollars. Whenever a sum came up in our appropriations of as much as a hundred thousand dollars he was wont to be confused, but when it ran up to half a million dollars he would often abandon his appropriation bill and exclaim, "Good God, what is the country coming to?" Why, sir, if he was here this day he would be lost in inextricable confusion by these enormous appropriations for the War Department only.

Indeed, we in the great cities who are somewhat accustomed to figures, and who represent millionaires, will soon be compelled, if these expenditures go on, to bring to our aid something more than mere arithmetic, the science of geometry or mensuration say, and measure a million by an inch, a billion by two inches, a trillion by three inches, a quadrillion by four inches, a quintillion by five inches, and so on, or if that does not present numeration or measurement sufficient to enable us to understand these sums, we shall have to resort to the science of algebra, apply x as an unknown quantity of expenditure, and work with that. An equation may be stated thus: AB+CD×EF=XYZ=LMNOPQ. [Laughter.]

Sir, it is becoming beyond the power of arithmetic or the power of simple mathematics to compute these appropriations, or to understand the loans or systems of loans on which they are being founded. The whole concern anon will be more puzzling than the consols or exchequers in the debt of England.

The estimates of the War Department for 1865 are, in round numbers, $536,000,000. Sir, it is evident from these appropriations for 1863-64 we are now making that if this war is to continue these estimates for 1865 are not worth the paper they are written upon, for the actual expenditure of the present fiscal year for 1864 of the War Department will amount to almost if not quite a thousand million dollars—certainly, if we pay up the war warrants of the quartermasters, their certificates of obligation, and the great debts now due to the States for money and troops advanced to the Federal Government for military services rendered.

Now, Mr. Chairman, is it right, is it proper, is it a legitimate mode of coming before the country with an estimate in December of only $4,180,581 deficiency, and then before the bill is perfected require, as sanctioned by the Senate, a deficiency of over $106,000,000? I repeat, sir, is it right or just to the country thus to throw dust in their eyes? Is it not wise, is it not now our duty at the start to look this war with all its consequences fully in the face and to provide for this enormous expenditure and these enormous appropriations the only means by which, if the war is to be persisted in, the credit of the country can be sustained, a system of taxation which shall be proportionate to our expenditure? Is it just for us to leave for posterity the full payment of these loans? Sir, under a concordant Cabinet, or any unit administration of the Government, these discords between estimates and appropriations could not occur. But every Secretary we see now "runs his own machine." The Secretary of State runs his, and thrusts in appropriations for lawless foreign missions; the Secretary of War runs his, and thrusts in over ninety-eight millions of deficiencies, two months after he says he has enough in the annual appropriations; the Secretary of the Navy runs his; while the Secretary of the Treasury, the victim of all, because he has to find paper money for all, runs his printing machines, and his presidential machine, one and all. Is it any wonder that under such an administration of the Government we are annually spending more money to subdue a few million starving Rebels than Great Britain spent in six years to bring down the world-wandering eagles of the great Napoleon?

I availed myself on a former opportunity to denounce this whole system of deficiency bills. I showed that appropriations were made without law. I exhibited in this bill, and it is here reproduced, the creation of four hundred and forty odd clerks utterly without law. I showed the creation of a foreign mission by the Secretary of State without law.

The recklessness of law has become so rife among the Departments that even the Commissioner of Agriculture turns up in this bill in the most extraordinary demand for a deficiency.—When we have deficiencies in the Departments it is not to be wondered at that the Commissioner of Agriculture comes before Congress and tells it that he has purchased things without law for which he must have an appropriation. I find in the Senate amendments the following:

To supply deficiencies in the Department of Agriculture for the current year, as follows:
For the purchase of sorghum seed $2,000.
For rebuilding shop in the propagating garden, $800
For postage, $1,320.
For carpets, furniture, cans for fruit $350
For fuel, $300.

This is the farcical part of the bill. I allude to it not in resistance to the purchase of these humble matters, for seed may do some good to the country, while appropriations for this war are all lost except as they may serve to restore the Union. This gentleman with the illustrious name, in a letter to the Finance Committee of the Senate, says:

"The destructive frosts of last autumn in a large part of the West rendered entirely worthless many important seeds which I have been called upon to supply, chief of which is the sorghum, now becoming one of the most important crops in the country. In several of the large States the seed was so generally destroyed that I have felt obliged, at the urgent call of the farmers, to send abroad for a fresh supply of pure seed."

Great sorghum-seed seller!

"An increasing belief among the people in the feasibility of producing an excellent article of silk from the ailanthus silkworm, and repeated inquiries for the means of its production, have led me to order a large quantity of cocoons from France, where it has proved a perfect success."

Importer of cocoons!

"An extensive failure of the corn crops, with other causes, has created a great demand for new and different varieties of wheat for both fall and spring sowing, which has been met by importations from England, Russia, and the Mediterranean, and by purchases of improved varieties of American growth."

Great wheat-seed dealer!

"The very great and increasing interest in the culture of the grape, and the consequent demand for vines, has induced a large increase in the expenses of the propagating garden."

Vines for the propagating garden! Well, well! All this in a deficiency bill. What next may we be coming to?

The Commissioner of the Department of Agriculture gives no excuse for his lawless purchase of carpet, furniture, and cans for fruit, except that he has expended the money, and wants an appropriation for it!

This is a mere farce. It is not worthy of notice, except to show that the higher officers of the Government, by the creation of foreign missions, by enormous expenditures, without law, have induced the Commissioner of Agriculture to purchase canned fruit, sorghum seed, carpet, and furniture, all in humble imitation of the higher powers that thus act without law.

But there are other appropriations in this bill, which are far from being farcical, and which may be termed tragical. To these I call the attention of the House. The quartermaster comes before the country, and asks for $25,000,000 deficiency for additional transportation for the Army for the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1864. The Senate have increased that, and increased it to $30,000,000 in the bill now before the House. The Quartermaster General says:

"This deficiency is caused by the activity of movement of the armies, the great expense of the transportation of the army operating against Vicksburg, the transfer of army corps from the army of the Potomac to the division of the Mississippi, the Texas expedition, the transportation furnished to veteran volunteers to and from their homes, furloughed or re-enlisting, and the purchase of transports."

But the Quartermaster General has not told the whole truth. These $30,000,000 deficiencies have also been made necessary by the transportation of troops to influence and carry elections in the country. If we could have the details of these quartermaster expenditures the House would find that a large part of this new deficiency was created in the expense of the transportation of a regiment or two to New Hampshire a year ago to carry the election in that State. If we could have a history of the transportation of troops we would find that several regiments and portions of regiments supposed to be favorable to the dominant party were carried to and fro to vote at the expense of the Government. There has been transportation of the Army solely to execute the purposes of the party in power.

If we could have the history of the transportation of the Army, we would find that a large number of troops selected for being favorable to the Administration party were sent last October and November to New York, Pennsylvania, or to the Western States, and afterwards to Maryland and Delaware to carry the election there. There is where the deficiency of $30,000 000 reported by the Committee of Ways and Means is mainly due. It is due to the efforts of the War Department to carry the elections of the country. There is where the money has gone. It is not for the legitimate expenditures of this war; it is not for the capture, overthrow, and destruction of the rebel army, and it is not to plant the stars and stripes upon the capitol hill of Richmond, or on the forts of Mobile and Charleston; but it is to subdue the Democracy, the conservative power of New Hampshire, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and of the great West; in short, to overawe by arms before the ballot boxes the people of the country. I denounce it with all the vigor and power of which I am capable. Here and hereafter, will I denounce it, and I appeal from the majority of this House to the God of Heaven to put the mark of reprobation upon these wicked and criminal acts; I appeal to the genius of liberty which has so long hovered over and protected this hitherto blessed country to overthrow the party in power, that thus illegitimately perverts the valor and the generosity and the patriotism of a great people to overthrow their free institutions. I appeal to history and to posterity to brand with everlasting infamy the men who thus bring arms into elections, and who with the cartridge-box trample the ballot-box under foot. I know I shall not be heard or heeded on the floor of this House; but the brand of history and the curse of posterity will be the just doom of all these destroyers of the liberties of their country.

Mr. Morris, of New York. I would like to inquire of my colleague whether it would not be less expensive to let the soldiers of New York vote in the Army than to send them home?

Mr. Brooks. I do not choose now to be drawn into that discussion.

I voted for this first deficiency bill of $7,000,000. I voted for it not cheerfully, but because in time of war it seemed necessary to be generous, extravagant, if you please, in generosity. I have voted for all the appropriation bills which have gone from this House, but I am going to leave this bill to be voted for by such as approve these Quartermaster deficiencies in it. Some time since it was remarked by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Davis] in good Virgilian Latin, that the times "did not need help from this side of the House or such helpers as we are." I am disposed to accept him and his friends at his word—to let them pass this large deficiency bill. As for myself, I shall not vote a single dollar as a deficiency for transportation for the Army until this transporting of the military to carry the elections is disproved. Those who favor such an appropriation as this must and shall vote for it. As for myself I never will take the responsibility of voting for a single cent of it, and in justification of my course upon this subject I shall appeal to the public, whom I desire to bear in mind that this House has not before it a single item of legitimate estimate for any of these deficiencies and appropriations. The Committee of Ways and Means may have had them, but the House has not got them. There has been no inquiry what the expenditures have been in New England, in the Northern States, in Maryland, and in the Western States; and until we have a detail of these expenditures for election purposes, if not a single other vote is given against this bill, I shall on this deficiency bill, with the greatest pleasure with which I have given any vote in my life, vote "No."

How an Additional Loan of 11 Millions of Dollars was Created without Law, and how $444,000 in Premiums were Pocketed by Corruptionists from it.

[Remarks of Mr. Brooks upon the Items in the Civil Bill, Appropriating Considerable Sums for Treasury "Contingencies"]

Let us strike all of them out, (said Mr. Brooks.) I move to strike them out. The Treasury has no need for appropriations for Contingencies,—for the way in which it is now managed, it can be made a self-supporting institution.

Sir,—we were called upon here, in this Hall, a few days ago,—as if it would now seem, in utter mockery, to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue Eleven Millions of additional 5-20 Bonds,—beyond the $500,000,000 before authorized by law. We went through all the mock forms of Legislation,—as if we had been real bona fide men, with brains as well as bodies, to thus authorize the Secretary to exceed this Five Hundred Million act by Eleven Million more. We were told, gravely told,—that it was indispensibly necessary to give the Secretary this authority, because nearly $11,000,000 had been bid for beyond the amount sanctioned by Law, and that he could not distinguish these real late bids, from antecedent bids on the authorized Loan. The House gave the Secretary what he asked for.—but judge of what tools were made of us, when, by the March 1st Report of the Debt of the Treasury, we find that the Secretary even then had issued over $510,000,000 of the Loan, Ten Million beyond the Law,—and beyond the authority, which in this Congress was not given im till March 4th or 5th!

Now, sir, let us look into this transaction. Let us calculate the profits of it, and ask who got these profits. These Eleven Millions of additional 5-20's were worth, March 4th, from 10. to 108 premium,—that is to say, for every one hundred dollars thus loaned, the Government could have got in the New York market a premium of $108. The profit, hence, was not altogether that, because there was an accruing interest of about 3 per cent., so that the profit only was but 4 per cent. Now this premium profit of 104 for 100 on Eleven Millions of additional stock was worth $444,000 to somebody. Who has it? Where has it gone? It is not pretended that it is in the Treasury, or if it is there, it pays ten times over all these contingencies for the Treasury, in this bill, and therefore we need not vote a single cent of appropriation to provide for them. I know, sir, full well, where these $444,000 have gone,—not exactly into whose hands,—but into what class of hands,—into the hands of Pet Brokers, who surround and envelope the Treasury, and fatten and gorge upon the miseries of their country and their countrymen. These $444,000 premiums have been thrown away upon favorites, and thrown away when the country is suffering in all the agonies of war. All I can do, Mr. Chairman, is here on the floor of this House, as a representative of the people, to expose and denounce such transactions. All I can do is to make a record of them for the people, and for the Historian hereafter,—as a specimen of the corruption and fraud of the times. I discharge my duty—but it is now all in vain. No man now can be heard or heeded, amid the corruptions that surround this capital.

HON. JAMES BROOKS' SPEECH

Before the Union Democratic Association, 932 Broadway, Tuesday Evening, December 30, 1862.

"HOLD FAST TO THE CONSTITUTION."

"CLING TO THE CONSTITUTION. AS THE SHIPWRECKED MARINER CLINGS TO THE LAST PLANK, WHEN NIGHT AND THE TEMPEST CLOSE AROUND HIM."—Daniel Webster.

The President of the Union Democratic Association, the Hon. LUKE F. COZANS, after some appropriate remarks upon the services rendered by the Association, said, that a speaker would now address them, by whose ability and eloquence, the large audience present would be well rewarded for their attendance on so stormy an evening. He, therefore, introduced the Hon. JAMES BROOKS. After the repeated and prolonged cheering that welcomed Mr. Brooks, had subsided, he said:—

MR. CHAIRMAN AND GENTLEMEN—If any of you expect from me this evening, any exciting, or excited remarks, you will be disappointed. There are times so impressive, crises in public affairs so solemn, that any flourishes of rhetoric, any pompous display of periods, or sesquipedalian words, but detract from the gravity and dignity of the theme. Hence, in the crisis of a civil war like ours, where the blood of kith and kin is poured forth like water, and when this civil war is becoming complicated in fresher, and yet more fearful issues, the simplest language becomes the sublimest expression. (Applause.) The ancient heathen orators in times like these, when they were wont to address their public assemblies, invoked their Dii Immortales, their Immortal Gods. How much more then, should Christians, who assemble now, in the midst of Battle and Blood, invoke the immortal God to guide our deliberations. (Applause,)

THE TWO PROCLAMATIONS AND WAR ORDER OF SEPTEMBER, 1862.

When I last had the honor of addressing this Association, late in September last, there were threatening the people two PROCLAMATIONS and one WAR ORDER: One Proclamation threatening the people of the North, that if they discussed the other, the War Order would, through Courts Martial or Provost Marshals, suspend Process, Bail, Jury Trial, Habeas Corpus, and arrest and incarcerate all engaged in such discussion. The Civil Courts were to be suspended, and Military Courts were to be substituted in their places. The very first opportunity after the promulgation of these Edicts, I ventured in this Hall to denounce them, as in violation, not only of Magna Charta, the Common Law of England and of the United States, and of the rights of man, but of the Constitution of the United States, and of our State of New York; and you, in your responses, here in this Hall and elsewhere, so ably, so eloquently supported and cheered me, that the Edicts fell powerless before a brave and determined People. The President, indeed, who fulminated these Edicts, under the influence of our, and other elections, the offspring of what we proclaimed, we would have, viz.: free discussion, recalled, nullified, abrogated his War Order, and that Proclamation Edict which threatened to subvert all Liberty in the North. The Provost Marshals shrank back before the majesty of an indignant People, and the Judges and the Courts were re-inaugurated, reinstalled by that People. (Cheers.)

THE PROCLAMATION OF JANUARY, 1863.

But, gentlemen, there is left now another proclamation, not annulled,—that, for the South and Southwest,—in force, or if possible, to be put in force January 1st, 1863,—which I propose, this evening more fully to discuss. (Applause.) The President does not claim, nor do the President's friends claim, that for this Proclamation he has any warrant, in or under the Constitution of the United States,—whereby, thus, he subverts, or attempts to subvert, whole States, with the whole organization of their society,—their statute, their civil, their municipal, as well as their constitutional laws; nor does he claim, that under the laws of nations, he has any such prerogative or power, save what is indefinitely declared to be the laws of war, the war power, or the military necessity of war. I propose, this evening, gentlemen, to discuss all these weighty matters, and you must put up with, as a necessity of this discussion, the recitation of some of our past history, and with the reading of such documents as proof makes necessary, however heavy such reading may be in a popular assembly. (Cries of "Go on. It is what we want to hear.")

WAR FOR THE CONSTITUTION.

Gentlemen, as I said at the start, we are in the midst of a bloody civil war, the magnitude of which is unlike anything in the record of human history, except the civil wars of Rome, that drenched the huge Roman Empire in human gore. We, who were not of the Administration, were driven into this war, reluctantly driven in, by the force of unhappy events, and by the then solemn pledge of the Administration, that it was a war, only to maintain the Government and the Constitution of the United States, with the integrity of the Union. (Applause.) We are not now, and we never pretended to be, supporters of the Administration. We drew at first, as we draw now, the Constitutional distinction between supporting the Government, and a temporary administration of that Government. (Applause.) We recognize no loyalty, nor fealty, nor allegiance due to any mere administration of the Government, to no mere man, in no one branch of it,—Executive, Legislative, or Judicial,—but we do recognise fealty, loyalty, love, devotion, with the whole heart and soul, as due to that great charter of human liberty known as the Constitution of the United States. (Loud and prolonged cheering.) That Constitution, in my earlier days, when not as well booked up as I am now, I supposed to be some impromptu inspiration of Divine Wisdom, far above all human intelligence, or human instinct,—the work of men inspired, as were the Holy Apostles, who handed down to us the Holy Scriptures, and I revered and worshipped that Constitution as the Bible guide on earth to men struggling for Law and Liberty. But upon fuller and maturer reading, I discovered, that our Fathers of the Constitution were not so much inspired men, as condensers or codifiers of centuries of human wisdom, the writers up, and abridgers of human law, the common law of England,—of the principles, rights, liberties, our British forefathers, after five or six centuries of struggle, wrested from the Kings and Despots of England, and affixed to great charters of Human Rights, the Magna Charta of 1215 won sword in hand by the Barons of England from King John, or the Petition of Right 1628, or the Habeas Corpus 1679, or the Bill of Rights 1689. The Constitution of the United States brought to a focus these great Lights of Liberty, Law, Human Progress and Civilization. The eyes of our fathers were then but the lenses of the Past to see their Present, and so to provide for the great Future. (Applause).

THE IMMEDIATE CAUSE AND THE PLEDGE OF THE WAR.

Hence, when in December, now two years gone by, after the Presidential election, there assembled in South Carolina, a Convention of the States, enacting an ordinance of secession, separating that State from the United States and from the Constitution of the United States, which had not gratified South Carolina in that election: Hence, when in the subsequent February there assembled in Montgomery, Alabama, a convention of a few other States, subverting and annulling the Constitution of the United States, and not only that, but creating a new Constitution, and changing the old Flag,—both the reason and the sentiment of the country felt indignant, and uprose to express that indignation. The magazine so well prepared for explosion during twenty-five years of preparation by extreme men, both North and South, was fired at Fort Sumter, and the explosion took place, involving some thirty millions of people in its destruction. The North uprose in mass almost,—not to maintain or uphold Abraham Lincoln, or the Cabinet Administration of Abraham Lincoln,—but to uphold the Constitution, the three branches of the Government of the United States, its Judiciary as well as its Executive, and Legislative authority. (Applause.) "The Constitution shall be maintained:" "The Flag shall be respected:" "The Union must and shall be preserved," were the universal rallying cries of the Northern People. (Applause.) The Rebel Enemy authoritatively, through one of its Cabinet officers (Mr. Walker), avowed its intent to march upon, and to seize, Washington;—and hence, when the President called for his 75,000 men, more than a million were earnest to volunteer to protect the Capital, to uphold the Flag, to stand by the Constitution. The war then, was solely and avowedly for the maintenance of the Constitution, and the Flag as the symbol of that Constitution.

THE PLEDGE OF THE INAUGURAL.

The President himself, in his Inaugural, March 4th, 1861, thus pledged himself against the Abolitionists in his own party, and against his Proclamation of Abolitionism:

"I have no purpose, directly or indirectly, to INTERFERE with the institution of slavery in the States where it exists. I believe I have no lawful right to do so, and I have no intention, to do so."

THE PLEDGES OF THE HOUSE.

The House of Representatives, by a nearly unanimous vote, in February, 1861, passed the following resolutions:

Resolved, That neither the Federal Government nor the people or governments of the non-slaveholding states have a purpose or a constitutional right to legislate upon or interfere with slavery in any of the States of the Union.

Resolved, That those persons in the North who do not subscribe to the foregoing proposition are too insignificant in numbers and influence to exite the serious attention or alarm of any portion of the people of the Republic, and that the increase of their numbers and influence does not keep pace with the increase of the aggregate population of the Union.

THE CRITTENDEN PLEDGE.

In July, 1861, was introduced into the House, and passed almost unanimously, (only two dissenting,) the well known Crittenden Pledge or Resolution, viz.:

"That the present deplorable civil war has been forced upon the country by the disunionists of the Southern States, now in arms against the constitutional government, and in arms around the Capitol: that in this national emergency, Congress, banishing all feeling of mere passion or resentment, will recollect only its duty to the whole country; that this war is not waged on their part in any spirit of oppression, or for any purpose of conquest or subjugation, or purpose of overthrowing or interfering with the rights or established institutions of those States, but to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution, and to preserve the Union with all the dignity, equality and rights of the several States unimpaired; and that, as soon as these objects are accomplished, the war ought to cease."

THE SENATE PLEDGE.

In the Senate, Mr. Sherman, of Ohio, had introduced, and the Senate had passed, a like resolution. Thus three branches of the Legislative Government—the Executive, the Senate, the House—solemnly pledged itself to the country to carry on a war, only for the SUPREMACY OF THE CONSTITUTION. The armies were created, and the soldiers were enlisted upon that solemn pledge,—and, upon many a battle field, many a life has been freely offered up to carry out, defend, protect, and promulgate that pledge. This was the war, the North entered into,—the war of the Conservative men of the North,—the war of the great Democratic Party. We never committed ourselves to any other war (cheers), and they who are for breaking these pledges, or for creating another war,—or, who have committed us to, or enlisted us in this war, under what now seems false pretences, or false pledges,—they are in honor bound to dismiss us from this war, and to carry it on, themselves. (Loud and prolonged cheering, many of the audience rising and waving their hats.)

THE REVERSE PICTURE—THE PROCLAMATION OF SEPTEMBER 22D.

These being the pledges of Mr. Lincoln, the President, and of the Congress assembled in Washington, now look at the reverse picture, and say, who can, that the whole purpose, the whole programme of the war have not been changed? Say,—who can, that twenty millions of Northern white men are not now called upon to endure Conscription and Taxation, and to sacrifice themselves in Southern latitudes, mainly to free three or four million of negroes. (Applause) The President in his September 22d Proclamation says:

"On the first day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty three, all persons held as slaves within any State, or any designated part of a State, the people whereof shall then be in rebellion against the United States, shall be, thenceforward, and then, forever free; and the Executive Government of the United States, including the military and naval AUTHORITY thereof, will recognize and maintain the freedom of such persons, or any of them, in ANY effort, they may make for their actual freedom"

THE PRESIDENT'S EXTRAORDINARY USE OF WORDS.

Let me first call attention here to the extraordinary words of the Proclamation. The President speaks of himself, elected for but four years, two of them now nearly expired, as the EXECUTIVE GOVERNMENT OF THE UNITED STATES! Who created Abraham Lincoln the Government of the United States? Who created, who elected him, a man made of no better flesh and blood than the rest of us, to be the GOVERNMENT of thirty millions of people in the United States?

MR. BROOKS.—The people! Never! (Exciting cheers.) Never, NEVER did the people give him a majority of their suffrages. (Continued cheers.) He is a minority President, appointed by the operations of the Constitution in spite of the people of the United States. (Cheers.) A large majority of the people voted against him, and he was created President in, and under that very Constitution he would overthrow by his proclamations. (Great, and continued cheers.)

In this Proclamation, the President also speaks of "the Military and Naval AUTHORITY. Authority is a legal power, or a right to command, such as Prince over subject, as Parent over child. The Government has authority: or, the President acting in obedience to Law, and so the Precedents or Decisions of a Court, are authority or authorities; but the AUTHORITY of the Army or Navy is more novel even than this declaration of Mr. Lincoln, that I am the Executive Government of the United States,—for there is a precedent for that, in the French L'Etat c'est moi (I am the State.) The Army and Navy are the agencies of civil authority,—but, under our form of Government, they are no authority of themselves. When the State is the Emperor or the King, the Army or the Navy are only his means of executing his authority,—but, under our form of Government, they are no authority, only the military Agencies of the Civil Government of the United States. As names often are things, or more than things, I thus dwell in verbal criticisms upon these words. When a President sets himself up as the Executive Government of the United States, and calls the Army and Navy his authority for overriding States, and the Laws of States, and the Constitution of the United States, we cannot be too watchful of mere words. Naval and military men, then, be it understood, are but Agents, only, of civil authority, to execute Civil and Constitutional Law. (That's so; cheers.) The Army and the Navy are, certainly, not "authority," under any known or recognized "Executive Government of the United States" (Cheers.)

There is another part of the Proclamation, which chalks out, or seems to chalk out, a servile war, which contemplates, or seems to contemplate, the exciting of the slaves to the destruction not only of their masters, but of women and children, and to add the horrors of a servile, thus to the civil war. The words are—

"The Executive Government * * will recognize and maintain the freedom of such persons (negro slaves) * * * in any effort they may make for their actual freedom."

I do not know that the President means to excite a servile insurrection. I will not impute to him the horrible intent of converting the Southern country into a Hayti, or St. Domingo, with the "Authority" of his army and navy to help, but I say, that the language is susceptible of that meaning, and such meaning has been given to it throughout the civilized world. (Applause) When the "Executive Government" thus addresses negroes or slaves, words ought to be used that negroes or slaves cannot pervert into authority to burn, slay, destroy, without regard to condition, age, or sex. (Applause.)

THE HOUSE BREAKING ITS PLEDGES.

But the President alone is not responsible for this violation of the Pledge and Principle, that enlisted the conservative men of the country in this war. The House of Representatives thus, December, 1862, reversed the Crittenden Resolution of July, 1862, the Hon. Sam. C. Fessenden, of Me., offering the following Resolution, which passed, ayes 78, noes 51:

Resolved, That the Proclamation of the President, of the date of Sept. 22, 1862, is warranted by the Constitution; that the policy of emancipation as indicated therein is well adapted to hasten the restoration of peace, is well chosen as a war measure, and is an exercise of power with proper regard to the rights of citizens and the perpetuity of a free government.

ISSUE TAKEN ON PROCLAMATION POWER.

And now, my friends, here, we take issue on that Resolution, such as we took in September, here, in this Hall, on the Proclamation, pending that reign of terror, when moral courage was needed to speak, not as now, when we can speak, and dare to speak with freedom, of all the efforts of the administration of the government to subvert the law. When I said to you in the beginning of my remarks, that the Constitution of the United States was the embodiment of the common law of England and of the wisdom of our British ancestors for 500 years, I omitted to say that there was nothing in that Constitution which forbade Executive Proclamations. There are certain things so settled in human life, that it is not necessary to stipulate against them, such as the right to eat, to breathe, to live. When our British forefathers, in their second Revolution, stipulated against almost every form of executive despotic power, they did not deem it necessary expressly to stipulate against Proclamations, or to define the limits of uttering a Proclamation,—because the common law of England had long settled, that Kings could not make law by proclamation, or ordain law, or override law. When our Constitution was formed, such a practice had not been set up in England for 200 years. No monarch of England, for that long period of time, had attempted to exercise, by proclamation such powers and prerogatives as the President of the United States sets up in his Proclamation of September 22, 1862. (Applause)

Queen Elizabeth as long ago as 1580 began to make Law by Proclamation, then, against the Anabaptists of England, and against Irishmen straying away from home, and against seditious and schismatic books tending to prejudice the then rising Church of England. James the 1st prohibited by Proclamation country gentlemen from coming to London, and regulated, or attempted to regulate, the habiliments of their women and children. (Laughter.) Charles the 1st, unfortunately for himself, in prohibiting by Proclamation, emigration to New England, prohibited Cromwell and Hampden from emigrating there. Queen Elizabeth, however, respected her People enough, to listen to, and to yield to some of the remonstrances of that People against this power of Proclamation. Charles the 1st went to the Block, because of the unholy exercise of this, and similar Prerogatives and Powers. (Applause) The Tudors, and the Stuarts claimed not only the power to proclaim and to ordain Law by Proclamation, but the power to dispense with Law, and to suspend Law. What cost these dynasties their existence is that which calls itself "the Executive Government of the United States, and is now attempting upon us, Americans. (Applause.) Abraham Lincoln suspends Law,—the Habeas Corpus,—dispenses not only with Law, but even with the Courts of Law, and, by Proclamation, ordains Law. (Cheering.) Our Fathers did not stipulate against these Executive or Royal Prerogatives, in the Constitution,—because for 200 years in England, the exercise of such Prerogatives had scarcely been thought of. But what no King of England for two centuries dared to do,—what broke down the Tudors and the Stuarts, Abraham Lincoln is doing, and his upholders are claiming that he has a right to do. (Applause).

A PRONUNCIAMIENTO, NOT A PROCLAMATION.

Now, no man doubts the right of the President to utter a Proclamation; at times, it is his duty even,—but a Proclamation is one thing, and a PRONUNCIAMIENTO is another. The one is English, on English precedent; the other is Spanish, and comes to us from Spain, or, from the Revolutions of Spanish America. The Kings or Queens of England, utter Proclamations now,—and there are numerous precedents for them, from the Administration of Washington, on to this era and age,—but the Kings of England, now, and the previous Presidents of the United States, utter Proclamations, not to MAKE Law, or to ORDAIN Law, but to proclaim what the Law is, and to forewarn ill-disposed people against the violation of existing Common, Constitutional, or Statute Laws. The Queen of England, Queen-born, has forewarned her British subjects not to violate British (neutrality) Law,—but our four-years old President suspends Law, dispenses with Law, ordains Law, and overthrows both Constitutional and Statute Law. He pronounces (in the Spanish meaning of the word), not proclaims Law. He scorns Common Law, Statute Law, Constitutional Law, Latin Magna Charta, and Habeas Corpus, and English, as well as American written Constitutions, and introduces here, not from England, the PROCLAMATION, but from Spanish America, the Pronunciamiento, that is, REVOLUTION. A Proclamation upholds Law; the Pronunciamiento overthrows Law. The President has fulminated a Spanish Pronunciamiento.

NO SUCH MILITARY POLICY NECESSARY.

But, we are told this Pronunciamiento against whole States, or upon whole States, is, as a matter of mere military policy, or necessity, a wise exercise of the War Power; and it is insinuated that when the negro is thus "pronounced" free on paper, then Sambo, and Scipio and Cæsar will embrace their Rebel masters, and bring them into the ranks of our army, and surrender them as prisoners of war to the utterer of this Paper Proclamation. (Laughter and applause.) We shall see. We shall see. But I deny that there is any wisdom in this Paper as a war measure. I deny that it is a military policy. Its first effect has been to disunite the North, and to raise up a large majority in that North, certainly in the central States of the North, in opposition to this species of administration. (Applause.)—And the next effect has been, while thus disuniting the North, to unite the whole South as one man against a government carrying on a war on such principles. (A voice—"That's so.') We, who were united, have become a divided People, and they, who were divided, have become a united people;—and if this be military policy, I must say, I don't see it. Do you? (Laughter.) It is a matter of record, too, that since the utterance of this Paper, while Providence before blessed our arms, when fighting for the Constitution and the Laws; now, Providence in a good degree has ceased to smile upon us. Delaware, Maryland, Western Virginia, Kentucky and Missouri came to us under the Inaugural of the President and the Crittenden Resolutions; New Orleans was taken; Norfolk surrendered; nearly the whole coast of North Carolina became ours; a Union party more or less existed everywhere in the South;—while now, vast armies are in the field against us, fighting not alone for Independence, but for life, home, family, fireside, wife, children, everything dear to man. The military policy of the President has made popular, South, what was there but an odious conscription, and what the people were preparing to resist. A war, becoming unpopular, has there been made popular; while a war here, at the start popular, is becoming unpopular, because of the false pretences under which men were engaged or enlisted in it. (Applause.) Hence, I deny that there is any military necessity for this Paper, or, that there is any military policy in it. (Cheers.) It is costing us already seas of blood, and will cost us, if thus persisted in, the entailment of a debt upon generation after generation, so that labor, for centuries, will be subjected to capital. (Cheers)

NEGRO PROCLAMATIONS IN THE WAR OF THE REVOLUTION.

And now, as a matter of history, gentlemen, there is no one thing upon which the American people, or the United States Government, are more committed than against this use of negro-freeing Proclamations, or the use, in any way, of negroes in war, civil or foreign. The British Generals on our own Continent, pending our own Revolution of 1776, uttered Proclamations like this of Abraham Lincoln. Sir Henry Clinton and Sir William Howe proclaimed in New York, New Jersey and Pennsylvania the freedom of our negroes; Lord Dunmore did the like in Virginia, and Lord Cornwallis, further South. Our Statesmen and our Generals made good points of appeal to the civilization of the world against this British employment of Indians and negroes in civil war, and they spoke of the Indian savage and negro barbarism in the same breath. The use of such means and men, by Englishmen to subdue Englishmen, was pronounced to be against the law of nations, the law of nature, and the law of God. (Applause) That great man, Edmund Burke, whom Heaven had so gifted with intellect, that he seemed able to concentre the great lights of the Past, and to spread and to reflect them all over the Future,—that great man foresaw what England was driving America into, and often held up the lights of that luminous intellect to forewarn his countrymen to beware. What he, what Lord Chatham, and others, said in the British Parliament, ought now to be read and re-read by every North American. In an address to the King of England, exhorting that King not to drive the war to extreme measures, said Burke:

"To excite, by a Proclamation issued by your Military Governors, an universal insurrection of negro slaves in any of the Colonies, is a measure full of complicated horrors, absolutely illegal, suitable neither to the practice of war nor to the time of peace."

In an address to the then British Colonies, Mr. Burke said:

"We likewise saw with shame the African slaves, who had been sold to you in public faith, and under the sanction of acts of Parliament, to be your servants and guards, employed to cut the throats of their masters."

The effect of these remonstrances from Burke, from Chatham, and other liberal Englishmen, upon Parliament, against these proclamations for the use, or sudden liberation of negro slaves by the British generals, did more than anything to destroy the popularity of the war in England and to tempt the British government and people to end so wicked a war, by the recognition of their colonies as independent States. (Applause) Great Britain herself, as a government, confessed the Proclamation respecting the negroes to be so wrong that in the treaty of 1783, 7th article, is this solemn stipulation:

That His Britannic Majesty should, "with all convenient speed, and without causing any destruction, or carrying away of negroes, or other property of the American inhabitants, withdraw all his armies, garrisons and fleets from the United States, and from every part, and place, and harbor within the same."

When the treaty came to be executed, long controversies arose upon what definition should be given to this "carrying away of negroes, or other property." Whoever will look into the American archives will find long diplomatic papers, and then long diplomatic controversies,—and he will find, too, that not only such Southern men as Jefferson and Edmund Randolph, of Virginia, were committed against the abduction, use, or employment of negroes in war, freed by proclamation or otherwise, but such New Yorkers as John Jay and Egbert Benson. In the end the British government acquiesced in the justice of these remonstrances, and paid for the deported negroes, thus freed or abducted. (Applause.)

NEGRO PROCLAMATIONS IN THE WAR OF 1812.

A like passage of history was repeated after the war of 1812. Admiral Cochrane, upon the waters of the Chesapeake, issued a Proclamation, which, while it avoided the use of the word slave, in order to seem thus not to violate the understanding, or law of nations, that forbade the use of slaves, or the stirring them up to insurrection, nevertheless invited such persons to enter his Majesty's service, or to emigrate to British possessions in North America. Admiral Cochrane, in short, was following in the footsteps of Clinton, Howe, Dunmore, and Cornwallis of the Revolution. When the Treaty of Ghent was made, (1815,) in the 1st article was inserted a stipulation resembling that in the 7th article of the Treaty of 1783, viz:

"That all places captured by either party should be restored without delay, without carrying away any private property captured in such places, or any slaves, or other private property"

John Quincy Adams, to whose name and memory, the Republican party profess to look up with so much respect, it so happens, was Minister at the Court of St. James, charged with the negotiation of this Treaty on the part of the United States. In a letter to the Secretary of State, August 22, 1815, he reports his conversation with Lord Castlereagh upon the subject, in part, as follows:

"Had the British plenipotentiaries asked of us an explanation of our proposal to transpose the words [of the treaty] we should certainly have given it; we evidently had an object in making the proposal; and we thought the words themselves fully disclosed it. Our object was the restoration of all property which, by the usages of war among civilized nations, ought not to have been taken. All private property on shore was of that description; it was entitled by the laws of war to exemption from capture,—slaves were private property." Further on he continues: "It was true, proclamations inviting slaves to desert from their masters had been issued by British officers; we believe them deviations from the usages of war; we believe that the British government itself would, when the hostile passions arising from the state of war should subside, consider them in the same light. * * * * * Lord Liverpool manifested no dissatisfaction at these remarks, nor did he attempt to justify the proclamation to which I partially alluded."

In a letter of instructions (July 5th, 1820) to Mr. Middleton, our Minister to St. Petersburg, where this article of Treaty of Ghent had been referred, upon difficulties arising as to construction similar to those in the Treaty of 1783, Mr. Adams enters into a sustained argument to prove that the emancipation of an enemy's slaves is not authorized by the laws of war.—The following extract is sufficient to clearly exhibit his opinion:

"It has been repeatedly alleged on the part of the British government that it could not be supposed they would have agreed to an article which would oblige them to deliver up to their masters slaves who, during the war, had taken refuge under their protection. The reply to this observation is, that if that had been an objection to their agreeing to the article, it should have been made before the signing of the article, and the engagement not to carry away slaves at all. They had in fact numbers of slaves by these different modes of capture,—one of such as had been seduced to run away from their masters by proclamations from British officers, a second of voluntary fugitives whom they received; and a third of such as had been taken in predatory excursions. You will find in Niles's Register, vol. vi., p. 242, the proclamation of Admiral Cochrane, instigating the desertion of slaves from their masters. * * * * It is not openly addressed to slaves, nor does it avow its real object. From the use of the phraseology which it adopts, the inference is conclusive that the real object was such as the admiral did not choose to avow, and the only supposable motive for the disguise is the consciousness that it was not conformable to the established usages of war among civilized nations. The wrong was in the proclamation. Admiral Cochrane had no lawful authority to give freedom to the slaves belonging to the citizens of the United States. The recognition of them by Great Britain in the treaty as property is a complete disclaimer of the right to destroy that property by making them free. An engagement contracted with them to that effect was, in relation to the owners of the property wrongful; and, if, in relation to the slaves themselves, it was an engagement which the British government assumed upon themselves and sanctioned, it could not divest the owners of the slaves of their property, nor release the British government from the obligation to the United States, and to the owners, to evacuate the place without carrying them away."

Mr. Adams wrote to Mr. Rush, at London, as follows:

"The only equity of the British side is that they signed the article without being aware of its full import, and that the stipulation was incompatible with their previous promises to the negroes. This is the real knot of the question between us, and its solution is, that they had no right to make any such promises to the negroes. The principle is, that the emancipation of an enemy's slaves is not among the acts of legitimate war—as it relates to the owners; it is a destruction of private property, nowhere warranted by the usages of war. This principle must, I think, be peculiarly familiar to the Emperor of Russia, and may be pressed upon his attention in the case of reference with effect."

On the 18th of October, Mr. Adams again wrote to Mr. Middleton, and expressed his views in the strongest language. He said:

"In the statement of the British ground of argument upon the claim in the submission, they have broadly asserted the right of emancipating slaves—private property—as a legitimate right of war. This is utterly incomprehensible on the part of a nation whose subjects hold slaves by millions, and who, in this very treaty, recognize them as private property. No such right is acknowledged as a law of war by writers who admit any limitation. The right of putting to death all prisoners in cold blood and without special cause might as well be pretended to be a law of war, or the right to use poisoned weapons, or to assassinate. I think the Emperor will not recognize the right of emancipation a legitimate warfare, and am persuaded you will present the argument against it."

Now, gentlemen, no language can be stronger than this, which Mr. Adams here uses against what Mr. Lincoln has done, or is to do. "The Emancipation of an Enemy's slaves (he says) is not among the acts of legitimate war," almost the language of Edmund Burke. "No such right is acknowledged as a law of war by writers, who admit of any limitation." Mr. Adams expresses his horror of such war, by classing it "with putting to death all prisoners in cold blood," or "the use of poisoned weapons," or "assassination." The Emperor of Russia decided on the words of the Treaty, that the slaves must be paid for, and they were paid for, $1,200,000 under this, the Treaty of Ghent, and the Treaty of 1783.

It is now said, that at a late period of life, Mr. Adams retreated from these positions, and excused himself for so doing, that he wrote under instructions from the then administration, and did not express his own opinions. It is true, that after Mr. Adams had been defeated for the Presidency in 1828,—as, he deemed, by the South, exasperated, it may be by that defeat, he did agree, that "the War Power" could abolish slavery, but his "War Power" was not laid down to be in a Proclamation from the President of the United States, but in Congress. CONGRESS (he said) (speech of 1842) has power (thus) to carry on the war, and not the President alone. One of the laws of war, he sets down to be:

But our President in the White House, with no sword buckled on his belt, even, 1000 miles or more from Texas, &c., which our armies have never invaded, fulminates from that White House, in a mere Proclamation, a law of war, liberating the slaves in a Territory he has never even seen. (Applause.)

It matters not, however, what Mr. Adams said, in the heat of debate in 1842,—for then he was but Mr. Adams,—whereas as Minister to England, and as Secretary of State, representing and acting for the Government of the United States, he committed this Government, and the People, in 1815 and in 1820, to principles which no honest, consistent successor in that Government can now retract. Mr. Adams in 1815 and 1820 spoke for the United States: in 1842, he spoke for Mr. Adams alone. There is our record, a record made up from 1776, on to 1818, in two Treaties of Peace, in diplomatic correspondence, and in the receipt of moneys thereon, and this record cannot be got over, or put under,—for it stares us in the face, on every side we turn. (Applause.) The emancipation and the use of negro slaves, as President Lincoln is using and emancipating them, is, then, in violation of every principle and every precedent of our intercourse in such matters, with foreign States. (Great cheers.)

Gentlemen, these historical recollections, I am well aware, in a popular assembly like this, are somewhat dull,—but I feel in addressing you that through this Association I am addressing no inconsiderable portion of our Northern countrymen, and Trust, directly or indirectly, some of the conservative people of the South. (Applause.) Hence it is not declamation that is useful now, but instruction, the right reading of the right records. We must show both the North and the South, that the war waged was a war for the Constitution and the Laws, not a war to break Constitutions and Laws,—and a war to be waged according to the laws of nations, as expounded by such eminent men as John Jay and John Quincy Adams, when they were addressing other nations.

THE WAR POWER.

But we are told, gentlemen,—no matter what Constitution, no matter what the laws of nations, this is a war power, President Lincoln is using to support the very life of the nation. He has the right to exert any, and whatsoever power he may deem best fitted to subdue the common enemy. Or, in other words, the President of the United States has but to involve the people in a war, with anybody, ostensibly to maintain the Constitution, and he can then pervert that war, to subvert that Constitution, and to extinguish the life of the nation. (Applause.) What proposition more absurd? What better confutation than the mere simple statement of such an absurd proposition. (Applause.) In an abstract struggle, then, for the Republic, we must die in Despotism! To live, we must commit suicide! To restore the Union, we must make the Union not worth a restoration! Now this is not the sort of Government under which we bargained to live, or to die even. (Cries of "no, no.") We have never agreed to subvert the Constitution in order to restore the Union. We have never agreed to surrender Liberty, Property, Free Speech, Free discussion, or Freedom in the concrete or abstract to any Executive Government, or Executive Power. (Cries of Never, never.) And if ever the time comes, when under any "War Power," it may be necessary to subvert the Constitution, and thus to give up our Rights and Liberties, it is a matter of indifference to me, whether a Union thus achieved, be maintained or not; and I say here, and hesitate not to say, that the quicker we be rid of such a Union, under such a Government, the better for all concerned. (Loud, and prolonged, and reiterated applause, the audience rising, and giving three cheers for Mr. Brooks.) This War Power is a new name for a very old thing. It is the new name of Despotism, and of Military Despotism, the very worst sort of despotism on earth. When the Roman Republic was changed into the Roman Empire—when the Romans lost their Consuls, the Tribunes, their Senate, all but in the name, and thus lost all their rights and liberties, their IMPERATOR, the Latin name for their Abraham Lincoln, their Commander-in-Chief, was scarcely changed by the War Power into the modern word, EMPEROR. Augustus, or Tiberius Cæsar, but became Kaiser, or Czar, that is Cæsar. Hence, let us put down our foot at the start, and declare, we recoguize no Presidential War Power, no Imperator to be turned into any Emperor, no Cæsar to be made into any Kaiser, or Czar. He who attempts to govern the People, under any other Power than the Powers of the Constitution; he who leaps over the Laws of Civil Liberty, and the Civil Law, into that boundless field of Despotism, claimed as a War Power, establishes principles and precedents, from Emperors and Cæsars, and merits the execrations of every free man. (Applause.) Hence, I say, when a President ordains Law by Proclamation, under the pretence that he has such right, under any unknown, illimitable War Power, his Proclamation is not to be regarded as Law; it is not Law—(cheers)—and the President of the United States has no more right to declare it Law, than you or I, or any other man. No General in the field is bound to respect such Proclamation. No soldier in the field owes it obedience, or fidelity. (Tremendous and long continued cheering.)

Gentlemen, your cheers remind me, that this is strong language,—but it is such as the crisis demands. Somebody must speak, when the great bulwarks of Law are being broken down, and everything is thus being put in peril, and I may as well speak as other men. Some humble sentinel must stand on the outposts of the Constitution, and the Law, and standing there, must speak, and cry out against Proclamation Law, against Executives dispensing with, or suspending Law. Two months ago, I know it would not have been safe thus to uphold Law, or to declare against the violation of Law,—but it is safe now. Then the casernes of Fort Lafayette, or Fort Warren would have been my doom. (Cries, not now, never, never; we 've put a stop to all that.) But when a President is unfaithful to his oath to uphold the Constitution and the Law, and subverts that Constitution and the Law,—it is my duty, it is your duty, before God and man, to denounce all his arbitrary uses of Power. (Great applause, and three cheers for the Speaker.)

SUBJUGATION IMPOSSIBLE.

In the beginning of this war,—when it was a war for the Constitution, and for the whole United States, not only were the people of the North a unit, or nearly so,—but we had a great and powerful party in some of the Southern States of the Union;—and for that Constitution, and under that Flag, which was the symbol of the Constitution, there was a fair prospect, not of subjugating, not of exterminating, not of crushing out the people of the South,—but by prudence and wisdom, and a fair adhesion to the principles of the Constitution, and of the Laws of Civilization as well as of Nations, of bringing back the great body of the Southern people to the embrace of the Union, and to the reverence of that ancient and honorable Flag. It was their Flag, as well as our Flag,—and the associations connected with it, were as dear to them as to us. (Applause.) But I hesitate not now to say,—what hitherto I have refrained from saying, though often felt, that it is vain, utterly vain, to attempt to subjugate, extinguish, or exterminate six or seven millions of Anglo-Saxon people. (Applause.) Their race is our race. The blood that runs in our veins is their blood. The same pulsations that beat in our hearts, beat in theirs. The same current of life that flows in us, flow s in them. Now, who of us, standing here on this Northern soil, believes, Southron or Saxon, Celt or Teuton, or Frank, can invade, or conquer, or subjugate us. All Britain, all France, the whole South, combined, could never shake us from our propriety, and make us tremble, and yield, under invasion. (Applause.) Subjugation—subjugo—is not a word of Anglo-Saxon derivation or origin. (Cheers.) Anglo-Saxons never were, never are, never will be, brought under the yoke—subjugated, conquered, crushed out, exterminated. (Cheers.) Edmund Burke well comprehended all this, and in that masterly speech of his on "Conciliation with America," cited four cases where, for years and years, the British government had attempted to subjugate a neighboring people—the people of Ireland,—of Wales, and of the Counties Palatine of Durham and Chester. Ireland was five hundred years, he shows, in the process of subjugation, and arms never did conquer her. "It was not English arms (says Burke), but the English Constitution that conquered Ireland." The British, at last, threw over her the protecting mantle of British liberty, and Ireland then began to be subjugated. When England piled fifteen acts of penal legislation upon Wales and Welshmen, "no Englishman traveling in that country could go six yards from the high road without being murdered." (Laughter.) "When, after two hundred years of struggle, the day star of the English Constitution," adds Burke, "had arisen in their hearts, all was harmony, within, and without—

——Simul alba nautis
Stella refulsit,
Defluit saxis agitatus humor, &c. &c.

And the like is said of the Counties Palatine, Durham and Chester. Hence how vain this attempt to subjugate, crush out, or exterminate millions of our own people, of our own flesh and blood,—protected as they are by an almost boundless territory, stretching from the Potomac to the Rio Grande,—a territory almost without high roads, in large plantations, without visible population,—in winter, no inconsiderable portion under water; in summer, the heat so oppressive that the man of the North can hardly endure exposure to the rays of the sun. Such a territory, if there were no defenders upon it, would be almost unconquerable, geographically, or climatically, if I may coin the word. The subjugation, therefore, of such a people, or such a territory, in such a climate, may as well be abandoned first as last. If we wish then to bring them back into the Union, we must bring back to them the Constitution and the Protection of the laws. We must do what Burke said was done for Ireland and Wales, throw over them the protecting folds of the Constitution, in the spirit in which that Constitution was formed. We must re-lift up from the ground where it was trodden under foot, the Constitution, and only the Constitution. (Applause.) We must do Equity and Justice, and then we can exact Equity and Justice. We must hold out Equality for the States, and then we can enforce Equality. We must respect our own rights, and the rights of States, and then we can compel respect for these rights upon others. We must rear up here in the North, a Conservative, Constitutional Party, and when that Party is reared up, which accepts the Constitution not as this man or that man expounds it,—but as the Supreme Court has expounded it (cheers), then, and not till then shall we be a re-united States. Then, and not till then, shall we begin to subjugate the South. Force nor Violence can ever win back a People to love. Conquest would but impose the necessity for re-conquest, until here, as in Europe, we should ever be revolving in the ruinous circle of War and Despotism. We hold in the South, now, only what is under the range of our guns. Our conquest is only of the soil on which we are treading. To hold all this, to possess, to occupy a territory so vast, not alone are one million of men indispensable to hold,—but a million more, to conquer, to subjugate, as well as to occupy, or to re-fill the ever thinning ranks of those who do conquer and subjugate. How much better, then, how much wiser is the law of self-Government, or of that home Government, that State Government, which relieves a nation from obligations so vast, and impresses the duty of Government, upon every individual. Rely upon it, then, the only army for subjugation is the Constitution of the United States, and the principles of free self-government, interwoven in every part of it. But what we are doing now,—organizing and arming negroes, forming negro Battalions, Regiments, and Brigades,—is but outraging public sentiment. All Europe is crying out against it. The whole civilized world shrinks from, and abhors any prospect of the repetition of the bloody scenes of Hayti and St. Domingo. That European sympathy and civilization which has hitherto looked up to us as the model Republic, now turns with horror from white men co-operating with African slaves to shed fraternal blood. We have no hope, then, from the world; we can have no hope in ourselves, until we retreat from this disgraceful exhibition of twenty millions of white men calling on four millions of negroes to fight eight millions, at the most, of white fellow men. Let us, then, hasten back to the principles of Washington, and of the Fathers of the Republic, as soon as possible, and put the Republic back upon the old track of the Constitution. These were principles of compromise, and concession, the North to the South, and the South to the North, and under them, from 1776, on to 1860, we carried on a successful and united government. (Applause.) I do not expect an immediate, nor an early, re-establishment of confidence between the North and the South; the demagogues have been too long successfully at work in parting us,—but I do expect, that when we can successfully re-establish the principles and spirit of the Constitution in the North, we shall be answered by a corresponding party, South. Or, in other words, when we can effectually subvert Abolitionism, North, a corresponding party in the South will successfully subvert Secessionism there. (Applause.)

THE PURPOSES OF THIS GOVERNMENT.

But, I am asked,—what is our programme?—what we intend to do? Do we intend to lay down our arms, we are tauntingly asked, and to submit to Rebellion, and let Rebellion ride rough-shod over us? Do we intend to let the capital of our country be taken,—our armies surrender,—and our cities, perhaps, be sacked? No; we have no such intent, no such purpose. (Applause.) We now have no such idea, and we never had. We think, and we feel, first,—that if we act upon the purposes, and upon the principles, which created this Government, the war will soon, of itself, cease. When the Constitution in 1787 was created, it was not altogether the work of Patriotism, or the love of Liberty, that inspired our Fathers. The treaty of 1783, with Great Britain, had secured the Liberty of the People, and the Independence of the States. There was not a right then, we have now, that every body had not then. The great principles of British and of American personal Liberty were as well secured under the old Confederation of States, as under the Confederation of the United States. But there were other things wanting we had not under the Constitution,—free trade, free intercourse, a common currency,—and, above all, protection and security from European intervention, or invasion. Thirteen independent States had thirteen different Custom Houses, and thirteen different laws, and regulations of commerce, and of trade. There was one rate of duties in Newport, Rhode Island, and another in New York, and yet another in Baltimore, or Norfolk. The Fathers of the Republic then felt the great business necessity of creating order out of this chaos,—and of adding to a Free People, a system of Free Trade, and of Free intercourse. It was INTEREST, then, SELF-INTEREST, as much as patriotism, that laid the foundations of our Government. There were debts to be discharged, obligations to be met, a navy to be created for the protection of commerce, that could only be achieved by a government of the United States. Under the guidance of these impulses of self-interest, on the 11th of September, 1786, Commissioners from several States assembled in Annapolis (Md.) "to consider upon the best means of remedying the defects of the Federal Government." Their very platform was "to take into consideration the TRADE and COMMERCE of the United States, and to consider how far an uniform system, in their commercial intercourse and regulations, might be necessary to their common INTEREST and permanent harmony." The vulgar inspiration of Trade started the Convention held in Philadelphia, afterwards, in 1787. Such men as Washington, Hamilton, Madison, Franklin, Roger Sherman, Rutledge, and Pinckney, did not hesitate to assemble, and to act upon this great inspiration of self Interest, and of Commerce and Trade. Free trade, a free intercourse, free rivers, they well reasoned, were indispensably necessary among a free people. The main purpose for which this Government was created, our Constitutional history shows, was to have but one system of customs, and of duties, from Georgia to Maine. Or, in other words, more tersely expressed, this is an exterior, not an interior, Government. The Federal Government was created, not for morals, not for religion, not for slavery or anti-slavery,—but to promote the "general welfare," or, in other, more vulgar parlance, to collect duties, to raise revenue thereby, to coin money, to have uniform weights and measures, to have one patent office, and to regulate commerce with foreign nations. I repeat, our great Fathers created a Government of, and founded it upon, self-interest, and only upon these principles of self interest can it be maintained. When we interfere with morals, or religion, or attempt to govern by Theology, or Philosophy, our Government fails. When we attempt to enforce opinions, or to use Government to enforce opinions, the Government fails,—for it never can do, what it never was created to do. Hence, when an attempt is made to free negroes, or emancipate negroes in the South, the Government fails, just as if it attempted to emancipate them in Brazil or Cuba, or to emancipate the Sepoys of the East Indies. Hence, when we prosecute war to free four millions of of Southern negroes,—though there are twenty millions of us, North concerned it,—we must fail, under our form of Government; for the Government was created exactly for reverse purposes,—the purposes of self-interest,—South as well as North—(applause)—and it is not the interest of the South to live among free negroes. (Continued applause.) If, then, we wish to end the war, we must resort to the principles of interest that laid the foundations of the Government, and we must make it the interest of the South to live with us—as our fathers did, when they created the Government. We must, then, go back and remember, this is an exterior, not an interior Government, and that slaves and slavery in Georgia or in Carolina do not concern us, as it is our concern to regulate commerce, to collect duties, to have uniform weights and measures, and common patent laws—not to free negroes. We want one system of trade, —one uniform commerce upon the sea coast, and the free navigation of such great Rivers as the Mississippi, Missouri, Ohio, the Red River, the Arkansas, etc. The true programme, then, is to go back, and go back as fast as possible, to the re-establishment of our Custom Houses, our uniform system of duties. What they are doing in the interior of Virginia, whether they are in rebellion or not in Texas, or Georgia, but little concern us, if we hold on to Galveston, to Fort Pulaski, to New Orleans, to Norfolk, and collect the Revenue, and attend to the weights and measures. (A laugh.) If in Tennessee, ever, they choose to rebel, let them rebel till they are tired of it, provided at New Orleans they will pay the duties, and let us alone in Kentucky, and on the navigation of the Rivers. The beauty of our form of Government is, that we have little or nothing to do with what is going on in Tennessee, or Alabama, or Mississippi. If the People there think it their interest to be in rebellion, let them rebel, as long as they will confine their rebellion in their own limits. I do not propose to surrender New Orleans, no, never. (Applause.) That Post and that Port are indispensable to the great West,—where millions and millions more of people are hereafter to live, and who cannot even run the risk, that England or France, or some other Power may take it from the South, as we took it from her, under Farragut. What Gibraltar is to the great Mediterranean, New Orleans is to the Great West, —the Key, the gateway of the commerce of thirty or forty thousand miles of interior River Navigation. (Applause.) I do not propose to surrender Key West. The possession of it is indispensable to our navigation of the Gulf of Mexico. It is our self-interest to hold it, and hold it, we must. I do not propose to surrender Norfolk or Fortress Monroe. They are the keys of the Chesapeake, and the gates to the Capital in Washington. The duty of this Government is to collect duties in Mobile, in Charleston, as well as in North Carolina, Georgia, and Florida, and Louisiana,—and I would remove anything which stands in the way of the execution of this Exterior duty.

UNION A NECESSITY.

The God of Nature, I may say here, to the Southern People,—(Oh, that they may heed it to avert eternal wars!)—the God of Nature has written upon our very geography—"One Country, one Constitution, one Destiny." [Applause.] It is written on the long lines of the Missouri and Mississippi, on the Ohio, and all their numerous tributaries, that empty into the Gulf of Mexico. The Father of his Country is not more eloquent in his Farewell Address upon this necessity of Union and Indivisibility, than is the Father of Waters, for four thousand miles,—as he gathers up his reasons in the rising rivulets of the icy Rocky Mountains, and rolls them on, into volumes of irresistible logic toward the Gulf of Mexico. (Applause.) These great waters must,—it is the law of inexorable necessity,—belong to one people, and be in one country. The holding on to what we have got, on the Mississippi, on the Gulf, on the Chesapeake, on the Capes of Virginia, is as indispensable to our safety as it is for the safety of the South to have them too. We are bound together thus, we are linked together, for weal or woe,—and no wise man will fight to put asunder what God has thus joined together. (Applause.) If we part by Treaty, we part but soon to meet again in war. Eternal War, or Eternal Union, seems to be our Destiny. (Applause.) Tell me not, that the Ohio can divide us, as the Rhine divides France and Germany, or, as the Danube parts Nationalities, —tell me not all this, unless you tell me, in the same breath, the numbers of the huge standing armies, that garrison the Rhine and the Danube, and secure Peace only by bristling in arms, eternally. (Applause) England could not live without Scotland and Wales, and France perished in provinces, and Germany has been drenched with human gore,—because,there there was one people, speaking one language, cut up, divided into Kingdoms, Dukedoms, Landgraves, etc. It is essential, indispensably essential, for the security of our American Liberty, that we be one People. (Applause.) If but a river part us, or a chain of mountains, huge standing armies must stand as sentinels on every such river, or on every such mountain pass,—and there must be cordons of custom houses, and passports, and restrictions, all utterly destructive of human liberty. Standing armies are the Death of Freedom. Where the sword reigns, the Genius of Liberty runs off in terror and affright,—and the People soon succumb to Despotism. (Applause.) Three hundred thousand men on your side, and three hundred thousand on our side, to act as Policemen, will be indispensably necessary to keep apart a People speaking one tongue, and these inflamed by discordant free and slave institutions. Your negroes would run off, and we should keep them, and you, in revenge would burn, pillage and destroy.—Eternal war, or huge standing armies, I repeat then, would be our destiny,—and where War is, we see now, both North and South, there is no Liberty. In the name of God, then, if we will throw down our arms, throw down yours, and come back to us, or, it God has abandoned men to passion, and blood, in the name of Liberty, that hereditary Liberty, bequeathed to us all, we invoke you, to unite with us, and rescue our country from a destiny that shocks the patriot even in imagination to contemplate. (Great applause.)

UNION OUR SALVATION.

But, gentleman, Union is not only essential to liberty, but essential to our salvation. Republics exist on earth only as exceptional governments. Monarchies and despotisms are the common Law, if not the common destiny of nations. All Europe smiles, or seems to smile, upon our divisions, our battles, and the torrents of blood we shed in order to destroy the only great Republic on earth. Monarchy and Despotism both grin their ghastly smile,—while Liberty, the earth over, shrieks over the unnatural, the suicidal war.

Gentleman, "Divide and Conquer" is the principle of monarchies against republics everywhere. Divide and conquer is the principle which now inspires the British Government, if not the Emperor of France. Divide the North and South, and then if possible conquer both when both are exhausted. Unity and universality of government are therefore a necessity for us both North and South, and the quicker and deeper and wider, this principle is comprehended universally, the quicker we shall lay down our arms and stop this horrible effusion of human blood. (Applause.)

PRACTICAL RESOLUTIONS.

Gentlemen, I love to speak for practical purposes, and hence I have prepared two or three resolutions to present for your consideration, for your discussion hereafter, not for action at this time and this place, but for submission to this Democratic Association. I see nothing else that is left to us except the principles that are embodied in these resolutions. Revolution is the last thing to be thought of, under a form of government like ours, where grievances can be redressed at the ballot-box. We have to endure this Congress, we have to endure this President; it is wiser to endure them than to overthrow them by revolution. It is possible, barely possible, that at last they may be awakened, and may hear and heed the voice of the people. Hence I have selected a state as a medium through which my resolutions may be presented to the people both of the North and the South. A State of the Revolution ; one of the Old Thirteen, of high and holy history, which has never been alien, either to the North or to the South, and which has ever been faithful to the Constitution of our common country, and that is, the State, the glorious State of New Jersey. (Loud cheers.) I propose, therefore, the following resolutions, to be submitted to the Democratic Association for discussion, for action, and if you approve of them, for presentation to the Government of New Jersey. And let me remark here that the Government of New Jersey is a homogenous government; the three branches are all of one faith and one opinion, and hence I name her in preference to the Government of our own New York.

THE APPEAL TO NEW JERSEY.

Resolved, That the State of New Jersey, through her State Government, be respectfully requested to interpose in order to arrest the existing civil war:

1. By inviting the non-slaveholding States and the loyal slaveholding States—Delaware, Maryland, Kentucky and Missouri—to meet in convention in Louisville, Ky., on the — day of February next.

2. By requesting the permission of the President of the United States to send Commissioners to Virginia, North and South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Florida, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, Texas, and Tennessee, to invite them also to meet in like national convention. And

3. Be it further Resolved, That the President be requested by the State Government of New Jersey to declare an armistice with or for such State or States as may accept this call for a national convention.

Resolved, That a committee be created on the part of this Association to present these resolutions to the Governor and Legislature of New Jersey, and to urge upon that state, that, in consideration of her revolutionary history and patriotic associations, she is entitled thus to lead in a national convention for the restoration of the Union of these States.

The resolutions were greeted with a torrent of cheers, and it was asked that they be passed upon immediately. The President therefore put the question, and they were carried unanimously.

LETTER TO
REV. NATHANIEL HALL,

OF DORCHESTER, MASS.,

BY NAHUM CAPEN,

ON

POLITICS FROM THE PULPIT.

It is nine years since the letter of Mr. Capen was published, and, during that period, much has happened to confirm the soundness of his views. It was highly commended by eminent men, and by some of the most distinguished clergymen of the country. A large edition was published for distribution, and it was reprinted in most of the States. It was first published in the Boston Post, September 24, 1855, and the following extracts are from the editorial introductory: —

"We commend to our readers the accompanying letter from the pen of NAHUM CAPEN, Esq., on the subject of politics and the pulpit. It is written in an easy, chaste style, and discusses the question in a spirit so calm and Christian-like, that the worthy clergyman, to whom the letter is addressed, will be the last to complain. This gentleman, at the 4th of July celebration in Dorchester, when Hon. Edward Everett delivered his elegant oration, felt it to be his duty to proffer to the Throne of Grace a most terrible anti-compromise abolition prayer, and it is probable that this well meant but ill-conceived service has resulted in the good of eliciting from Mr. Capen this patriotic letter."

"The correct sentiment, the true Christian spirit, the wise philosophy, the pure philanthropy, of this well-conceived and happily expressed letter, present a system of religious ethics, worthy the highest and clearest order of intellect. We are glad this important subject has received the attention of a mind so capable of grasping and elucidating it, and so willing to speak freely and justly of the duties due from and to clergymen of every denomination. Each of the 'three thousand New England clergymen' might study it with advantage."

The great evil of political preaching still prevails throughout the country, and many of the professed servants of the Prince of Peace are among the most violent instigators of war. They assume the prerogatives of Deity, in their weakness to control the opinions and acts of men much better informed than themselves, and they often bring contempt upon their sacred calling and upon religion, either by their ignorance or want of judgment. They speak arrogantly, and "in the name of the Lord." Such fanatics were understood by CROMWELL. One of them asked Cromwell, "in the name of the Lord," to what place a certain fleet was destined. He instantly replied, "the Lord shall know! thou shalt go with it." He ordered his arrest, and sent him on board. They also speak of the "Lord's Cause," of "the Lord's candidate," of "the Lord's party," as if any portion of "poor humanity" can claim the special favor of God in the ordinary discussions of duty. One might be justly led to suppose by their language that Divine Providence was under their special control, and that when their opinions or predictions proved false, the standard of Truth had indeed fallen. Some years ago, a writer in Ohio addressed a letter to the Liberator, Boston, challenging the Almighty God of the universe upon the subject of slavery, and we have a recent example in Massachusetts (see Atlantic Monthly), in the son of a clergyman, — a professor of Harvard College, — whose blasphemous prayer is even commended by men claiming to be Christians. It is sufficient to quote, without comment : —

"Lord, strangle this monster that struggles to birth, Or mock us no more with Thy kingdom on earth."

This spirit was signally illustrated by a leading Abolitionist, when he exclaimed that, "we want an anti-slavery constitution; an anti-slavery Bible; an anti-slavery God."

The sad fruits of such fanaticism are to be seen in the growing indifference to the service of the church; in declining respect for the clergy; in impious and irreverent language, addressed to Deity; and in alarming tendencies to irreligion and infidelity. History is full of instruction upon this subject. In 1652, in allusion to Cromwell's victory over the Dutch, Mr. Peters said, "The business was so long doubtful, that God was brought to his hums and hawes which way he should fling the victory." A Scot's clergyman, of the same period, thus addressed his MAKER : "To be free with you, Lord, we have done many things for Thee that never entered into Thy noddle; and yet we are content that Thou take all the glory." Another, speaking of malignants, asks, "Lord, what wilt Thou do with these malignants? I'll tell Thee; e'en take them up by the heels, and roast them in the chimney of hell. Lord, take the pestle of thy vengeance, and the mortar-piece of thy wrath, and make the brains of malignants a hodge-podge." In 1643, a Presbyterian minister, in his prayer, asks, "O, Lord, when wilt Thou take a chair and sit among the House of Peers? When wilt Thou vote among the honorable Commons?" It was this spirit of unhallowed zeal that led to the suppression of Christianity in France, in 1794, and to the startling decree which was voted "That Death is an eternal sleep!" When man, in his frenzied weakness, assumes to govern his fellow-mortals in their business affairs, in the name of the Lord, he becomes so blind to his own errors and failures, that he does not hesitate to doubt Infinite Wisdom, even the existence of God.

It was stated in a recent Republican paper, that a Universalist clergyman, who had alway preached the doctrine of universal salvation expressed his confident belief, in view o the wickedness of Southern men in the pre ent war, that "hell had become a militar necessity," thus beginning to doubt his chie axiom, that "God is Love." We migl cite numerous examples of this kind, but thes must suffice for our present purpose. W have taken examples from a period of two hun dred years ago to illustrate principles and t show that human nature continues unchanged Such preaching is sure to be followed by lam entable consequences. As the "Lord' party," or the "Lord's candidate" is fre quently beaten at the polls, and, as politica preachers are frequently compelled to modif or retract absurd statements or opinions uttere from the pulpit, and in the Lord's name, it i not surprising that the young, the women, an confiding men connected with the church should become indifferent and sceptical in re spect to all teachings proclaimed in the nam of the Lord. It is frequently asserted, wit utter disregard to the Bible and to the instruc tive examples of Christ, and to the teaching of history, that slavery is not a political sub ject! when the great fact is to be found everywhere upon record, in all civilize nations, that it is a subject solely in the hand of the legislator, for legal action and disposi tion. But of what use are FACTS, to a self sufficient fanatic!

In an interesting volume of PROF. CHRISTY he says, in his Introduction, "The burden of the ecclesiastical legislation of the United States on slavery has been based upon the theories started in Great Britain. It is well, therefore, that some allusion should be made to them here. The principal one, as argued by MR. BUXTON, in 1823, and stated by MR. CANNING, is as follows: "The continuance of slavery and the principles of the Christian religion, are incompatible." In the course of the debates, MR. CANNING said, "Religion ought to control the acts and to regulate the consciences of governments, as well as individuals; but when it is put forward to serve a political purpose, however laudable, it is done, I think, after the example of ill times, and I cannot but remember the ill objects to which, in those times, such a practice was applied. . . . If it be meant that, in the Christian religion, there is a special denunciation of slavery; that slavery and Christianity cannot exist together — I think the honorable gentleman himself must admit that the proposition is HISTORICALLY FALSE. One peculiar characteristic of the Christian dispensa-n — if I must venture in this place upon ch a theme — is, that it has accommodated elf to all states of society, rather than that has selected any particular state of society, the peculiar exercise of its influence. If has added lustre to the sceptre of its sover-gn, it has equally been the consolation of e slave. It applies to all ranks of life, to conditions of men; and the sufferings of is world — even to those upon whom they ess most heavily — are rendered compara-ely indifferent by the prospect of compen-tion in the world of which Christianity affords e assurance. True, it certainly is, that hristianity generally tends to elevate — not to grade — the character of man; but it is not ue in the specific sense conveyed in the norable gentleman's resolution; IT IS NOT UE that there is that in the Christian religion hich makes it impossible that it should co-ist with slavery in the world. Slavery has een known in all times and under all systems religion, whether true or false." Eminent en, in all periods of Christianity, have ex-ressed similar views.

EDMUND BURKE uttered the following uthful language: "Politics and the pulpit re terms that have little agreement. No ound ought to be heard in the church but the oice of healing charity. The cause of civil berty and civil government gains as little as iat of religion, by this confusion of duties. Those who quit their proper character, to as-ume what does not belong to them, are, for he greater part, ignorant both of the charac-er they have and of the character they as-ume. Wholly unacquainted with the world, n which they are so fondly meddling, and in-xperienced in all its affairs, on which they ronounce with so much confidence, they ave nothing of politics but the passions they xcite. Surely the church is a place where ne day's truce ought to be allowed to the issensions and animosities of mankind."

JEFFERSON, in a long letter to a clergyman, aid, "I suppose that there is not an instance f a single congregation which has employed heir preacher for the mixed purposes of lec-uring them from the pulpit on chemistry, n medicine, on law, on the science and prin-iples of government, or in anything but re-ligion, exclusively. Whenever, therefore, preachers, instead of a lesson in religion, put them off with a discourse on the Copernican sys-tem, on chemical affinities, on the construction of government, on the characters or conduct of those administering it, it is a breach of con-tract, depriving their audience of the kind of service for which they are salaried, and giving them, instead of it, what they did not want, or, if wanted, would rather seek from better sources in that particular art or science. In choosing our pastor, we look to his religious qualifications, without inquiring into his physi-cal or political dogmas — with which we mean to have nothing to do." . . . "I do not deny that a congregation may, if they please, agree with their preacher that he shall instruct them in medicine, also in law, or poli-tics. Then, lectures in these from the pulpit, become not only a matter of right, but of duty also. But this must be with the consent of every individual; because the association being voluntary, the mere majority has no right to apply the contributions of the minor-ity to purposes unspecified in the agreement of the congregation."

The true philosophy of religious teaching is plainly indicated by ROBERT HALL. He says: —

"Christianity was subsequent to the exist-ence and creation of man, It is an institution intended to improve and ennoble our nature, not by subverting its constitution, or its powers, by giving us a more enlarged view of the designs of Providence, and opening a prospect into eternity. As the existence of man is not to be dated from the publication of Christianity, so neither is that order of things that flows from his relation to the present world, altered or impaired by that divine system of religion. Man, under the Christian dispensation, is not a new structure erected on the ruin of the for-mer; he may rather be compared to an ancient fabric, restored when it had fallen into decay, and beautified afresh by the hand of its orig-inal founder. Since Christianity has made its appearance in the world, he has continued the same kind of being he was before; fills the same scale in the order of existence, and is distinguished by the same propensities and powers.

"In short, Christianity is not a reorganiza-tion of the principles of man; but an insti-tution for his improvement. Hence, it fol-lows, that whatever rights are founded on the constitution of human nature, cannot be dimin-ished or impaired by the introduction of re-vealed religion, which occupies itself entirely on the interests of a future world, and takes no share in the concerns of the present in any other light than as it is a state of preparation and trial. Christianity is a discovery of a future life, and acquaints us with the means by which its happiness may be secured; civil government is altogether an affair of the pres-ent state, and is no more than a provision of human skill, designed to insure freedom and tranquillity during our continuance in this temporary stage of existence. Between institutions so different in their nature and their object, it is plain no real opposition can subsist; and, if ever they are represented in this light, nor held inconsistent with each other, it must proceed from an ignorance of their respective genius and functions.

Our relations to this world demand t existence of civil government; our relatio to the future renders us dependent on the a of the Christian institution; so that in reali there is no kind of contrariety between ther but each may continue without interference its full operation."

LETTER.

Mt. Ida, Dorchester, Mass., Sept. 8, 1855.

My dear Sir, — In asking your deliberate consideration of thoughts, respectfully submitted in the following letter, with regard to Politics from the Pulpit, which have been suggested and elicited by recent events, and which there is no present occasion to recite, no doubt is entertained but you will give to the subject that serious and candid scrutiny for which your established habits of sincerity have been so long distinguished.

That the motives which originated this communication may not be misunderstood, nor misconstrued, I beg leave to speak of the dignity and responsibility of the ministerial calling, and while all who concur with me in opinion, feel it to be their duty to claim for it a considerate protection, they would not divest it of its high and sacred character, nor derogate from its prerogatives of independence.

They believe that the servants of Christ should imitate his examples — by teaching the great and sublime truths of Christianity to all people of different origin, minds, habits, culture, opinions, and under the varying circumstances of civilization, government, freedom, education, prosperity, adversity, goodness, crime, peace, war, or revolution. Christianity is a system of duty for the guidance of men under all the circumstances of life, whether public or private, pleasurable or painful, and not a system for the conformity of opinions on any subject, except it be on those fundamental principles recognized by all Christian denominations, and which are to be found in the attributes of Deity.

The Christian teacher cannot create the conscience of the individual, nor command the adoption of opinions — the reasonableness of which he cannot see, nor the manifestation of sentiments, the reality of whic he cannot feel.

The most that he can hope to accon plish, is to exercise and keep alive th conscience to all that belongs to integrit and justice, to elevate the standard of dut in the adoption of opinions deliberatel formed, and to insist upon a practice tha shall be in harmony with the declared wil of God, and those laws and constitution of men which, according to their best judg ment and knowledge, from time to time are ordained by general consent for th common good of society. As he canno divest the individual of his moral respon sibility, he can claim no right to dictat opinions for his adoption which his en lightened judgment does not approve.

He is the teacher of duty to the rich and to the poor, without the authority of controlling the property of either; he is the religious adviser of the young and aged, but not their political guardian; he is the appointed exhorter of the reckless and the wicked, but not their governor nor keeper; he is the chosen consoler of the afflicted and dying, but not their judge; he should be the counsellor of statesmen of all parties, but not the offensive partizan of any; he should be the spiritual and independent adviser of the magistrate, in the numerous positions of authority and official duty, but not the controlling gatherer of his knowledge, the responsible agent of his power, the director of his opinions, nor the arbiter of his acts. He should give to the legislator the inspiring benefit of his prayers, encourage in him an honest zeal for investigation, increase in him the love of truth, the sentiment of self-respect and duty, and leave him to act according to the judgment which he deliberately forms by the help of so many Christian aids. He is a preacher of the gospel to all men, of all ations; the guardian of souls exposed to mptation, against the dangers of sin in s hideous variety, against oppression in olation of law, the promoter of peace ac- rding to law, the encourager of duty in asons of danger; but he is invested with authority by his Divine Master to as- me the prerogatives of private judgment, r to denounce his fellow-sinners for non- ncurrence in matters of opinion on sub- cts in regard to which the good and the le of the entire community are divided, d where the cause of truth demands a rfect freedom, exempted from all party d sectarian dictation.

What air and light are to the body, hristianity is to the soul; it constitutes e indispensable elements of healthful owth and spiritual existence. It enno- es the motives to lofty endeavor, it en- urages endeavor according to the stern quisitions of integrity; it enlivens the ffections, but it does not seek to control eir application; it creates a thirst for nowledge, and engenders a love for truth the man, the woman, and the child of very condition, and in every pursuit of fe, but it leaves each to choose his path, nd to walk his way, according to his con- cience and his knowledge. It is a mis- on above and beyond the temporary ex- edients and excitements incident to the ormy conflicts of opinion. Its guiding and should not be obscured by the clouds f passion nor stiffened by the hand of igotry, but it should be seen pointing pward to the serener atmosphere of a con- dent hope, an abiding faith, a practical harity. It is a mission to the world in its iversity, and its most glorious themes are hose which invest the spirit of controversy ith a dignified forbearance, and the power f knowledge with the sublime beauty of neekness.

In protesting, as an humble citizen, gainst the practice of introducing politi- al topics into the pulpit, with a party pirit, — a practice which it is to be re- retted too much prevails for the best good f the mission of religious instruction, — I eg most distinctly and emphatically to lisclaim all purposes tending to narrow the phere of the Christian minister, or to essen the means of his usefulness. On he contrary, most with whom I have ex- hanged opinions upon the subject, are leeply impressed with the importance of nlarging the sphere of his mission — in- vesting it with a higher character, loftier aims, holier aspirations, and with a more extended knowledge, and comprehensive views. It is to be viewed as a mission to the people of all time, however divided by sects or parties, diffusing that spiritual dignity and benign temper of Christ among men, whose differences of thought and habits of feeling require the constant reproduction of his examples of love, and the repetition of his lessons of wisdom.

The subject of slavery, or more properly speaking, the way and the means of providing for the best good and advancement of the dependent races of men, is regulated by the enactments of government in states or civilized nations, and like all other subjects relating to humanity, and submitted for adjustment to the human judgment in conventional authority, is differently regarded by different men. Its regulation or removal is necessarily a business of a political nature, it is that of legislation, and it may be regarded as one of the most difficult problems which statesmen are called upon to solve. It is more a question of time, method, and means, than of principle — to say nothing of the unjustifiable interference of citizens who assume the visionary right to aggravate its evils without sharing the realities of its burdens. It has been discussed by the learned, the good and the wise, during all time, and the discussion will be continued so long as man is subdivided into different races of varying capacity and condition, so long as man continues to be a being of progress. The process of Christian civilization is to be seen in periods of centuries, which are but moments to infinity, and the reverential student will not fail to find, in the historical lessons of Providence, that the same Almighty power that numbers and guards the sparrow in its flight and fall, no less protects and controls, during all the transitions of humanity, his image in man. He will find that races and nations are advanced and elevated according to eternal laws, and by the unchangeable instrumentalities of infinite wisdom. He who studies and regards most those laws and means most conforms to the will of Him whose omniscience pervades eternity.

The discussion of slavery in this country has been so long and so impressively identified with fanaticism, impracticable measures of philanthropy, with the abrupt and revolting language of party and of impatient ignorance; with a morbid and sickening despondency — that would substitute days of fasting and of mourning for those of national rejoicing, because a greater blessing was yet to be achieved; with reckless and culpable denunciations against law and the authority of government, and even with the desperate and malevolent breathings of treason against our beloved Union; with impious declamations against the Bible and the church; that it is difficult, nay, almost impossible, to divest it of its unholy associations, or to introduce it into the pulpit, with its correlative topics, without exciting anew all those extreme manifestations of indignation and disgust to which an offended patriotism is sure to give expression, and seldom attempts to disguise or to conceal.

Fanaticism is excessive zeal. It has its providential mission, — but like that of the whirlwind, it has no inherent self-directing power. Its tract is ever characterized by the plunges of impatient haste and ill-timed violence. It demands a greater but an impracticable good. It is earnest in prayer and rapid in thought, but indifferent to knowledge and blind to judgment. It waits for no season, listens to no warning, and cares for no consequences. It invokingly holds up an abstract truth, detached from the practical conditions of society, and demands its instant adoption and impossible practice. It is prolific in its propositions, and it always assumes that their nature is imperative, urgent, and holy, that their importance is paramount and unquestionable. They are rapidly and incessantly multiplied and forced upon the individual, the family, the school, the town, the state, the nation, and the pulpit. All need to be guarded with an unsleeping vigilance, but no place more sacredly than the Christian pulpit.

All men confess a desire to lessen slavery and to increase freedom; to check the prevalence of evil and to promote the sway of good; to withstand temptations to sin, and to encourage the spirit of duty; to advance truth and to suppress error; but they may honestly and intelligently differ with regard to the best means for the accomplishment of ends so momentous to man — so acceptable to God.

The Christian minister, standing as he does, the professed servant of Divinity — commissioned by society to promulgate eternal truths revealed by God, and adapted to the condition and wants of humanity; to exhibit the spirit of his Divine Master by examples of loyalty to civil government; of fidelity to public and private trusts; of dignity and impartiality in the manner of presenting his convictions of truth and adjusting differences of opinion; of charity in speaking of the weaknesses and ignorance of men; of sublime simplicity in making known the will of the Father, — is placed in fearful relations of responsibility to God and to the world, — whenever he presents himself as a teacher on subjects not specially taught by his Divine Master and which, to be truthfully set forth, require vast research, long and careful study, patient and practical inquiry, diversified observation, test comparisons, resulting verifications, and a profound self-distrust. To assume to be the teacher of men in the practical or experimental details and complications of government or of science, is to imply a consciousness of knowledge superior to that of the statesman and philosopher, and to claim them as his pupils. That he can do much, in the proper discussion of all great topics, to inspire the lovers of truth with a spirit of duty; in acquiring knowledge divested of pride and prejudice; by examples of thorough inquiry, comprehensive views, conciliatory manners, and of forbearance and magnanimity, and by a spirit of enlightened humility which should ever characterize the servant of Christ, — all will admit, no one will deny. But who, let me ask, that is subject to the conditions of mortality, will deliberately assume, in addition to the great task of his Christian mission, the awful and immeasurable responsibility of teaching so much, in a life so brief, and with means so small?

Besides, as the clergy of different denominations represent the different views and sentiments of the varying parties of the nation, what would constitute a safe standard of conscience for one to adopt would be safe for all, — that is, each for himself and no one for others, — and the pulpit would be sought, controlled, and used for the exciting and temporary discussions of the times, and the church would become the place for the manifestations of passion and violence, and the Sabbath the great caucus day of the land. Religion would become but another name for politics, and piety a cloak for cunning. The floating errors of party, the falsehoods of designing and unprincipled politicians, — always assuming the attractive garb of truth for deceptive purposes, — would be more or less received and honestly adopted by the credulous eacher, and sermons based upon decep-on, and prayers upon error, would soon evail and degrade the professed disciples Christ to the common level of vulgar rife, and subject them and their mission the contempt of considerate men, and scure the fair beauties of Christianity by e unsightly deformities of sin.

The true conscience deeply scrutinizes self, and employs an enlightened judg-ent to guard against the mistakes of igno-nce, the impositions of the sinful, and the sumptions of will.

The Christian teacher is protected by w in his position as the dispenser of truth, id as he cannot be answered by the disntients of his congregation in respect to ie possible fallacy of his views, nor be orrected if he communicates the false-oods of others as truths to be adopted, he norantly becomes, for a time at least, a ost dangerous though unintentional agent f the wicked, and inflicts upon his confidig and uninformed hearers, and upon soiety, a wound that irritates and mortifies he commendable pride of the hearer and ssens his respect for the preacher.

Let the great aim of the clergy be rather o influence men to become Christian citi-ens, and they will do a thousand times iore for the safety of their government, or the advancement of humanity, and for he permanent sympathy for the oppressed verywhere, than by actively uniting themelves with the brief, fierce, and fluctuating truggles of party.

If, indeed, they are actuated by an irre-istible sense of duty to participate in those iovements which are connected with the egislation of their country, and desire to iake known facts and opinions not com-nunicated by others, the way is open at all imes and everywhere, — and they may iave opportunities to say more, and to do iore, and to present their views to larger iumbers, on special occasions, or by speakng at political meetings, — than they can ossibly accomplish in the pulpit and within the hallowed circle of the Christian church.

The Sabbath and the sanctuary should be sacredly protected against the breathings of angry disputation, the discordant language of party violence, and the wild invective of passion — the invariable and legitimate fruits of political preaching to a congregation where members of the different parties are associated for religious worship. The Christian soul demands at church a quiet atmosphere, the cheerful serenity of a peaceful trust, the impressive associations of grandeur consistent with prayer, a dignity becoming the sublime spirit of truth, a gladsome temper that harmonizes with the Christian's hope, the exalting hymn, and the joyous anthem.

On all subjects of magnitude the great and the good, the learned and the wise, the pure and the holy, in all ages, have failed to unite in opinion as to the best plans for the advancement of the great cause of truth. The clergy, in common with all men, and with no special nor supernatural exemption from sin or error, have not either practically nor theoretically been able to harmonize even their own views with respect to the teachings of Christianity, and they profess to realize an inward sense of glory on account of their differences; and while no one would presume to arraign them for their diversity of opinion with regard to the true means of progress and course of duty, it cannot be claimed, with any show of meekness or Christian propriety, that they are authorized to require a conformity in others which they are unable to secure among themselves.

This communication was substantially prepared for signatures of such members of your church and society as might concur with the views expressed. In reviewing, however, the circumstances and the motives which led me to write it; in considering the magnitude of the subject and the expressed wishes of several highly respected and intelligent gentlemen, who desired to give the letter a circulation commensurate with the nature and importance of the questions involved; in wishing to avoid all proselyting anxiety, or seeming solicitation, incompatible with a confidence in principle, which is above and superior to the conviction of mere verbal persuasion, and in the hope that it would have a tendency to lead to unrestrained exchanges of opinion upon the subject, — I have asked the written committal of no one, that all may be free deliberately and intelligently to form their own conclusions, each for himself, and without embarrassment of any supposed antagonism between individuals either of the family or of the social circle.

I have written with a deep sense of responsibility, from which no American citizen, however humble, should feel himself exempted. I have endeavored faithfully to examine, though briefly, those serious and delicate relations of accountability, which no member of a Christian community, however imperfect, should seek to evade or to suppress. I have not hesitated to express myself with a freedom and a frankness alike due to the spirit of sincerity and to the cause of truth, in the confidence that you will appreciate my motives as you may hope to have others appreciate yours, and will regard the imperfect suggestions which have been made rather with a view to public duty than with any feeling of personal considerations or of party differences.

I have the honor to be, with considerations of respect and true regard, your most obedient servant and friend,

NAHUM CAPEN.

HON. REVERDY JOHNSON,

OF MARYLAND,

DELIVERED BEFORE THE

Brooklyn McClellan Central Association, October 21, 1864.

PUBLISHED UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE ASSOCIATION.

Mr. President and Gentlemen: —

The return which I am sure you will most appreciate that I make for the kindness of your reception (a kindness that I shall ever gratefully remember), is to proceed at once to the consideration of the topics that belong to the occasion. None more momentous were ever submitted to a people. They involve the destiny of the nation. Is liberty to survive? Is our nationality to be restored? Is our form of constitutional government to be preserved? These are the great issues in the presidential canvass; and it is to these that I propose to speak. I have said that the issues are momentous. They involve no mere temporary prosperity, no mere suspension of general and private happiness, no mere eclipse of national power, no mere abeyance of national existence; but our nation's life or death rests upon their solution. (Applause.) The annals of time, since history's record commenced, furnish us with no parallel. A people but recently among if not the happiest on the globe, living under a government with a written constitution containing, in the plainest language, every guaranty for individual and social freedom that a sagacious and liberty-loving ancestry could devise, are now in the midst of a war more gigantic than civilized or savage man ever before knew, — with hostile armies vaster than Xerxes marshalled, — hearing, in almost every wind that blows, the strife of the battle-field, the cheers of the victors, now on this side, and now on that; the shrieks of the dying, the agonies of the wounded (brothers all); feeling the tottering condition of our country; its ruin at times apparently imminent; hope, even, at periods, gone, then revived; a debt already fearful in amount, and daily increasing at a more fearful rate, threatening that last calamity, national bankruptcy, we are now, after nearly four years of suffering and solicitude, called on to consider whether there is no remedy. Must there be, is there to be, another like four years? ("No, no!") And if there is, who is so mentally obtuse, or so blinded by partisan feeling, as not to see that political chaos will overtake us, and freedom, as the result in all human probability, be forever lost? (Applause.) Gentlemen, are these apprehensions chimerical or well founded? What the past four years have brought us to, we know. The symbols of woe, seen in almost every household in the land, tell us what human misery they have produced. The bones of nearly half a million of men, the just pride of our country, and who were but lately united to us by the strongest ties of affection, that now whiten hundreds of battle-fields, tell us of fearful slaughter. A funded debt of more than $2,000,000,000, and an unfunded one of almost, if not quite, as many millions more, tell us of a land mortgaged to an amount that already shakes the nation's credit, and fills every reflecting patriotic mind with the deepest solicitude.

And yet, with all this individual misery, this dreadful loss of life, this already crushing amount of debt, the present time, now nearly at the end of the four years, tells us that the Union, so dear to us, continues dissolved; and that a united spirit of hostility, where before there was division, animates our brethren of the rebellious States, and which, if another like four years are continued, will lead them to prefer annihilation to a return to their original allegiance; to prefer death to submission, if the fate designed and prepared for them by the policy, civil and military, of the years that have passed is to be theirs,—a policy which leads directly to the loss of all their property, of all their past political freedom, and of all the securities for both guaranteed by the Constitution, to whose fold they are told we wish them to return. Social equality with their former slaves they are to admit. This is insisted by an influential, and, at this time, a controlling portion of the friends of Mr. Lincoln. The slaves, as proposed by the same party, are also to become the owners of the land, leaving to the white men and women only the occupation of daily laborers. A fate, like this, is infinitely worse than death. Obvious as in my judgment it is, that the rebellion was in the beginning without justification or excuse (and I am sure you concur in that opinion), it is not to be denied that its continuance and present strength are mainly to be referred to the condition to which the administration has reduced our Southern brethren, and the still worse condition to which its threatened policy will reduce them; and, judging from the past, that policy is sure to be adopted if Mr. Lincoln is reëlected. That this is the conviction of a large part, and, it is believed, of a decided majority, of the people of the loyal States, no man, who properly estimates their intelligence, or regards the signs of the times, can doubt. They think, as all the people of such States, including the President in the beginning, thought, that the sole purpose to be attained, and the sole authority to attain it under the Constitution by force of arms, was the restoration of the Union: the States returning to have all the rights that they before possessed. That this was the view of the President, and of the Convention by whom he was originally nominated, is past all question. One of the resolutions of that body was, "That the maintenance inviolate of the rights of the States, and especially the right of each State to order and control its own domestic institutions according to its own judgment exclusively, is essential to that balance of power on which the perfection and endurance of our political fabric depends. (Applause.) And we denounce the lawless invasion by armed force of the soil of any State, under any pretext, as among the gravest of crimes." Nothing can be plainer than the meaning of this resolution. The affirmance of the "right of each State to order and control its domestic institutions," refers, and can alone refer, to the right to retain domestic slavery. The denunciation of "the lawless invasion by armed force of the soil of any State" was intended to apply to the case of John Brown's invasion of Virginia. Mr. Lincoln, in his inaugural of March, 1861, inserted this resolution at length, and declared that to him it would be "a law;" and added, "I now reiterate these sentiments," and, "in doing so, I only press upon the public attention the most conclusive evidence of which the case is susceptible, that the property, peace, and security of no section are to be in any wise endangered by the now incoming administration." In the same state paper he had before said, quoting approvingly from one of his own speeches, "I have no purpose directly or indirectly to interfere with the institution of slavery in the States where it now exists;" and subjoined, "I believe I have no lawful right to do so, and I have no inclination to do so."

At this time, it will be remembered, South Carolina had seceded. Her ordinance was passed on the 20th of the preceding December, and several other states had followed her example. Mr. Lincoln, therefore, when he addressed the nation in March, 1861, and announced the opinions I have given in his own words, knew that he would be compelled to resort to force to maintain the authority of the Union within these states. To do this he also knew would be the exercise of the war power conferred by the Constitution. And yet, with that fact and knowledge, he not only disclaimed all purpose to interfere with slavery in the states where it existed, but declared that he had "no lawful right to do so." (Applause.) The institution, therefore, of slavery, he, and the convention that nominated him, proclaimed it to be, "especially the right of each state to order and control," "according to its own judgment exclusively." He never pretended at that period that, by virtue of the war or any other power known to the Constitution, he, as President, had a right to abolish slavery. His present opinion in that regard, if he was sincere in March, 1861 (as no doubt he was), is manifestly an after-thought, or rather has been since, and against his own judgment, forced upon him by influences, which, unfortunately for the country, he was too feeble to resist. He could not, to use his own reported language at that time, afford to break with "the Greeley faction;" and he never has had the time or manliness to do so since, although at one time he apparently thought that the safety of the nation required it. (Laughter.) These gentlemen constituted a power in his party. They are men of talents, of decided will, enthusiasts, fanatical as I believe, but therefore honest on the subject of slavery; and their united force, Mr. Lincoln's feeble, reed-like firmness was as impotent to resist, as human arm to arrest the march of the clouds. He saw, too, in the future, the prize of a continuing presidency. ("That's it.") He doubtless saw, or thought he saw, as he should resist or submit to their importunities, its possession or its loss, and unable to raise himself to the elevation of considering duty performed as the only foundation for an honest fame, he surrendered the conviction which he had before so recently solemnly announced, and agreed to attempt, and did attempt, not only indirectly, but directly, "to interfere with the institution," in spite of his prior solemn declaration that he had "no lawful right to do so." "Lead us not into temptation" is an invocation so vital to man's safety as to have been especially suggested by Heaven itself. The temptation of ambition has often led its victim to slaughter hecatombs of his race. It caused Napoleon to wade through blood and slaughter to a throne, and the subjection of all surrounding nations, until under the retributive justice of God, sure to be sooner or later visited upon sinning and erring man, he died an exile and in wretchedness on a bleak and barren island of the ocean. And, to compare great things with small (laughter), it has induced Mr. Lincoln to abandon his often recorded opinions, with the hope to attain thereby another lease of power; but for our salvation the same retributive justice is above us, destined in its own good time, and that we trust is near at hand, to send him to his home in Springfield, a sadder and a wiser man. (Cheers.) I say he has changed his policy — that he has abandoned his opinion of his power. But this was not done at once. In the interval, he often repeated and reiterated the views of his inaugural. It would detain you too long to specify each instance. A few will be sufficient.

1. In his message to Congress of the 6th of March, 1862, known as his compensation message, after recommending to that body that they should pass a resolution that the United States ought to co-operate with the States by means of pecuniary aid in effecting the gradual abolishment of slavery, he expressly disavows for the Government any authority over the subject, except with State assent. His language is, that his proposition "sets up no claim of a right by federal authority to interfere with slavery within State limits, referring, as it does, to the absolute control of the subject in each case to the State and its people immediately interested. (Applause.)

2. The act of Congress of the 6th of August, '61, emancipated only the slaves of rebels employed in the rebellion, and submitted the decision of such cases exclusively to the courts. Major-General Fremont, on the 30th of that month, he being then in command in Missouri, by proclamation, declared free all the slaves within the state. This, as soon as it came to his knowledge, he disapproved; and declared it, in a formal order of the 11th of September, to be void as far as it transcended the provision of the act of Congress. And in a letter of Mr. Joseph Holt to the President, of the 22d of the month, that gentleman, being alarmed for the effect of Fremont's order, states that "the act of Congress was believed to embody the conservative policy of your administration." This statement Mr. Lincoln never denied.

3. On the 9th of May, 1862, Major-General Hunter, military commander of the department of the South, embracing Georgia, Florida, and South Carolina, by an order of that date, declared all slaves within such states free. On the 19th of the month, even before he was officially advised of the measure, Mr. Lincoln, by proclamation, declared the same, "whether genuine or false," to be "altogether void." In neither of these instances is there the slightest intimation of a change of opinion by Mr. Lincoln either on the question of policy or of power. As to both, as far as we knew then, or know now, if we do him the justice to believe in his frankness and sincerity, he then entertained the same opinion that he announced in his inaugural. (Applause.)

4. But the evidence of this does not stop here. Congress and the President declared their views of policy and power. On the 22d of July, 1862, Mr. Crittenden proposed, in the House of Repretentatives, a resolution, which, after truly stating that the war was "forced upon the country by the disunionists" of the Southern States, declared that it "is not waged on (our) part in any spirit of oppression or for any purpose of conquest or subjugation, or purpose of overthrowing or interfering with the rights or the established institution of these States (the seceded), but to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution and the rights of the several States unimpaired; and that as soon as these objects are accomplished the war ought to cease. (Cheers.) In the House only two votes were cast against it, and in the Senate but one Republican vote, and it was at once, and without hesitation, approved by the President. No pretence here suggested that slavery was to be abolished, or that any of the rights of the States in regard to it were to be interfered with. On the contrary, that it was our duty to carry on the war then raging, as long, and only as long, as it should be necessary to "defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution;" and that, the Union restored, "all the rights of the several States" would remain unimpaired. This conservative and constitutional policy was, soon after, and almost fatally, not only abandoned, but totally reversed. Emancipation proclamations, under a claim of executive war power — the first on the 22d of September, in the same year, and the second on the 1st on the succeeding January — were put forth. In the last, all slaves in certain States, or parts of States, were declared free; whether the territory or the slaves should fall within the military occupation of the United States or not: thus totally disregarding his declarations as to his want of power, made at the very moment of taking his official oath. Forgetting that oath and his then solemnly announced opinion, he now avers his sincere belief to be that the measure referred to was "warranted by the Constitution, upon military necessity." Military necessity! (Laughter.) What power, as construed by the President and by some of his generals, does it not comprise? What restraints upon executive power does it not remove? How absolutely does it become its own sole restraint? How perfectly does vest in the President all authority, executiv legislative, and judicial? Its only limitatio is the necessity out of which it springs, a the sole judge of that necessity is the Pre dent. How alarming and how palpably a surd is the doctrine! and yet it is upon th and upon that alone, that the President re his proclamations of September and Januar See the outrageous results to which it lead The President thinks that the rebellion cann be suppressed, if Congress is permitted to i terfere. He thinks it cannot be done if cou or judges, though acting under the authori of law, are suffered to intervene their functio It being his sworn duty to suppress the reb lion, and whatever in his judgment becom necessary to that end constitutes a case military necessity. He disperses Congre closes courts, imprisons judges. Who is blind as not to see that this doctrine rests the President's unrestricted and absolu power; and, not only as concerns the gene Government, but those of the States, tra forms him from an officer, with careful limited authority delegated by the Consti tion, into a mere autocrat? The States el members of the House of Representativ Senators are chosen by their legislatures. legislature, loyal in an executive sense, t is, friendly to the President — the mode constitutional test of loyalty — must be chose The executive arm may be palsied by differe results, and its power to extinguish the r bellion enfeebled, if not destroyed. Th presents a case of military necessity. T freedom of election, therefore, in these Stat must be assailed; soldiers must be muster around the polls; no vote must be cast, n none such is to be permitted, but for t President's candidates; this, as we know a great extent, has already been shameless done in the case of the last elections in Mar land and Kentucky. ("That's so." A plause.)

The legislature is elected; and it is fear that an enemy of the administration will chosen senator: this must be prevented, a the members are therefore arrested, or, und fear of imprisonment, are forced to vote f the President's choice. It is a case of mi tary necessity. The press criticises wi frankness, but with truth, and for the intere and safety of the country, and as is its dut the conduct of the President. This tends, i thinks, to weaken and embarrass him. must be stopped: military necessity demand it; and it is done. Papers are suppressed and editors arrested and imprisoned. Ministers of the gospel pray as in their consciences they believe to be right. They are supposed thereby to weaken the President's arm. It is a case of military necessity, and they are arrested, confined, and their churches closed and handed over to some more pliant pastors. ("Shame, shame.") These are no mere hypothesis — no mere fancy sketches. We know that such things have occurred in Missouri, Indiana, West Virginia, Maryland, Delaware, and New York; and yet, even to question the legality, much less to denounce them in words that burn — a patriotic, almost a holy duty — is, by some of the supporters of the President, deemed disloyal (derisive laughter), and abuse — scurrilous abuse — is heaped upon all who have had the manliness to do so; and who, in doing so, but maintain their inherited freedom. No warrant for such a doctrine is to be found in the Constitution; no military necessity is there mentioned as the source of power, or mentioned at all; no provision, except in relation to the writ of habeas corpus (cheers), is there to be found giving the authority to remove, or to suspend, under any circumstances whatever, the express guaranties which it contains of personal and political liberty, State sovereignty, and the freedom of religion and of the press. But Mr. Lincoln and his advisers have, nevertheless, discovered what no man before ever dreamed of, that there exists, as an independent source of executive power, either in the Constitution or outside of it, in the time of war, — a military necessity which gives the President, as long as such necessity exists — and of its continuance he is to be the exclusive judge — the right to disregard and extinguish the expressly and exclusively delegated powers of Congress, courts, and judges: the reserved rights and powers of the States, the guaranteed privileges of the citizen, the freedom of religion and the press, all, all are to succumb to executive power in time of war, civil or national, on the ground of military necessity. Wise and patriotic men have heretofore filled the office of President, and have been cabinet ministers. During the long interval between Washington and Mr. Lincoln's accession to power, a formidable insurrection and two foreign wars occurred, yet no one ever even suggested that any necessity could arise, which would not merely be cumulative of power in the President, but inconsistent with and destructive of those granted by the Constitution to the other departments of the Government, and of the securities of individual liberty which it contains. (Applause.) The first article of the amendment to the Constitution proposed by Congress on the 4th of March, 1789, with a view "to prevent misconstruction or abuse of its powers," declares that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press, or the rights of the people peaceably to assemble and petition the Government for a redress of grievances." But futile the provision, if the doctrines of the present day are to be maintained! In a purer period of the Republic, however, it was found to be most potential. In 1798 the alien and sedition law was passed. The people were instantly aroused, and demanded, and at the earliest moment effected, its repeal. The Constitution was thus vindicated, and its violation rebuked by an almost universal public opinion, expressed through a free ballot-box. If, in that day, Mr. Adams had surrounded one voting precinct with armed soldiers, and there had been no other remedy with the free men of the time, his life would not have been worth a day's purchase. The friends of our Government in that age never believed that there could be any security for its continuance except in the preservation of all the guaranties the Constitution contained, and doubtless supposed that no further attempt would be made to violate them. How mistaken! Military necessity had not then asserted its function. Years elapsed: the people and the States enjoyed perfect freedom under the Constitution. Mr. Lincoln's administration begins, and soon afterward this monstrous and tyrannic doctrine is announced, and from time to time has been despotically enforced. It is now virtually claimed that the amendment referred to was designed only to limit congressional, and not executive power. It is true that Congress is the department alone mentioned in it; but it was because neither that body nor the people even dreamed that any other department would attempt to exert the powers prohibited. (Applause.) Had a suggestion to that effect been made at that time, it would have been received but with ridicule or contempt. (Applause.) And yet at this day, under the pretext of military necessity, of which the President is the sole judge, a power is involved to prohibit the free exercise of religion, to abridge the freedom of speech, the right to assemble and petition for a redress of grievances. And, as we have seen, Mr. Lincoln has done nearly all these wrongs. In so doing it is hoped that he has not been himself influenced by a desire to trample upon the rights of the citizen, but has merely yielded to the stronger will of others, or to the temptation which, for the past two years, he has evidently had before him, of securing a re-election.

In the former days of the Government, when the political atmosphere took its hue from the complexion of the patriot sages of the Revlution, when love of country and of freedom were the animating principles of every heart, it may be confidently said that if such a pretension and such conduct had been claimed and pursued even by Washington (cheers) (I beg pardon of his memory for the supposition), deeply seated as he was in the affections of his countrymen, it would have excited a feeling of indignation throughout the land, so universal and so strong that he would have lost his place in their hearts, and would have shaken even his firmness and rendered his re-election impossible. Constitutional liberty the men of that day esteemed so priceless that they would have surrendered Washington rather than have sanctioned such gross departures from it. No man can doubt this who is familiar with their history. But to return to Mr. Lincoln's course in regard to slavery. Now that the day of election approaches, he goes a rifle-shot even beyond the measures of his emancipation proclamations. In these to put the rebellion down by means of emancipation was his sole avowed object. That accomplished, no matter when or by what means, the military necessity ceasing, slavery, except so far as it might be then effected, was to remain. His resort to the measure, as declared in his final proclamation, was solely, as he said, because he esteemed it "a fit and necessary war measure for suppressing" the rebellion. That object attained, emancipation was to terminate. Nor did the measure embrace all of the seceded States, or either of the loyal slave States. Of the former, part of Louisiana, of Virginia, and the whole of West Virginia were excepted. With the rebellion ended, slavery was to continue in these excepted localities, and also in Missouri, Kentucky, and Maryland. But now what are we told? Under an authority which Mr. Greeley supposed was amply sufficient he agreed with Messrs. Clay and Holcomb to obtain a permit for them to go to and return from Washington, with a view to some peace negotiation. That Mr. Lincoln in the first instance consented to grant such a permit, no one can doubt who believes in Mr. Greeley's veracity. Mr. Lincoln, however, on the 8th of July last, withdrew his consent by sending to that gentleman, to be exhibited to Messrs. Cla and Holcomb, a withdrawal of his consent i the rather discourteous and offensive form o an address, "To whom it may concern." I this paper he refuses to allow those gentle men, or any other, to repair to Washington i order to negotiate a peace, except upon a pre liminary understanding and condition tha such peace is not only to embrace "the integri ty of the whole Union," but "the abandon ment of slavery," and that the negotiations ar to come "by an authority that can control th armies now at war with the United States." T treat of peace, even to speak of peace with a view to amicable results, with or to any par ties from the seceded States, or force any on of such States, is here declared to be wholly inadvisable, and is directly refused, unless i is first stipulated, that in every one of suc States slavery is to be abandoned. He, there fore, virtually proclaims to the citizens o those States, "I know you have had the in stitution of slavery among you — some of you before, and all of you continuously since, the Constitution was adopted — and have held it unquestioned, I know that that instrument guarantees it to you. In my inaugural message, I so said. I there declared that what is known as the fugitive clause in the Constitution 'was intended by those who made it for the reclaiming of what we call fugitive slaves, and the intention of the lawgiver is the law:' and that I was about to take an oath that would bind me to enforce it, and that I intended to enforce it. Whether truly or not, I know that you think the institution indispensable to your industry and to the enjoyment of your domestic life. I know that the most of you are at war with the United States only because you think it in danger. It is also, I know, true that I have said that I have neither the inclination nor the power to interfere with it: and it is so far true, that I have done so, but to a limited extent, and as a necessary war measure; and have even expressed a doubt whether in going to that extent I have not transcended my authority. It is true that Congress proclaimed that the sole design of the war on the part of the United States was the suppression of the rebellion, and that, that accomplished, all of your rights, including that of slavery, would remain to you. It is true that on the 22d of August, 1862, in a letter to Mr. Greeley, I declared that my 'paramount object was the restoration of the Union, and not the safety or destruction of slavery. That if I could save the Union without freeing the slaves I would do it; that if I could save it y freeing them all, I would do it ; or if by reeing a portion, and leaving others alone, I ould do that: my sole purpose being to ave the Union, irrespective of the question f slavery.' It is true that your land and ine is filled with mourning; that your fields re drenched with our kindred blood; that he war continues to be a frightful drain upon he resources, credit, and lives of both sec- ons. It is true that the vast and horrid pectacle of fraternal strife we are exhibiting nocks the Christian sentiment of the world. is true that it is now being carried on by oth sides in disregard of all civilized rules f warfare. All these things, and even worse, know to be true, and that they will be dread- lly augmented, to our mutual ruin, if the rife is not terminated ; yet I tell you that I ill not even listen to any proposition to ter- inate it that is not preceded by an assent, on our part, to abandon slavery."

Was ever man so inconsistent with him- elf? Was there ever, in any war, a refusal o treat for peace, — for arresting the shed- ing of blood above all, the shedding of blood y brother of brother? (Cheers.) Under ll these circumstances, could there be a refu- al so insane, so reckless, so inhuman, so arbarous? Thank God, Mr. Lincoln will ot always be our President! Thank God, if e are now true to ourselves, his lease of ower is nearly expired! Thank God, that a hange of man and measures seems to be ear at hand, and that, that occurring, no such nexampled, unconstitutional, inhuman, and arbarous refusal will dishonor the Govern- ent. Measures, humane and constitutional, ill then be adopted, which, to the vindication f our good name, will soon lead to a restora- ion of the Union, to the gathering together f all the States under one Government, un- er one grand political edifice, of whose arch ennsylvania as from the first will again form he "Keystone." She has recently demon- trated that that is her firm, her settled pur- ose. We know that Mr. Lincoln's unconsti- utional condition will not then be exacted as n indispensable one to peace. We know hat it has been strongly censured by many f his decided supporters. No one dislikes lavery more than I do. No one would re- oice more to see it constitutionally abolished. No one more devoutly wishes to see the whole f the race of man free. (Applause.) Nor s any one more persuaded that the extinction f the institution would result advantageously o all, and especially white men, and the white nen of the South. But I am not authorized ; ny oath frequently taken to support the con- stitution tells me that I cannot lend my aid toward the continuance of this war, until the States in rebellion consent to abandon slavery, if it can be terminated and the Union restor- ed by other means. I would have slavery abolished by constitutional amendment, or by State action. But if neither is done, I am glad to believe, the Union restored, that the institution cannot for many years longer exist. The present war, brought on through the am- bition and the arts of comparatively a very few Southern men, aided by the course of a few Northern men, has given it a death-blow — certainly has destroyed forever all of its for- mer political power. Its spread, beyond what will be its limits when the Union is restored, will be impossible. Its fate, therefore, is doomed. Even if the mild but powerful in- fluence of our Christian dispensation shall fail to terminate it, a conviction which must soon fasten itself upon the mind of the South, of the superiority of free over slave labor, will lead to that result. Its advocates were im- pressed with the opinion that the world was so interested in the peculiar products of the South, which could not be produced, as they asserted, but by slave labor, that however it might dislike the institution, it would yield its opinion to its love of gain, and rush at once to the support of the rebellion, although its gov- ernment was shamelessly announced to have, for its very corner-stone, human slavery. Sad, indeed, has been their disappointment. They are yet unrecognized. Their agents, though assuming the part of ambassadors, have been seen during the past four years, hovering around the purlieus of St. James and St. Cloud in vain; while their subordinates have been uselessly seeking, through that portion of the foreign press found willing to barter conscience for gold, to bring recognition about: but all has been in vain. The rebel govern- ment still stands alone among the family of nations. No single one, small or great, will admit it to fellowship. Cotton, the rebels find, is not king. (Cheers.) Nor in this age of the world can mere material wealth ever be king. Law, order, virtue, duty performed, oaths observed, manly industry and enterprise, liberty, and the inventive genius which ever goes hand and hand with her, filling the land and ocean with their triumphs, and a deter- mined resolution of a people to stand by their nation's honor and life — these will ever be the king that a virtuous and Christian world will alone recognize. (Loud cheering.)

Gentlemen, so far I have spoken to you of the ascertained sad results of Mr. Lincoln's presidency. Let us now see what countervailing benefits have attended it. What progress has been made toward the restoration of the Union, — the object declared by the convention that nominated him, by Congress, and by himself, to be the sole object of the war.

Has he effected the return to the Union of a single State? Not one. Has he acquired the confidence and won the affections of the people of any one State, or even part of a State? ("No, no.") We know that he has not. His policy made that impossible. Has he obtained a permanent and safe foothold even in any portion of any single State? Has he even retained possession of portions once conquered by our brave army and navy? He has not. To our dishonor be it said, he has not. Union men, strong in their attachment to the nation's flag, have been seen to gather around it, shedding tears of joy at the belief that they would be under its permanent protection, — have, in more instances than one, been left, by its withdrawal to the cruelties of the merciless foe. ("That's so.") Over and over again has this occurred in Missouri, Tennessee, Kentucky, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, Alabama, Texas, and Virginia. (Applause.) In portions of Arkansas and Louisiana, attempts that would be ludicrous but for the gravity and importance of the principles involved, have been made to organize State Governments by force of the bayonet; and, in a great measure, by the votes of soldiers, and almost if not within the sound of rebel guns. Under the lead of an attache of the President, an effort was made to the same end in Florida, that was followed by the defeat of our arms and the sacrifice of thousands of lives of our soldiers. ("Shame!")

A proclamation of amnesty and for the reorganization of the States was issued by the President, and received only with derision and contempt by the rebels. And on its face it was so anti-republican and so tended to increase Mr. Lincoln's power and subserve his re-election, that Congress, at its recent session, attempted to defeat it by legislation, — an attempt which he frustrated by refusing to sanction it; for which he soon afterward received a deserved and severe official rebuke from Messrs Wade and Davis as chairmen, respectively, of the committees of the two Houses, who had had the charge of the law, — gentlemen of ability, perfectly loyal and influential members of his party.

Arkansas, under the authority of his amnesty edict, went through the form of a State organization, elected a legislature, appointed State officers, and chose two United States senators. These last repaired for Washington, applied for their seats, but were denied them by a vote almost unanimous. Louisiana has since pursued, or is about to pursue the same course, and is sure to meet with the same fate; and a like faith will attend Tennessee. Neither Andrew Johnson, Abraham Lincoln, nor the two united, can control the Senate of the United States. (Applause.)

Has the President succeeded in destroying the armed forces of the rebels? The country, to its cost and sorrow and mortification knows that he has not. (Applause.) A army that, from first to last, during the past six months numbered more than three hundred thousand men, led by a leader standing high in the confidence of the President, has failed to disperse, much less to destroy, the forces of General Lee, and is now apparently further from the capture of Richmond, the object of the campaign, than McClellan (loud cheers) was when with the aid of Fitz John Porter (cheers) and other gallant officers now dismissed or in exile because they were his friends, on the first day of July, '62, he fought the battle of Malvern hill, achieving a victory unsurpassed in military history, and when, if his prayers, over and over again for re-enforcements had been answered, as they might have been but for a cowardly fear, he would have been able to have followed it up that night or the following day with the capture of Richmond. This he could have done if he had had but 20,000 additional troops. Not an officer on the field who witnessed the demoralizing effect upon the foe of that victory, then or now, doubts this. (Loud applause. Three cheers for McClellan.)

Has the President protected the loyal States? Has he always held the capital itself in safety? ("No, no.") Here again we know he has not. Three times have Pennsylvania and Maryland been invaded, twice has the capital city of each been rescued from the ravages of the foe by the glorious Army of the Potomac, organized by McClellan (cheers), and made irresistible when success is possible, if properly led. Upon the first occasion, under the command of General McClellan, on the second, of Meade. On the first the capital was in the most imminent peril, and no one realized it more than the President. The only hope of saving it was through the Army of the Potomac. Pope's incompetency had caused such parts of it as had been under his command to be defeated, and they had returned to Washington dispirited and disorganized. It was obvious to the President that further disaster, even the capture of the capital, was inevitable, unless the army could be brought again under the almost magic influence of their idolized chief. And in despair he was solicited to take command, and, if possible, save Maryland, Pennsylvania, and Washington. Governed, as ever, by patriotic and unselfish motives in the presence of his country's honor and danger, forgetting the wrongs that had been done him by the President, and trusting to renewed pledges of confidence and support, he cheerfully assented, and as was anticipated by those who knew the troops, their spirits instantaneously revived, discipline took the place of confusion, and confidence of despair. McClellan at the earliest moment afterward, as night was setting in, led them from the presence of an affrighted President and Cabinet amid the cheers of his men that made the very air vocal with their sounds, and were received as the certain harbinger of a coming victory. (Tremendous cheers.) On the second occasion Meade, now honored throughout the land, led them to another glorious victory, again resulting in the rescue of Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington, and causing the heart of the Administration to beat without alarm. (Applause.) On the first occasion, the exigency over, Washington rescued, the President and Cabinet in safety, the hostility to McClellan was revived. Halting his army on the hard-earned battle-field of Antietam (applause), waiting for blankets to cover them, and for shoes to protect their bleeding feet, that he might better go in pursuit of the foe, complaints are first whispered, then loudly proclaimed, in administration circles, and yet the President was afraid or unwilling to strike. He permitted him to lead his troops across the Potomac to march in search of the enemy, and just as he was about to engage in battle with every prospect of success, he was most discourteously deprived of his command, and ordered to hand it over to General Burnside. What followed? — disaster. The army was defeated with fearful slaughter, and nothing gained. Burnside then asked to be relieved, and requested that Hooker be dismissed the service for having, as he alleged, been guilty of a gross violation of orders. The President, as Burnside testified before the Committee on the Conduct of the War, said that it ought and should be done, but on the next day, instead of doing so, he placed that officer in command of the army, and soon after came the yet more disastrous and almost fatal defeat of Chancellorsville. But to proceed. The perils of the invasions into Maryland and Pennsylvania, from which they were so nobly rescued by McClellan and Meade and the Army of the Potomac, it was supposed would be a sufficient warning to induce the President to guard against their repetition. It was thought that he would now act on the advice of McClellan — advice given early in his command, but rejected by General Halleck even with a discourteous sneer — and erect fortifications on the line of the Potomac. Had this been done, the last invasion of those States could not have occurred. But it was not done. All, as at first, was left unguarded. Incompetent officers (whose incompetency had been before demonstrated) were from time to time placed in command in that locality, and as all reasonable men in and out of the army anticipated, nothing but disgrace ensued.

1. The defeat at Winchester, the flight of the army, and the loss of millions and millions of dollars' worth of war material.

2. A third invasion. The flourishing town of Chambersburg was given to the flames in retaliation, as it was said (a barbarous excuse), for outrages of a like description before perpetrated and without rebuke by a general of the President's selection.

3. Baltimore and Washington were once more placed in imminent peril. The sound of the enemy's guns almost vibrated through the rooms of the White House. Millions of money would not indemnify our citizens for the losses sustained by that invasion. And nothing is more absolutely true, than that it is to be ascribed exclusively to the gross neglect of a President who is now being supported for re-election. As soon as this last effort of the enemy came to the knowledge of General Grant, that officer took steps to prevent further disaster. Political and abolition generals were not selected by him. They were relieved, and the army placed in charge of a young and accomplished officer, and the result has been that the valley of Virginia, that had before been so often the scene of our dishonor, at once became the scene of glorious victories — the last, to him especially, the most glorious — that have won for the youthful Sheridan, his officers, and men an ever-enduring fame. (Loud cheering.) How different are these victories and that recently achieved at Mobile by the unsurpassed skill and daring of Farragut and his command (cheers) received by the friends of McClellan, and the supporters of Mr. Lincoln! Whilst we hail them with joy as exhibitions of the valor and triumph of our arms and as tending to the defeat of the rebellion and the restoration of the Union, they seem chiefly to value them for their supposed bearing on the presidential contest. They are laboring for the man, Mr. Lincoln; we for the country and the integrity of institutions that have made it what it recently was,—the freest and one of the happiest in the world. (Cheers.) We support McClellan because judging from his antecedents we feel assured that he will maintain those institutions, and restore the Union, to use his own words, "at all hazards." (Loud cheers.)

But to proceed. What success has Mr. Lincoln achieved for us on the ocean? His failure there is, if possible, more complete and disheartening than his failure on the land. Our commercial marine, that before his inauguration covered every sea, proudly sailing unchallenged under the safeguard of the stars and stripes, is now almost wholly driven from that domain. ("That's true.") More than one thousand of our ships we have been compelled to sell to foreigners, because our flag furnished no protection, but on the contrary is but the incentive to the pirate's torch. They are now traversing the ocean with American freemen and property under the shelter of foreign banners. Some four or five small piratical cruisers have been permitted to give to the flames hundreds of our vessels, and in some instances on our own coast and almost within sight of our cities. The insurance against war risk is now as high, if not higher than it was in the war with England of 1812, and much higher than in that with Mexico of 1846. What apology can be offered for this? No government ever possessed more noble or more accomplished naval officers, or braver or more skilful seamen; nor was any supplied with such an unlimited amount of treasure to increase its naval efficiency. Millions upon millions have been expended for that purpose, and yet our merchants, to save their ships from destruction, or to have them lie idle in our harbors, have been forced to dispose of them to aliens. I have said that our officers and men were brave. Is it not so? "Yes; in the annals of naval warfare were these qualities more strikingly exhibited than in Dupont's victory at Hilton Head (cheers); Rogers's capture of the Atlanta (cheers); Winslow's destruction of the Alabama (loud cheers); Porter's command of the Western squadron, or Farragut's success at New Orleans (cheers); his entire progress on the Mississippi, and his recent, and, if possible, yet more glorious achievement in Mobile Bay! (Loud cheers.) We know, too, that our ship owners, as intelligent and enterprising as any in the world, have over and over again solicited the Government to suffer them to fit out vessels to protect themselves, and save the nation from the dishonor of being driven from the ocean. But the solicitation was in vain. The few buccaneers, who could easily have been captured or destroyed if this request of the merchants had been granted, have been suffered with almost perfect impunity to roam the seas and our very roadsteads, and consign our ships to destruction, till our commercial marine has literally almost ceased to exist.

I have thus laid before you grounds enough for opposing Mr. Lincoln's re-election. And, adding one or two that I have thus far omitted to notice, let me briefly recapitulate them. In the loyal states, where the courts were open, and the administration of justice was unobstructed, he has imprisoned, or suffered to be imprisoned, thousands of citizens without explanation: detained them for months, refusing to bring them to trial before any tribunal, and then discharged them without redress. He has suffered his agents to suppress hundreds of newspapers in the same states, for no other imaginable reason than because they published articles denouncing his administration. In eighty-five instances it is ascertained that this was done by his own immediate order or subsequent approval. He has suffered churches to be closed, and their pastors to be arrested and imprisoned, only because they did not pray specially for him. He has suffered to be issued and enforced, and in Kentucky and Maryland directly approved, orders under which the military grossly interfered with the freedom of elections. He has failed to restore to the Union a single state or a material part of any state that was in rebellion on his accession to power. He has constantly, to the incalculable injury of the country, appointed and kept in important commands officers who were grossly incompetent. He has interfered, with most calamitous results, with our military campaigns. He has suffered our commercial marine to be driven from the ocean. He has proscribed officers of admitted ability and perfect patriotism, because they were supposed to be friendly to McClellan (cheers), and not to approve his policy or conduct. He has violated the Constitution by his abolition proclamations, notwithstanding his solemn promise to the contrary. He has violated it by his amnesty proclamation, and by his using his assent to a law passed by the t Congress to guard against consequences ich his friends correctly thought to be most rilous as well as illegal. He has failed to otect the loyal states, and by such failure ojected them at three several periods to the st destructive invasions. He has suffered capital itself to be placed at three different riods in the greatest peril. He has, by his licy and conduct, so injured us in the estition of France, that Napoleon has seized o his hands, unquestioned, the destinies of neighboring republic, and placed, on a throne his own creation, a monarch belonging to most despotic family of Europe; and in s he has abandoned the uniform settled icy of his predecessors. In palpable vioon of law and the recorded opinions of shington, Jefferson, Clay, and every orney-general to whom the question was mitted, and to the great danger of every eigner amongst us, whether naturalized or , without trial, or giving an opportunity trial, in the case of Arguelles, on the uest of a Spanish subordinate, he has ivered him to the tender mercies of that cial. He has caused the currency of the ntry to become in a great measure values; and what is, if possible, still worse than where there was division in the South, he produced unanimity; and, where there unanimity in the North, he has produced ision. ("That's so," applause.) And ly, he is seeking a re-election by the most crupulous and unexampled abuse of pat-age and power.

Do not all these things demonstrate his er unfitness for the presidency? (Ap-use.) The most that any of his friends e said as to his fitness is that he is honest; if honesty was a rare attribute of the erican character. (Laughter.) But his session of that quality is not admitted by of his supporters. Messrs. Wade and vis, as chairman of two committees of Con-ss, in their manifesto of the fifth of August , charge him with having committed (I their own words) a "studied outrage on legislative authority of the people," — with ing "exercised a dictatorial usurpation in isiana," — as holding, by his defeat of the they refer to, the electoral votes of the el states at the dictation of his personal pition, and that his conduct in this respect y cause "civil war for the presidency."
Mr. Lincoln is a sane man, he cannot but that those charges are well founded; and e does, as he perseveres in them, what has of honesty? Is he not satisfied with the blood now shed, and being shed, in the Southern states? For the prize of the presidency, is he willing to extend the area of the fraternal slaughter? His associate in the Baltimore nomination, by his recent military order relative to the election in Tennessee, plainly shows what his object is. Under that order, no electors can be chosen who will not support the President and himself. Has Mr. Lincoln repudiated the order? Has he rebuked its author? If he has done either, the country is not advised of it. On the contrary, his treatment the other day of a committee from that state, who handed him a respectful but conclusive protest against it, soliciting his interference, shows that, to accomplish his selfish purpose of a re-election, he means to avail himself of it; and that his purpose is so earnest, that it caused him to forget that a President of the United States is bound at all times to listen to the complaints of any portion of the people, and to listen as a gentleman.
(Loud cheers.)

And yet so palpable is the usurpation of that order, that two of the most respectable of the journals of his party (none have approved of it) have denounced it in no measured terms, — the Springfield Republican, of Massachusetts, and the New York Commercial Advertiser. In speaking of it, the former says, "He (Governor Johnson) has no more right to require an oath against the Chicago Platform than one against the Assembly's Catechism as a condition of voting in Tennessee. It is impossible to say one word in justification, or even in palliation of it."
And the latter, quoting the above approvingly, adds, "Mr. Lincoln lacks the courage, even if he had the disposition, to repudiate the conduct of his associate on the ticket, and to unloose the fettered ballot in Tennessee."
And, finally, Messrs. Wade and Davis state,
"if electors for President be allowed to be chosen" in States so organized, a "sinister light will be cast on the motives which induced the President to hold for nought the will of Congress rather than" governments of his creation. If these censures are just,
(and what fair mind can question them?) and there was nothing more tending to the same result, then even the quality of honesty of purpose, — the only one that any of his friends pretend to claim for him, — has no foundation in fact. (Applause.) But there is other matter. Look to the degrading fact of the unblushing manner in which he is using his power and patronage to secure the presidency. Not an officer of the government, from the highest to the lowest, not a contractor, great or small, who is not, with his knowledge and authority, expressed or implied, levied upon pecuniarily to accomplish that end. Even the medical department, whose sole duty it should be to minister to the wants of the sick and wounded soldier, and whose compensation is barely sufficient to afford support, are mulcted for the same purpose. Who does not know that conduct like this, in the early and pure days of the republic, would not only have been denounced by a universal and indignant public sentiment, but have been punished by impeachment and dismissal from office? (Loud applause.) And it is now not only degrading us in our own eyes, but in those of the enlightened world. I might proceed and give instances almost without number of the same description, but my heart fails me. I trust, for our country's safety and honor, that ere long the memory of all these disparaging and degrading acts will be lost amidst the general joy of a restored Union, a renewed prosperity, and an honest and elevated public opinion. But to that end there must be a change; and here, leaving Mr. Lincoln, I proceed to a far more agreeable subject. (Laughter.)

Can we not effect a change? ("We will.") Is our nation so far gone in its progress to ruin, in which it is being led, that its fate cannot be arrested? I confidently think that it is in our power to arrest it. We have lost hundreds of thousands of our best men North and South. We have had inculcated in the minds of the people dangerous political heresies. We have had the political atmosphere tainted by dishonest doctrine and practice. We have contracted a debt of enormous amount. We are in a war of unparalleled magnitude. We have, by a suicidal policy, produced a state of feeling between the two sections of unexampled acrimony. But yet all is not lost. Our resources are still abundant; our enterprise as great as ever; our morality, though now in a measure dormant, as pure as was that of our fathers; and in both sections, whatever may now meet the eye, there is at heart, it cannot be otherwise, as deep an affection for the Union. A common pride in its past glories achieved by common valor, a fond reverence for the memories of a great common ancestry, Lexington, Concord, and Bunker Hill, Saratoga, and Yorktown (loud cheers), these all appeal to us in one united voice to stand together again as our fathers stood, shoulder to shoulder, and heart to heart, and to live as they lived, and die as they died, the inheritors of a common freedom, protected by a common government, and glorying in the same great and hallow standard that covered and cheered them their days of trial, and blessed them with glad and starry influence in the last momer of their stay on earth. How, then, is this union of happiness and destiny to be attaine I say, in all the sincerity with which hum lips ever spoke, that I believe they can be tained by the election of McClellan. (Cheers He has the capacity, the patriotism, and t virtue which the great task requires. (Lo cheers.)

Gentlemen, I will not insult you or hi by stopping to refute in detail the numero false and calumnious accusations of whic since his nomination, he has been the obje He has been charged with actual treason with treasonably sympathizing with our sout ern brethren — with the want of any ca city, civil or military — with cowardice (de sive laughter) — and with a purpose to su render the Union. It must be sufficien with all honest men acquainted with his h tory during the pendency of the prese war, to refer to that history, as fully provi that each and every one of those charges absolutely false. Whose skill and valor re cued West Virginia from the tread of t foe, and achieved a succession of victori that electrified every loyal heart? McCl lan (cheers), who, because of those victorie was called to Washington to organize und ciplined troops. (Cheers.) Who broug them, as the Army of the Potomac, to a sta of discipline never excelled, and inspire them with a courage that has made ther when led by competent officers, the victo on every field where victory was possible human effort? McClellan. (Cheers.) W commanded them in the seven days' terrib battles of the Peninsula? (Cheers.) W was it, that, with a skill never surpassed equalled, rescued them from the dangers that campaign, a campaign only unsuccessf because of a want of Mr. Lincoln's pro ised support? Who afterward, when, by t mismanagement of their then recent leade they were demoralized, in a spirit of pure p triotism, at the solicitation of the tremblir President, and when, apparently, all was los placed himself, once more at their head, an instantly reduced them to a high state of di cipline, and made them once more invincible McClellan. (Cheers.) Who led them fort with to battle and victory at South Mounta and Antietam? (Cheers.) The same leade What was then thought of the now traduce McClellan? He received the thanks of t then commander-in-chief, Halleck, of t

President, and of Congress, expressed by each in terms as strong as our language supplies. In July, '61, Congress unanimously thanked him, his officers and soldiers, "for the recent brilliant victories over the rebels in Western Virginia;" in May, '62, "for the display of those high military qualities which secure important results with but little sacrifice of human life." Who, with a full knowledge of his entire conduct in his Virginia campaign, were, or professed to be, his friends? The President, and Secretary of War, in terms of unstinted eulogy, did him all honor, and assured him of their perfect and continued confidence. In a letter recently brought to light, the authenticity of which has not been denied, dated the 5th of July, 1862, the Secretary assured him of his undiminished friendship, saying, (I use his words), "I can only say, in this brief moment, that there is no cause in my heart or conduct for the cloud that wicked men have raised between us for their own base and selfish purposes. No man had a truer friend than I have been to you, and shall continue to be." (Laughter.) Was the Secretary sincere? Will any friend of his say that he was not? He must have been. To suppose otherwise is to do him the foulest wrong — to charge him with a duplicity, that, if true, no language could too strongly rebuke. He must have been sincere. In answer, then, to all the accusations against McClellan, I appeal confidently to his whole military career; to the unbounded confidence of his troops; the daily observers of his conduct; to the testimony of the commander-in-chief, of the Secretary of War, the President and Congress. And for the same purpose, and with equal confidence, I appeal to his Harrison's Landing letter to the President, of the 7th of July; viz., a letter pregnant with wisdom, and demonstrative of undying devotion to his country. (Cheers.) He has been unjustly censured for writing that letter, as if military commanders in every age had not advised their governments relative to measures calculated to affect the object of the war. The writing of such a letter, instead of being obtrusive, was a high duty; and how dreadful the calamities that have resulted from the President's disregard of its advice! It may be suggested, that the President's mind was afterwards changed, and that he lost the confidence he before had in McClellan. Is this so? Do we not know that this is not? His late postmaster-general, in a recent speech in New York referring to McClellan, stated that the President held him to be patriotic, and had concerted with General Grant to bring him again into the field as his adjunct, if he turned his back on the proposal of the peace junto at Chicago." And, in a subsequent speech in Maryland, he reiterated the statement. Has Mr. Montgomery Blair since denied or qualified it? He has not. Is he ashamed of integrity? All who know him will answer, Yes, beyond all doubt. What he asserted was a fact, that he professed to know, and had every opportunity of knowing. An arrangement, he tells us, was made between the President and General Grant to bring McClellan again in the field as his adjunct, and that it was frustrated only because McClellan refused to say that the people of the country, if they desired it, should not be permitted to vote for him as a competitor of Mr. Lincoln for the presidency. What could be more unjust to the President than to suppose, that at this period, when our army before Richmond is relied upon to strike a blow that it is thought will be fatal to the rebellion, he would, even for the prize of the Presidency, place an incompetent soldier in an important command in that army, — a command second only to that of the commander-in-chief?

I have refrained only because I deemed it altogether unnecessary to do more than deal generally with the charges against our candidate. One, however, has been made, that with your permission I will more particularly notice. It is that, during the battle of Malvern, he took refuge on board one of our gunboats in the James river. (Laughter.) There never was an allegation more totally false, and those who make it, and who have read McClellan's report, must know it to be false. In that report, after referring to his purpose to make a stand at Malvern, and to his having given instructions to General Barnard "for posting the troops as they arrived," he adds: "I again left for Malvern soon after daybreak, accompanied by several general officers. I once more made the entire circuit of the position, and then returned to Haxall's, whence I went with Captain Rogers to select a final location for the army and its depots. I returned to Malvern before the serious fighting commenced, and after riding along the lines, and seeing most cause to be anxious about the right, remained in that vicinity." How fully, if true, does this statement refute the calumny! Does any one doubt its truth? Has Captain Rogers or any general officer of the army been applied to to make good the charge, or has any one of them so dishonored himself as to attempt it? Not one; and yet, eorge B. McClellan as a Patriot, a Warrior, and a Statesman.

COURSE OF THE ADMINISTRATION, STATE OF THE FINANCES, ETC., ETC.

When we call to mind the character of the n sent to the army, the navy, and the leg- ative and executive departments of Govern- nt, to co-operate with and support the im- rtal father of his country, drawing from his re example, and reflecting back upon him, influence of the ennobling virtues which tinguished the men of that age, our hearts nd with patriotic gratitude to the Supreme ler of Nations for bestowing such men up- our country. He, in his infinite mercy, continued these gifts, of great and good n, at every crisis in our history. When s last calamity fell upon us, all our distin- ished statesmen of the third generation — koning from the birth of the Republic — ving been gathered to their fathers, and re remained among us only one of the il- trious warriors of the third generation, the sciousness of his faithfulness to the flag rived the rebellion of half its terrors. His ne was a tower of strength. He rallied und him the requisite forces to maintain quillity at the capital, and to preserve the vernment from that sanguinary usurpation power with which, in their blind insanity, ne of the insurgent leaders had intended to nalize the month of December, 1860. A teful people continues and will ever contin- ue to love and respect that illustrious warrior. The infirmities of age could not drive him from his post of duty, until the progress of the military operations against the rebels had brought forward a successor, whom he deemed worthy of filling that post.

GENERAL MC'CLELLAN THE SUCCESSOR OF GENERAL SCOTT.

To this successor of the Hero of Lundy's Lane — to his character as a patriot, a statesman and a warrior — your kind attention is now invited. When yet a boy, he was dedicated, with his own and his parents' consent, to his country's service. Entering that service, on the completion of his military education at West Point, he soon found opportunity, in the war with Mexico, to realize the cherished hopes of his friends, by the display of great skill and valor. Wherever duty called, he was always present, faithful and watchful. When peace returned to bless our land, he was prepared, like Cincinnatus, to resume the occupations of a civilian, but ever ready to serve his country in any capacity. He was selected as one of the officers of the army to visit Europe during the Crimean War; and having fulfilled that mission, depositing in the national archives a clear exposition of the progress of the military art as exhibited in that war, he accepted the laborious occupation of engineer on one of the Western Railroads: from whence he was called by Governor Dennison of Ohio, four days after the President issued his proclamation recognizing the existence of the rebellion, to take command of the troops organizing in the State of Ohio, in obedience to the call of the President, who, ten days subsequently, placed him in command of the Department of the Ohio, embracing the States of Ohio, Indiana and Illinois.

GEN. MC'CLELLAN IN WESTERN VIRGINIA.

There was no arsenal belonging to the General Government in his department. The Western States were wholly unprepared for the struggle. Without arms or munitions of war, or money, belonging to the General Government, he appealed to the State authorities, and the Governors responded promptly to the calls which he made upon them. This service of the Governors he acknowledged with all that gratitude which distinguishes a true man. Without any plans or instructions from Washington, as to the course he should pursue, finding his Department invaded by the rebels, he proceeded, as he says in his report, "forthwith to drive out the enemy." He did it rapidly and effectually. He rolled in the tide of victory from Western Virginia by a succession of brilliant exploits which electrified the whole country. He proved that the rebellion could and would be conquered by the loyal patriotic men of the country, in accordance with the principles of civilized warfare, directed by skilful generals. But his victories in Western Virginia were soon clouded by the disastrous affair of Bull Run, which had been directed from official quarters at Washington, regardless of the opinions as to the plan of the campaign, of the venerable chief tain who was the nominal head of the military power, next to the commander-in-chief, and who had counselled the organization of a more powerful army to meet and subdue the rebel forces.

GEN. MC'CLELLAN CALLED TO WASHINGTON.

When the disaster of Bull Run became known at Washington the Government turned at once to the Hero of Western Virginia, calling him to Washington the very next day. He arrived there on the 26th of July, and forthwith proceeded to organize the scattered and disorganized forces. There were in all about 50,000 infantry, less than 1,000 cavalry, and 650 artillery men, with nine imperfect field batteries of thirty pieces. There we no provisions for defence against a respe ble body of the enemy, — nothing to preve the enemy shelling the city from heights wi in easy range. Many soldiers had deserte the streets of Washington were crowded w straggling officers and men, absent withc authority, indicating a general want of dis pline and organization. By the 15th of O sober there were in and around Washingt an efficient, well organized army of 143,6 men. It is not requisite to go into further tails as to the condition of the forces at Wa ington. His distinguished services were knowledged by the President, who appoint him to the chief and general command of t all armies of the Union. In August, and ag in October, he communicated to the Pr ident, or Secretary of War, his views a opinions in extenso. On the fourth of A gust he urged the importance of increasi the army, remarking that "the authority the Government must be supported by ov whelming physical force." In October, remarked, "The unity of this nation, t preservation of our institutions, are so dea me that I have willingly sacrificed my priv happiness, with the single object of doing duty to my country. When the task is complished I shall be glad to return to the curity from which events have drawn m Yet, as if conscious of the inability of the ministration to understand the magnitude the work before them, he added: "Whate the determination of the Government may I will do the best I can with the Army of t Potomac, and I will share its fate, whate may be the task imposed upon me."

HIS COURSE AS GENERAL-IN-CHIEF.

We now come to his course and conduct the General-in-chief; and we shall find t during his administration of that office views and opinions on public affairs were p cisely the same as that expressed in his rec letter accepting the nomination to the Pr dency. He assumed the duties of this off on the 1st of November, 1861, and six da thereafter wrote to Gen. Buell, commandi the Department of the Ohio, —

"You will please constantly bear in mi the precise issue for which we are fightin That issue is the preservation of the Unic and the restoration of the full authority of t General Government over all portions of o territory. We shall most readily suppr this rebellion, and restore the authority of t Government by religiously respecting the co stitutional rights of all. I know that express the feelings and opinions of the President, when I say that we are fighting only to preserve the integrity of the Union and the constitutional authority of the General Government." To the same, on the 12th of November, he said: "As far as military necessity will permit, religiously respect the constitutional rights of all. It should be our constant aim to make it apparent to all that their property, their comfort, and their personal safety will be best preserved by adhering to the cause of the Union."

Addressing General Halleck, then in Missouri, November 11th, he said: "In regard to the political conduct of affairs you will please labor to impress upon the inhabitants of Missouri and the adjacent States, that we are fighting solely for the integrity of the Union, to uphold the power of our National Government, and to restore to the nation the blessings of peace and good order."

Upon the despatch of the expedition to North Carolina, in charge of General Burnside, he wrote in the instructions to that general: —

"In no case would I go beyond a moderate joint proclamation with the naval commander, which should say as little as possible about politics or the negro. Merely state that the true issue for which we are fighting is the preservation of the Union and upholding the laws of the General Government; and stating that all who conduct themselves properly will, as far as possible, be protected in their persons and property."

His orders to all the other generals commanding the armies of the Union were of like tenor. He planned the expedition to North Carolina, as well as that to New Orleans; and the result of his grand combination was a series of brilliant victories, crowned by the capture of the defences of New Orleans on the 23d of April, exactly one year from the day on which Governor Dennison, of Ohio, called him from railroad engineering to military service. Every where, except around Washington, victory seemed to favor our arms. But the interference of partisans at Washington, with the army of the Potomac and the movements for the reduction of Richmond, knew no bounds. The President himself would seem not to have been his own master; for in several letters to the commander of that army he apologized for interfering with the plans of the campaign against Richmond. These remarkable words occur in the President's letter of March 31, 1862, apologizing to General McClellan for this interference: —

"If you could know the full pressure of the case, I am confident that you would justify it." And this "pressure" is explained by the author* of the history of the President's administration to mean "the importunities" of another general and his friends. Such were the means resorted to to cripple and thwart the commander of the army of the Potomac in his campaign against the rebel capital in 1862. Then there was the ambition of the President to be a great general, as evinced in "his plan" for taking Richmond, which has been exploded by sad experience; while Grant is now closing the great work upon the original plan of the commander of the army of the Potomac.

But why should not the President be a great general? Since we are told by his biographer that he joined a volunteer company, in 1832, at the age of twenty-three, in the Black Hawk War, and thus obtained, in the language of that biographer, "a bit of military experience." But when the same writer adds, that this experience was "much more, in fact, than the most of our brigadier-generals had had before the commencement of the war," he makes an apparently unconscious admission of the truth that important commands have been given to incompetent generals, — political speech-makers, transferred from generals to judges, electioneering throughout the country for their employers. Alas! how many of our brave soldiers have been sacrificed on the field of battle by the incompetency of such generals! It is as if the rebel chief had himself designated who should direct our battles. Such are the men whose military skill was esteemed superior to that of the commander of the army of the Potomac.

INCOMPETENCY IN THE WAR AND NAVY DEPARTMENT.

Nothing in all our history is more disgraceful to an administration than the attempts made, either through carelessness or ignorance, or worse, to embarrass the army of the Potomac in the campaign against Richmond, in 1862. The Navy Department, next to the War Department, made its imbecility most effective for evil upon that occasion, and had it not been for the enterprise of private individuals, in sending the little "Monitor" to Fortress Monroe in time to check the ravages of the rebel "Merrimac," the disaster would have been overwhelming. Upon this subject I am happy to be able to appeal to the testimony of that distinguished ship owner, C. H. Marshall, Esq., himself a partisan of the administration, who, at a meeting of the Chamber of Commerce, of this city, on the 12th of March, 1862, offered a series of resolutions, which were adopted in the following shape: —

"Whereas, the National Government has been furnished by the people of the loyal States with ample means for taking all precautions necessary to guard the public interest and the private property of citizens at every exposed point, as well as to prosecute the war with vigor and success; and whereas, in the recent disastrous engagement in Hampton Roads, by a sudden attack of the enemy, which our naval forces were wholly unprepared to resist, many lives have been sacrificed, several national vessels destroyed, the flag of the Union lowered to rebels, and discredit brought on the Government of the country; therefore,

"Resolved, That, in the opinion of this Chamber, the chief cause of this disaster lies in the culpable neglect by which the defences in Hampton Roads were suffered to remain, after a knowledge of the near completion of the rebel iron-clad steamer Merrimac, with no other protection than one steam-frigate (the Minnesota), one disabled steam-frigate (the Roanoke), whose shafts, which had been broken for four months, might have been replaced during any two of those months, and two or three sailing vessels.

"Resolved, That under the protecting care of Providence, the safety of the property and life in the waters connected with Hampton Roads, if not also of other important harbors on the Atlantic coast, are due to the scientific skill of Ericsson, who designed the Monitor, and to the active, energetic, and gallant conduct of Lieut. Commanding Worden, and those under his command, who successfully defended the honor of the national flag.

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be respectfully requested to adopt efficient measures for the future protection of Hampton Roads.

"Resolved, That, in the opinion of this Chamber, the bill now pending in Congress, for building ten mail-clad vessels, ought to be passed without delay.

"Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions, under seal of the Chamber, be sent to the President of the United States."

Many vessels of war built under the direction of the Navy Department have proved such failures that they cannot, actually, float upon the water. But, although the head of that department is the greatest failure of all, let us remember that we have commanders in the navy who are not failures, — men like Farragut, Winslow, Dupont, Porter! When the navy was required at Fortress Monroe to co-operate in the attack on Richmond, in 1862, Goldsborough was sent to North Carolina, and the fleet at the mouth of the James River was left without a flag-officer!

The James River, now open for naval co-operation with Grant, was then closed to our transports; and it is a remarkable fact that the delay in the movements of the army of the Potomac, caused by the rebel iron-clad, Merrimac, closing the James to our transports, was really made to appear to be the fault of the general-in-chief of the army. For instance, the Merrimac emerged from her hiding-place on the 8th of March, and spread havoc throughout the U. S. squadron, until checked the following day by the Monitor: on the 11th of March, the President removed General McClellan from the office of general-in-chief; and the President's biographer wholly omits to mention the delay caused by the neglect of the Navy Department to provide the requisite force to subdue or blockade the rebel monster. That cause of delay was not, certainly, chargeable to General McClellan. The advance was ordered for the 22d of February; but it was not until the 11th of May that the career of the Merrimac was terminated. The utter inability of the President and the Cabinet to comprehend the magnitude of the rebellion, notwithstanding the repeated suggestions of the ablest commanders in the service, was painfully manifest in the movements of the army of the Potomac throughout the whole progress of events, ending with the battle of Antietam. More than this, the course of those events demonstrated the absurdity, to use no harsher term, of men at the head of the Government undertaking to direct great military movements pertaining to the science of war, of which they were wholly ignorant. Mr. Seward recently took occasion to compliment Mr. Stanton with his military proficiency, — the village lawyers constituting the administration being a mutual admiration society, — but Stanton's successes have resulted wholly from his adherence to the original plans of McClellan, and his failures have usually resulted from departing from those plans, or from his inability to comprehend them. Mr. Lincoln's plans, and the plans of Mr. Stanton, for the campaign of the summer of 1862, were persisted in long enough to defeat Gen. McClellan's plan. That was the end of the campaign on the Peninsula.

GEN. Mc'CLELLAN AGAIN SAVES WASHINGTON, AND GAINS THE VICTORY AT ANTIETAM.

Having got the army of the Potomac back to protect Washington, at the close of August, 1862, the President placed General Pope in command, leaving Gen. McClellan without any forces at Alexandria, where he could hear the sound of the guns in the battles which Gen. Pope was fighting with the enemy. Gen. McClellan asked permission to go to the front, that he might by his presence encourage the men he had so long been associated with. It was not granted. He was kept there, stripped of command, until news of the disaster to Gen. Pope's army reached Washington, when the President and Gen. Halleck hurried early in the morning to Gen. McClellan's residence, and placed the national capital and its defences once more in his hands. That was on the 2d of September. Again Gen. McClellan concentrated and reorganized a broken army, and led them to victory upon his own plans, without interference. Thirteen days after he took command, when the news of the defeat of the rebels began to reach Washington, the President telegraphed to him: "Your despatch of to-day received. God bless you, and all with you. Destroy the rebel army, if possible." The battles terminated on the 17th of September, and that night our forces slept, conquerors, upon the battle-field of Antietam.

GEN. Mc'CLELLAN AGAIN REMOVED.

On the 7th of November Gen. McClellan was removed from command and Gen. Burnside appointed in his place.

The man who, within nineteen months, had twice saved the capital, who had three times organized an effective army, who first rolled in the tide of victory over this most cruel rebellion, who planned those combinations which resulted so victoriously wherever they could be carried out without interference of political partisans, — that man was set aside; and village lawyers, in their pride of power and of place, have now the audacity to boast the success of his plans as their own. But mark the patriotic docility with which this much abused general submitted to all that his superior officers were pleased to inflict upon him. When removed from the office of General-in-chief, he wrote to the President: —

"I believe I said to you some weeks since, in connection with some Western matters, that no feeling of self-interest or ambition should ever prevent me from devoting myself to the service. I am glad to have the opportunity to prove it; and you will find, that, under present circumstances, I shall work just as cheerfully as before, and that no consideration of self, will, in any manner, interfere with the discharge of my public duties."

When stripped of his command, at Alexandria, hearing the battle raging in the distance, he wrote to Gen. Halleck: —

"I cannot express to you the pain and mortification I have experienced to-day in listening to the distant sound of the firing of my men. As I can be of no further use here, I respectfully ask that if there is a probability of the conflict being renewed to-morrow, I may be permitted to go to the scene of battle with my staff, merely to be with my own men, if nothing more: they will fight none the worse for my being with them."

All who have served with him bear testimony to the affection which his men entertain for him. His solicitude for the welfare of his men, his skilful manœuvring to achieve victory at the smallest possible sacrifice of life, his personal bravery in battle, his consummate abilities as a general, and the purity of his character, readily account for that affection. It is due to the President to say that he frequently acknowledged Gen. McClellan's great abilities as a commander. At the close of the campaign on the Peninsula, July 5, 1862, the President wrote to him: —

"Be assured, the heroism and skill of yourself, officers, and men, is [are] and forever will be appreciated." Again: "All accounts say better fighting was never done. Ten thousand thanks for it."

WHY THE ADMINISTRATION WISHED TO CRUSH GEN. Mc'CLELLAN.

It may well be asked why the President and Mr. Stanton treated Gen. McClellan as they did. The President himself has given the key to this secret, in his despatch referring to the "pressure" brought to bear upon him, by the politicians, to reduce Gen. McClellan's forces. Gen. McClellan was to be crushed if possible. He could not be made subservient to the schemes of the politicians; and the recent attempt of the elder Mr. Blair, to prevent the general being a candidate in opposition to President Lincoln, is the last link in that complete chain of evidence which fastens the intrigue upon the administration. The slowness of the General's movements, with the inadequate forces and raw levies under his command, against a more numerous force fighting upon the defensive, was seized as a pretext to find fault with him. He has been vindicated by the terrible sacrifices made by those who have adopted or pursued different plans from his. The politicians have shown how absurd it is to expect success in arms, "when campaigns are intrusted to men who have no knowledge of war." Gen. Naglee, of Philadelphia, has, in a recent letter, dated the 27th of last month, made a full disclosure of the efforts of Mr. Stanton to destroy Gen. McClellan, and of the rudeness with which he carried his plans with the President. Mr. Stanton, it seems, aspired to the distinction of a great general, and the chief of the cabinet, Mr. Seward, has recently introduced him to the public in that capacity. Gen. Naglee states that as soon as Gen. McClellan left Washington, for the Peninsular Campaign,—all the arrangements for which had been made, and approved by the President and a council of Generals, McClellan's force to be two hundred thousand men, — Stanton relieved him of all the armies not under his immediate command, and assumed command of them himself. But it is too painful to follow the details of Stanton's generalship and intrigues, and I refer to Gen. Naglee's letters for the humiliating facts of the case.

MR. LINCOLNS APOLOGY TO GEN. MC'CLELLAN.

The President, on 31st March, 1862, appears to have been fully conscious of the mortifying situation he was placed in by Mr. Stanton and the politicians; for in his despatch of that date to General McClellan, announcing the breaking up of the original plan of the campaign, he confesses that he was pursuing a course which gave him "great pain." Let us hope that on the 4th of March next, at noon, General McClellan will relieve him of all such "pain."

The President's apology to General McClellan for breaking up the plan of the campaign referred to something else besides "pain." That despatch speaks of "pressure" in the case, and the President's historian alludes to the political friends of another general as making this "pressure." But that despatch made no reference to duty, to the sacredness of the inaugural oath, to the interests of the nation, the preservation of the Union, the suppression of the rebellion, &c. Oh, no! That despatch is not "honest old Abe." It is Abraham Lincoln the politician, the sorry transgressor confessing his iniquity, dividing the spoils of office, and regulating the scramble of the office-seekers, pandering to the lust for office, aiming at a re-election and the humiliation of a rising competitor, pushed on by Stanton at his back.

No double-dealing has ever been charged upon General McClellan. Ever honest and frank, he is always consistent with himself. General Naglee says that Stanton pretended to doubt his loyalty to the Union. That has been the trick of the corrupt minions of the administration, ever since the rebellion broke out, in regard to any one who would not unite with them in their schemes of personal gain or partisan aggrandizement. At first, any man who remonstrated against going or sending some one to the cells of Fort Lafayette at the bidding of Mr. Seward, was denounced as a "secessionist;" and now "a copperhead" is the favorite epithet with those who arrogate to themselves the attributes of infallibility in the administration of the Government. We are told that the administration is the Government, and that the Government, like the king in a despotism, "can do no wrong." This is the divine right of kings in a new shape. It certainly is the right divine to govern wrong, so far as Messrs. Lincoln, Seward, Stanton, and Welles are concerned.

GEN. MC'CLELLAN'S STRAIGHT-FORWARD CHARACTER.

I have said that General McClellan has always proved consistent with himself. In July, 1862, writing to the President, he said, "The Constitution and the Union must be preserved." He says the same thing, only more forcibly, in his recent letter accepting the nomination: "The Union must be preserved at all hazards." There is no double-dealing in these words. Like his military campaign in Western Virginia, they are direct, energetic, and decisive. And he always means exactly what he says: in this respect, his writings more resemble those of Washington than any other hero's with which I am acquainted. Indeed, there is a purity of style in all his writings, a straightforward honesty, exactly like that of Washington's despatches, letters, and State papers. With Washington, the Union — that Union which constitutes us our people — the Union which confers upon us the attributes of a nation — the Union which gives us a country and a flag — was the first, the highest object of affection, next to God. So it is with McClellan, — "the Union at all hazards." His character is a reflex of that of Washington in his religious devotion. Washington, in all his great battles as well as in the ordinary occurrences of life, sought the aid and guidce of Almighty wisdom and power. So th McClellan: the same spotless purity of ivate life, which distinguished the one, char- erizes the other.

E CORRUPT PARTISAN POLICY OF THE AD- MINISTRATION.

Let us now turn to the public character, e policy, and the conduct of the men com- sing the administration which has expelled is great and good general from the army, d heaped upon him all these thankful indig- ties.

In April, 1861, when the conspirators ized Fort Sumter, there was a universal y of indignation. No man ever had a irer chance than Mr. Lincoln then had of aking himself the rallying point of all loyal tizens. The state of the country ought to ave dictated such a policy. But instead of a accommodation to the circumstances, the me of administration bore an analogy to that Louis the Fourteenth in the meridian of his lory and his triumphs. Party spirit might ave been disarmed of its rancor, had he arried into effect his own declarations as set orth in his inauguration speech, and we hould not have had the unfortunate divisions hat still exist amongst us. But he has taken different stand, and placed himself as the hief of a faction. The road to favor is hrough the quagmire of party discipline; and he recommendation to notice is to be esti- nated by the devotion to the doctrines of cer- ain political sectaries. The dangers and the orruptions and the prodigies of the times have ut an end to all neutrality in politics. The overnment is in the hands of a most per- icious faction. It is the task, it is the luty, of the friends of liberty and order — he old Jeffersonian and Jackson democrats, and the old constitutional whigs of the Clay and Webster school — to unite together and exert themselves; for every hour the rising tides are eating away the narrow isthmus upon which the adherents of the Constitution are stationed; and every hour it becomes more necessary to oppose some barrier to these en- croachments.

I will not insult you, at such a moment as the present, with any notice of the squabbles in the cabinet, of the recriminations of the ad- herents of Chase and Seward, the rivals for the succession. Mr. Lincoln has been nomin- ated for re-election, and Messrs. Chase and Blair have been removed from office, — the last named gentleman, you will remember, was expelled from the cabinet not long after his father had failed to induce General Mc- Clellan to decline the nomination to the Presi- dency. By the expulsion of Cameron, Chase, and Blair, the unscrupulous Seward, and his notorious adherents, have secured in their own hands the whole patronage of the Government. Hiram Barney is summarily ejected from the custom house in this city, where, as else- where, the poor clerks have been summoned to give up a portion of their earnings to the party leaders.

Time fails to enable me to give all the changes and movements effected by Seward, who is now in the ascendency and in undis- puted control. His plans are far-reaching and sagacious, as they have ever been. I will let him speak for himself: In November 1863, he repaired to Auburn, and made a speech in which he fulminated the threat that if his par- ty did not carry the then pending election, the Ship of State would be "drifted and dash- ed" against the rocks of a lee shore. And he added, as to the election this fall: — "What if they (the Democratic party) should then succeed in electing a President in 1864, against the majority who elected Abraham Lincoln in 1860? Can that majority be expected to acquiesce without voting and with- out bloodshed? Certainly not: and then you have perpetual civil war, which is nothing else than perpetual anarchy."

Here is a threat of repeating the very crime — that horrible and greatest civil crime — which the rebels committed. Seward was sup- posed to have been in a state of mental de- rangement when he made that speech, and very little attention was paid to it at the time. Recently, however, the recollection of it has been brought to the public mind by repetition of the same threat, during another visit to Auburn, in another speech which he made there a few weeks ago. Here is the form in which he made the threat in this last speech: "If such a thing could happen as that the Chicago candidate, nominated upon such an agreement, should be elected President of the United States on the first Tuesday of Novem- ber next, who can vouch for the safety of the country against the rebels, during the inter- val which must elapse before the new admin- istration can constitutionally come into power? It seems to me that such an election would tend equally to demoralize the Union, and to invite the insurgents to renew their efforts for its destruction."

He would be a traitor, you observe, in 1863, when he talked of "bloodshed;" but the threat is modified, in 1864, to take the form of an interrogatory, or an hypothetical conjec- ture as to what "seems" or what "would."

In a few weeks more he will be prepared to welcome General McClellan with open arms; and urge him to come to Washington at once, and prepare to enter upon his duties as President on the 4th of March next. Yes; and I have no doubt that Mr. Seward will declare that his dear and intimate friend, Mr. Thurlow Weed, and himself, desired nothing so much as the election of General McClellan to the presidency. I have no doubt that in less than a month the parlors of Mr. Seward will be thrown open for the reception of General McClellan and his friends, if they will only walk into them.

As to the unconstitutional acts of the administration, Mr. Lincoln's own friends, Senator Wade, of Ohio, and Henry Winter Davis, representative from Maryland, were constrained to issue a formal protest against his attempt to override the constitution and the proceedings of Congress relative to the re-organization of loyal governments in the rebel States. Does Mr. Lincoln believe that the American people could ever be imposed upon by such re-organizations: that they would ever approve of a system by which corruption would pay for votes in part, and fear force the remainder? Who at this time of day is unacquainted with the springs and wires that would be employed in such a miserable puppet show? How can the loyal people in those States believe themselves free and sovereign, when they would be made to take an oath, as a test to give them the right of voting? What could they object to all this, surrounded by armed men? They would only have to hold their tongues, and to bow down their heads before their masters. But he will probably abandon the attempt to re-elect himself by the votes of such States, for the recent State elections must admonish him, in the same words he applied to Mr. Montgomery Blair, when turning him out of the Cabinet a few days ago, that "his time has come."

The arbitary arrests made by Seward and Stanton in places where rebellion did not exist, were wholly injustifiable and unnecessary; because the constitutional forms of law could have been gone through with, in perfect safety.

Arbitary imprisonment and punishment upon mere suspicion, most vexations and odious instruments of despotic power, have been employed on several occasions and in many instances in places where there were no military operations. Barrière, in a report made to the Convention during the French Revolution in reference to a law which had abolished personal liberty in France, says, "The quality of mercy is the first sacrifice which a good republican owes to his country. In order to preserve the vigor of the government, an institution, terrible indeed but necessary, has been disseminated throughout all the sections &c. I mean the law for the arrest of suspected persons. The keen and piercing eye of jealous liberty has been fixed upon every citizen, has penetrated into every family, and pervaded every habitation. Public opinion has marked out the persons who ought to be suspected, and they have accordingly fallen under the severity of the law." Thus you have explained to you the principal advantage both of the theory and practice of the system of arbitrary arrest. It contains the principle of impartial persecution, equally applicable to the separate interests of every distinct class and description of the people, from the farmer and the banker and merchant down to the industrious manufacturer and hard working mechanic and day laborer. Are these the arts of government? Are these the means by which the discordant interests and the contending passions of our people can be brought to act in concert? I speak to men affectionately attached to the general principles of liberty — men accustomed to think on whatever can effect their interests and their happiness. Among such men, I am persuaded that I shall not be contradicted, if I were to contend that a tyranny so constituted must of necessity be odious to the people.

GEN. MC'CLELLAN'S PLAN OF PUTTING DOWN THE REBELLION.

As to slavery, whose votaries, commencing the rebellion, have destroyed themselves General McClellan showed how to deal with it constitutionally and effectually. It is no requisite to exterminate the people of the South to effect the subjugation of the rebellion. The rebels are fighting now only for terms of surrender. General McClellan began the conquest in Western Virginia, and would have completed it long since had he been permitted. His plan was and is a very simple and effective one. In Western Virginia it was simply this, to "proceed forthwith," as he stated, to drive the rebels out.

That was in April, 1861. In July following, he communicated it to the President, and it was, in his own words, "to crush out the rebellion in its very heart." In October of the same year, addressing the Secretary of War, he declared that "the great object to be accomplished" was "the crushing defeat of the rebel army." In all his letters, official as well as private, — and in all his reorts, — the same plan is advocated. In his West-Point speech, he declared that the only alternative for our choice is "the suppression of the rebellion or the destruction of our nationality," and that if we let the South go, as Mr. Sumner and others proposed, we would encounter "the fate of the divided republics of Italy and South America," and fly into fragments, at endless war with each other. In his letter of acceptance, so full of noble patriotic sentiments, he declares over and over again the same sentiments.

As for example, his appeal to his whole "course" through life, to the "record" of his public life, to his "long and varied services," to his "love and reverence" for the Union, and declaring, explicitly, that the war for "the preservation of our Union," the re-establishment of the Union in all its integrity," and that "the Union must be preserved at all hazards." Now, contrast his straightforward policy with the side issues which the administration and its adherents have raised, and the fickle, changing, ever-varying course of the President, who seems too weak to resist what he terms "pressure." In his card to whom it may concern, last summer, he refused to permit any one to approach him from the rebel States to negotiate peace without power to negotiate also for the abolition of slavery; but, few days thereafter, he lets Seward go to Auburn to declare that the rebel States may come back with their slaves and slavery. It is, indeed, true, as he said to the people of Kentucky in his celebrated conversation with the two visitors from that State, that he has not sought to control events, but has let events control him. Hence it is that his course has resembled the weather-cock, changing with every wind, in every direction, instantly "boxing the compass," as sailors term it. His platform is one thing one day, and another the next. But General McClellan's platform never varies; it is always the same, and has always been the same. It is the Union, the Constitution, the laws, the suppression of the rebellion, confiscation and the destruction of slavery under the constitution, wherever and whenever a rebel can be found in arms. He does not say as Mr. Sumner did, in substance, a few days ago in Faneuil Hall, Boston, that we must destroy the Constitution in order to complete confiscation and abolition; and let them go, rather than have them come back with their tattered rag of slavery. No: Gen. McClellan would not destroy the Constitution to complete the destruction of any national evil; but he would destroy every such evil in accordance with the principles of the Constitution. He would not set the house on fire, and burn it down, in order to clean out the soot that had gathered in the chimney. He would clean out the chimney. But to burn down the house, and drive all the family out of doors, seems to be the settled aim and policy of Mr. Lincoln's party. And here is precisely the difference which exists, and which has existed in all ages, between radical men and conservative men. The radical would destroy. He would tear down, burn down, and crush out any thing that stood in the way of his ambition or aims. Just so with Messrs Sumner and Stanton, &c. The conservative, on the other hand, would preserve whatever there is that is useful, and repair and improve it — reform it, patch it, mend it — and change it to conform to the progress of the age and the most enlightened Christian civilization.

Hence it is that radicals are always revolutionary, turbulent, and rebellious, and peculiarly dangerous in a republic, as we now find, by sad experience, from their insurrectionary violence in our Southern States. And hence, also, the impossibility of peace, so long as the radicals of the South reign at Richmond, and the radicals of the Constitutional Government are in power at Washington. The rebel leader fastened himself upon the Southern people for six years, and they cannot shake him off now, although they are well known to be heartily sick of him and his rebellion. But we can remove our radical rulers, in accordance with our Constitution and laws, and thus prepare the way for peace and reconciliation as early, at the very farthest, as 1866, when Davis's term expires, and he will no longer have any power over the rebels. My own opinion is, however, that the election of Gen. McClellan next month will give us peace in thirty days, or within six months thereafter; because, if the rebels will not submit at once, he will, as he did in Western Virginia, to use his own words, "proceed forthwith to drive them" into submission, with such a force as it will be impossible for them to resist; and if Jeff. Davis does not give up, he will be forced to escape probably into Mexico, for I apprehend that Mr. Wells's successor, under General McClellan, will stop Jefferson Davis's blockade runners, and shut up the Atlantic coast completely. We shall then get the cotton crop, and, by a tax on it, pay our national debt, and resume specie payments. Our debt, I know, is assuming frightful proportions; and although poor Mr. Chase has been made the sole scape-goat of the financial blunders of the administration, Mr. Lincoln and his cabinet and friends cannot escape their share of the odium. It is notorious that Mr. Seward and all his friends, among whom Mr. Spalding, of this State — whom the people compelled afterwards to stay at home — was peculiarly officious, did every thing in their power to drive on the paper-money issues. Mr. Fessenden is now doing what he can to repair the evil; but he does it bunglingly, having had no practical skill.

THE GOLD BILL; THE FRENCH REVOLUTIONISTS.

He (Mr. Fessenden) deserves great credit, however, for getting the gold bill repealed. That, by the way, was one of Seward and Chase's greatest schemes: they pushed it through Congress with all their power, notwithstanding the remonstrances of business men of skill and experience. It was so outrageous, however, it was so much like the mad projects of the French Revolutionists of the last century, that it speedily worked its own cure, thanks to the intelligent and docile patriotism of our own great and good people. I must here call your attention to a remarkable statement, given by a distinguished statesman, of the fiscal operations of the French Revolutionary Government, in 1793, to procure gold and silver, which is particularly applicable to the present times: he says, "It will appear rather extraordinary that the first measure taken with this view should have been the proscription of those metals. A letter is received by the Minister of Finance from Fouché, commissioner in several of the departments, in which he expresses great indignation against gold and silver. He says, "Gold and silver have been the causes of all the calamities of the republic. I know not by what weak compliance those metals are still suffered to remain in the hands of suspected persons: let us degrade and vilify gold and silver; let us fling these deities of monarchy in the dirt, and establish the worship of the austere virtues of a republic." He however adds: "I send you seventeen chests filled with gold, silver, and plate of all sorts, the spoil of churches and castles: you will see with peculiar pleasure two crosiers, and a ducal coronet of silver gilt." This ingenious idea of vilifying and degrading valuable effects by seizing them for the use of the republic is not lost upon the Minister of Finance. A few days after the receipt of this letter, a citizen appears at the bar, and desires to be permitted to exchange certain pieces of gold and silver bearing the ima of the tyrant for republican paper. Th patriotic and disinterested offer, as you m imagine, was gladly accepted by the Conve tion; but upon a motion being made that ho orable mention of the transaction should inserted in the notes, the Minister of Finan rises with the utmost indignation to oppose monstrous a proposition. He delivers a mo eloquent and vehement invective against go and silver: he says, "In a short time t world will be too happy, if we should deig to receive pieces of metal bearing the effi of tyrants in exchange for Republican assi nats; already the whole nation rejects a despises those corrupting metals, which tyran originally brought from America for the sc purpose of enslaving us. I have in conte plation the plan of a sumptuary law, by whi I will drive the vile dung once more into t bowels of the earth." What was the sumpt ary law by which the Minister of Finan proposed to accomplish this salutary reform Here is that excellent law. "All gold a silver metal in specie or plate, all jewels, go and silver lace, or valuable effects which sh be discovered buried in the earth, or co cealed in cellars, walls, rubbish, floors pavements, hearths or chimneys, or in a secret place, shall be seized and confiscat for the use of the Republic; and the infor er shall receive a twentieth part of the val of whatever he shall discover, to be paid assignats." Concealment alone is the crim on which the law attaches, without even a of the ordinary pretences of disaffection. consequence of this decree, every place which it was possible to conceal treasure searched with the utmost rigor; the priva of every house is violated; every cellar a garden is dug up; and the Minister of F nance, with the most unrelenting spirit persecution, pursues the objects of his hatr and contempt even to the bowels of the eart where he had threatened to drive them.

THE NATIONAL FINANCES.

As to our financial condition, perhaps ought not to say much here — I have said great deal on that subject within the pa three years. I confess I am now very an ious about the future state of our finance If Lincoln should be re-elected, I loo with dread and alarm to our future financi situation. I tremble to think of what will l the condition of our people, when I call t mind the project of such financiers as Tha Stevens of Pennsylvania, Chairman of th Committee of Ways and Means of the Hous

ould issue a thousand millions of paper , and pay the interest of the national ith it, — who would run the barrel of p to thirty dollars and the ton of coal y dollars, rather than lay taxes to pay war as far as possible, as we go along;
I am greatly apprehensive of terrible ial disaster if Lincoln be re-elected.

o not know that I can better explain the ial policy of Lincoln and Seward than ing you the substance of a speech which elivered in the Senate, by Senator Sher-of Ohio, in May last. It was reported Washington Daily Globe of June 1st,

e Hon. Senator spoke with that consciss of authority and in that imperative which implied a conviction that his man-were to be obeyed, and that no differences inion were to be permitted to swerve the in the path he directed. It is, thereof the greatest importance to the finaninterests of the country that the princi-and theories enunciated in this speech ld be thoroughly understood.

he leading topic of the speech is the new nal banking system. He explicitly des that the paper money to be issued by new banks is to be made to take the place very other kind of paper money, whether e Government or the State banks. Hav-explained his plan "to compel the banks" ithdraw their circulation — to "compel to do so by taxation" — he proceeds to are that it is the policy of the Government educe the volume of the issues of legal-er paper money, and to finally supersede e issues altogether with the notes of the national banks. Of the circulation of kinds then in existence, he says: —

This large redundant circulation must be ed as rapidly as possible, but I ask you it can be done now, with two systems of ks rivals with each other. Suppose the vernment desires to reduce the circulating lium. The very moment the Government mences reducing its circulation, that very ment these banks would commence to inase theirs."

That is to say, the old banks would issue ir own notes and encounter the risk of nkruptcy, if the Government did not supply al-tender notes to them. This is the same nder that Mr. Hooper made in the House, en he attempted to conceal the fact that it the excess of the Government legal-tender tes which enables the old banks, as well as the new banks, to put out their own notes.

Mr. Sherman explains the plans of the Government, relative to the issues of the new banks taking the place of its own, in these words: —

"I take it to be the policy of the Government, as it is the plainest dictate of reason, to retire its circulation as fast as the national bank currency is issued. We can do it by funding; we can do it in various ways. We must do it. If the United States continue to issue its own notes in the form of currency, and also authorize national bank notes to be issued pari passu, both together, in overwhelming amounts, as a matter of course the result would be to destroy all values; but I take it that it is and must be the policy of the Government to retire as rapidly as possible the United States notes, and to substitute for them the national currency."

Not one word of explanation is given as to the mode in which this new "national currency" is to be redeemed in real money, or how specie payments are to be resumed under the new system. When it was proposed in the Senate to have the new banks accumulate a part of the specie obtained by them for interest on the Government stocks held by them, so as to prepare for resumption of specie payments, he opposed it. And having explained how the new banks are to be made to furnish a paper money, to supersede that of the Government, upon the basis of the capital subscribed by private citizens, one would naturally suppose that he would complete his theory with an explanation of the mode in which specie payment could be resumed by the Government and the new banks; but he is silent on this point: it is all paper, paper. He does not propose to make the new bank notes a legal tender: that would conflict with the Constitution. He says, indeed, that "the national bank currency will be better, and in less danger of repudiation, than the greenbacks;" but he does not make it appear how they are to be made any better, except through the seizure of the capital of the private citizens invested in or deposited with the new banks, which, he says, "are always within the power of Congress: every man who goes into them knows that the system must be so conducted that the public sentiment will sustain them, or else theg will go to the wall. The law organizing them may be repealed, and they may be driven out at any time by the power of Congress. They are under bonds for good behavior. They file in the vaults of the United States more than the amount of their circulation in bonds of the United States taken at this time when it is necessary to sell our bonds."

This is the currency and banking system, thus prepared to become the cat's-paw of partisan strife and caprice, that is to supersede that standard of value in real money, which the constitution has established! One of the principal supporters of the system has thus clearly defined the policy by which it is to be controlled. The exposé is opportune. The people can now see the whole scheme. It is plainly an organized system for controlling the party politics of the country. It is the reflex of the old United States bank, and the State "pet bank," systems. It is a complete union of partisan organizations with banking associations, under the pretext of getting possession of the circulating medium of the country for the relief of the Government, instead of borrowing money upon bonds or treasury notes. The people have again and again frowned upon these schemes of partisans to make the economical affairs of the country the play-things of party. So they will again.

He confounds a paper money with money composed of the precious metals, comparing the assumed power to issue the former to the power of coining the latter; and thus misrepresents the operation of the natural laws governing monetary systems.

He compares the probable fate of the funded stocks, or debt of the United States, had Government issued bonds instead of notes, with that of the legal-tender paper money known as "assignats," issued in France, to prove the wisdom of adopting the legal-tender issues now in use in this country.

He refrains from explaining the ruinous tendencies of the amount of bank-note currency which he advocated, although he acknowledged that the currency was excessive; and he must have been aware of the fact that the proposed three hundred millions of new bank notes largely exceeded the amount of the circulation of the old banks.

He pleads the necessity of getting "money," to make every payment with, as an excuse for Government issues of "legal-tender" paper money, thus ignoring the employment of those media of exchange in which the business of the civilized world is conducted, without the active circulation of metallic money, upon a specie basis.

He conceals the fact that the ne tional banks are keeping the public r and loaning it out on interest, althoug pay no interest to Government for the that money, and draw interest on the s deposited as security for the notes issue.

He ignores the constitutional measu standard of value; and advocates a p money system without any avowed k edge of the mode upon which that s can be practically sustained, except b threat of destroying the banks which it, and confiscating the private proper citizens invested in such banks.

He acknowledges the tendency to re ation of a Government paper money is in excess, yet defends the excessive i that he has aided in Congress.

He expresses an opinion that it is policy of the Government to reduce quantity of legal-tender paper without ing any returns to sustain the opi when the price of gold was rising a ninety premium, the dollar being wortl tle more than fifty cents, which was a indication of the extent to which the rency was being inflated, and which and still is, overwhelming the working ple of the country in the deepest dist compelling them to pay double, and many cases more than double, for the essaries of life.

He misrepresents or conceals the fact relation to the circulation of the old ba throughout the States, giving the circ tion, in figures, of nine banks in this which had expanded, and witholding figures as to the other forty-three banks this city, which had in some cases altoge er withdrawn or greatly reduced their culation.

He charged the old banks with wanto inflating the currency because they rece and deal in the issues of the Governme which have been made a compulsory p ment by the tender acts, and to refu which would have been to refuse to recei payment of debts due to them.

He pleads the use of paper money as war measure, whereas the most successf wars have been conducted to a triumpha termination upon the basis of a real mon system after paper money had proved di astrous.

He conceals the facts as to the issues o legal-tender paper having wrought a force and cruel confiscation of the incomes o widows and orphans derived from mortg

avings-bank deposits, life insurances, her permanent investments, while the sed taxation of the rich, and those ing fortunes by the war, has been ly met by the high premium on the btained for interest on the public debt. charges the inflation of the currency he old banks, without acknowledging ney were made to inflate, and the sus- n of specie payments made lawful, by excessive issues of Government paper, lawful money, which have deranged ues, aroused wild manias of specula- converted nearly every honest busi- ursuit into a species of lottery or ing, produced tendencies to vice and ality, and created a love for extrava- and display destructive to that eco- al and virtuous way of life which our lican fathers taught us was most be- g our character as a democratic re- an people.

to the course of the Democratic Par- e resolutions and votes in Congress, l unanimously, prove that they have mpathies with the rebellion. So also Mr. Pendleton. He voted supplies staining the Government and prosecu- he war. As to the views of the Dem- c party upon the question of negro en- nts, they have been fully sustained indicated by General Sherman, one r most successful commanders, in his of July 30, 1864.

to the character of the opposition to ral McClellan, an occurrence has re- y taken place in newspaper circles affords a good illustration. I quote llowing account of it:—

The inexperienced editor of some West- ournal having published the subjoined raphs under the impression that they extracts from a speech of the late Sena- ouglas, of Illinois, the New York Trib- eproduces them in its columns, saying:

The lamented Douglas thus powerfully expressed himself on the subject of submission to Rebels in arms:

"'To efface the insult offered to our flag, to secure ourselves from the fate of the divided Republics of Italy and South America, to preserve our Government from destruction, to enforce its just power and laws, to maintain our very existence as a nation,—these were the causes which compelled us to draw the sword. Rebellion against a Government like ours, which contains the means of self-adjustment and a pacific remedy for evils, should never be confounded with a revolution against despotic power, which refuses redress of wrongs. Such a rebellion cannot be justified on ethical grounds; and the only alternatives for our choice are its suppression or the destruction of our nationality.

"'At such a time as this, and in such a struggle, political partisanship should be merged into a true and brave patriotism, which thinks only of the good of the whole country. It was in this cause, and with these motives, that so many of our comrades have given their lives, and to this we are all personally pledged in all honor and fidelity. Shall such devotion as that of our dead comrades be of no avail? Shall it be said in after ages that we lacked the vigor to complete the work thus begun? that, after all these noble lives freely given, we hesitated and failed to keep straight on until our land was saved? Forbid it, Heaven, and give us firmer, truer hearts than that.'"

The above "powerful" observations so heartily approved by the Tribune, supposing them to be utterances of "the lamented Douglas," are from the eloquent and patriotic oration of George B. McClellan at West Point. It will be seen that the Tribune can sometimes be just to Gen. McClellan, but only by accident."

One of the strangest occurrences in the conduct and policy of the administration related to the substitute brokers in this city. Secretary Stanton or the President at one time permitted them to go on with their business, then arbitrarily arrested and imprisoned them; and then on a recent occasion encouraged them to go on again, and actually granted them licenses to do so, Wilson's speech stopping recruits, and the course of Stanton in harmony with that speech, were in strange contrast with the constant demand of leading generals for more men and larger armies.

INTELLIGENCE AND SKILL REQUIRED IN THE ADMINISTRATION.

In conclusion, permit me to say that, in my humble judgment, the great want of our country now is ordinary intelligence in the men at the head of public affairs. The incompetency of our public men has led to innumerable failures. Our foreign affairs, too, have been so strangely mismanaged that foreign powers have ventured to foster privateers to prey upon our commerce, although the rebel government sending out these privateers has not been recognized as an independent power by any nation. Our Government, for some unexplained cause, would not license privateers to destroy the enemy's vessels, and thus our commerce has been destroyed; merchants compelled to stand with their hands tied, watching their burning ships, without being able to raise a hand to defend themselves. I dare say, Mr. Seward has some grand rhetorical exposition prepared to print in defence of such a policy, but I cannot understand the principles have governed him and Mr. Lincoln matter. The effect has been, practica destroy our mercantile marine, and t our commerce — once the greatest, in to in the world — to other nations, princip Great Britain, which has built and equ rebel privateers to destroy our ships.

With the election of Gen. McClell shall have patriotism, skill, honesty an or. His election will be the first-fruits purifying influence of our civil war. honor and integrity will replace the grov political tricksters now in power. True manship will once more direct our affair peace and prosperity, with the bless Providence, again bless our united coun

The Harrison's Bar Letter.

Camp near Harrison's Landing, Va., July 7, 1862.

MR. PRESIDENT: You have been fully informed that the rebel army is in our front, with the purpose of overwhelming us by attacking our positions, or reducing us by blockading our river communications. I cannot but regard our condition as critical; and I earnestly desire, in view of possible contingencies, to lay before your Excellency, for your private consideration, my general views concerning the existing state of the rebellion, although they do not strictly relate to the situation of this army, or strictly come within scope of my official duties. These views amount to convictions; and are deeply impressed upon my mind and heart. Our cause must never be abandoned; it is the cause of free institutions and self-government. The Constitution and the Union must be preserved, whatever may be the cost in time, treasure or blood. If secession is successful, other dissolutions are clearly to be seen in the future. Let neither military disaster, political faction, or foreign war, shake your settled purpose to enforce the equal operation of the laws of the United States upon the people of every State.

The time has come when the Government must determine upon a civil and military policy covering the whole ground of our national trouble. The responsibility of determining, declaring, and supporting such civil and military policy, and of directing the whole course of national affairs in regard to the rebellion, must now be assumed and exercised by you, or our cause will be lost. The Constitution gives you power sufficient even for the present terrible exigency.

This rebellion has assumed the character of war; as such it should be regarded; and it should be conducted upon the highest principles known to Christian civilization. It should not be a war looking to the subjugation of the people of any State, in any event. It should not be at all a war upon population, but against armed forces and political organizations. Neither confiscation of property, political executions of persons, territorial organizations of States, or forcible abolition of slavery, should be contemplated for a moment. In prosecuting the war, all private property and unarmed persons should be strictly protected, subject only to the necessity of military operations. All private property, taken for military use, should be paid or receipted for; pillage and waste should be treated as high crimes; all unnecessary trespass sternly prohibited, and offensive demeanor by the military towards citizens promptly rebuked. Military arrests should not be tolerated, except in places where active hostilities exist; and oaths not required by enactments constitutionally made, should be neither demanded nor received. Military government should be confined to the preservation of order, and the protection of political rights. M power should not be allowed to interfere with t tions of servitude, either by supporting or im the authority of the master, except for suppressi order, as in other cases. Slaves contraband un act of Congress, seeking military protection, receive it. The right of the Government to ap ate permanently to its own service claims to slave should be asserted; and the right of the owner t pensation therefor should be recognized.

This principle might be extended, upon grou military necessity and security, to all the slaves a particular State; thus working manumission i State; and in Missouri, perhaps in Western Vi also, and possibly even in Maryland, the expedie such a measure is only a question of time.

A system of policy thus constitutional and con tive, and pervaded by the influences of Christiani freedom, would receive the support of almost all loyal men; would deeply impress the rebel mass all foreign nations, and it might be humbly hope it would commend itself to the favor of the Almi

Unless the principles governing the future cond our struggle shall be made known and approve effort to obtain requisite forces will be almost hop A declaration of radical views, especially upon sl will rapidly disintegrate our present armies.

The policy of the Government must be support concentration of military power. The national should not be dispersed in expeditions, posts of pation and numerous armies; but should be mainl lected into masses, and brought to bear upon the a of the Confederate States. Those armies thoro defeated, the political structure which they su will soon cease to exist.

In carrying out any system of policy which you form, you will require a commander-in-chief o army: one who possesses your confidence, unders your views, and who is competent to execute you ders by directing the military forces of the nati the accomplishment of the objects by you prop I do not ask that place for myself. I am willi serve you in such position as you may assign me, will do so as faithfully as ever subordinate s superior.

I may be on the brink of eternity; and as I hop forgiveness from my Maker, I have written this with sincerity towards you and from love of country.

Very respectfully,
Your obedient servant,
G. B. McCLELLAN

LINCOLN'S TREATMENT OF GEN. GRANT.

WASHINGTON, September 22.

The following is a copy of a correspondence which took place between the President and Lieutenant-General Grant, and may prove interesting, as it furnishes an inside view of military affairs:

MR. LINCOLN TO GENERAL GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, WASHINGTON, April 30.

Lieutenant-General Grant:

Not expecting to see you before the spring campaign opens, I wish to express in this way, my entire satisfaction with what you have done up to this time, so far as I understand it. The particulars of your plans I neither know, nor seek to know. You are vigilant and self-reliant; and pleased with this, I wish not to obtrude any restraints or constraints upon you, while I am very anxious that any real disaster or capture of our men in great numbers shall be avoided. I know that these points are less likely to escape your attention than they would be mine. If there be anything wanting which is within my power to give, do not fail to let me know it.

And now, with a brave army, and a just cause, may God sustain you.

Yours, very truly,
A. LINCOLN.

GENERAL GRANT'S REPLY.

HEADQUARTERS ARMIES OF THE UNITED STATES, CULPEPPER C. H., Va., May 1, 1864.

Mr. President:

Your very kind letter of yesterday is just received. The confidence you express for the future, and satisfaction for the past, in my military administration, is acknowledged with pride. It shall be my earnest endeavor that you and the country shall not be disappointed. From my first entrance into the volunteer service of the country to the present day, I have never had cause of complaint, have never expressed or implied a complaint, against the Administration or the Secretary of War for throwing any embarrassment in the way of my vigorously prosecuting what appeared to be my duty.

Indeed, since the promotion which placed me in command of all the armies, and in view of the great responsibility and importance of success, I have been astonished at the readiness which everything asked for has been yielded, without even an explanation being asked. Should my success be less than I desire and expect, the least I can say is, the fault is not with you.

Very truly, your obedient servant,
U. S. GRANT, Lieutenant-General.

MR. LINCOLN'S TREATMENT OF GEN. McCLELLAN.

As a proper parallel to the above correspondence (which was but one of the pipes laid by the President to secure his renomination) we print below some of the instances in which Mr. Lincoln interfered with General McClellan, both when he was general-in-chief and afterward when he commanded the brave Army of the Potomac. These citations tell their own story without the necessity of any comment.

MR. LINCOLN ORDERS A GENERAL ADVANCE ON HIS OWN HOOK.

[From General McClellan's Report.]

On the 27th of January, 1862, the following order was issued without consultation with me.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, WASHINGTON, January 22.

President's General War Order, No. 1:

Ordered: That the 22d day of February, 1862, be the day for a general movement of the land and naval forces of the United States against the insurgent forces. That, especially the army at and about Fortress Monroe, the Army of the Potomac, the Army of Western Virginia, the army near Mumfordsville, Kentucky, the army and flotilla at Cairo, and a naval force in the Gulf of Mexico, be ready to move on that day.

That all other forces, both land and naval, with their respective commanders, obey existing orders for the time, and be able to obey additional orders when duly given.

That the heads of departments, and especially the Secretaries of War and of the Navy, with all their subordinates, and the general-in-chief, with all other commanders and subordinates of land and naval forces, will severally be held to their strict and full responsibilities for prompt execution of this order.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

It will be borne in mind that at this time General McClellan was general-in-chief, and was supposed to have control of the movements of all our forces. Indeed, he supposed so himself until Mr. Lincoln issued this order.

MR. LINCOLN DIRECTS THE MOVEMENTS OF THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

As if the order just quoted was not enough of an interference with the general-in-chief, Mr. Lincoln, four days later, practically assumed command of the Army of the Potomac, as witness his order which is subjoined:

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
WASHINGTON, January 31, 1862.

President's Special War Orders, No. 1.

Ordered: That all the disposable force of the Army of the Potomac, after providing safely for the defense of Washington, be formed into an expedition for the immediate object of seizing and occupying a point upon the railroad southwestward of what is known as Manassas Junction, all details to be in the discretion of the commander-in-chief, and the expedition to move before or on the 22d day of February next.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

"MY PLAN AND YOUR PLAN."

General McClellan obtained permission to submit, in writing, his objections to Mr. Lincoln's plan, as developed in the above orders, but before he had prepared them, he received the following note:

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
WASHINGTON, Feb. 3, 1862.

Major-General McClellan:

MY DEAR SIR: You and I have distinct and different plans for a movement of the Army of the Potomac. Yours to be done by the Chesapeake, up the Rappahannock to Urbano, and across and to the terminus of the railroad on the York river; mine to move directly to a point on the railroad southwest of Manassas.

If you will give me satisfactory answers to the following questions, I shall gladly yield my plan to yours:

1st. Does not your plan involve a greatly larger expenditure of time and money than mine? 2d. Wherein is a victory more certain by your plan than mine? 3d. Wherein is a victory more valuable by your plan than mine? 4th. In fact, would it n be less valuable in this, that it would break no gre line of the enemy's communications, while mi would? 5th. In case of disaster, would not a retre be more difficult by your plan than mine?

Yours, truly, A. LINCOLN.

MR. LINCOLN AGAIN DIRECTS THE ARM OF THE POTOMAC.

Just a month after this civilian Preside had propounded to a skilful general "n plan" for a military campaign, he issued t following order in relation to the movemen of the army, under the immediate supervisi of that general:

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
WASHINGTON, March 8, '62.

President's General War Order, No. 8.

Ordered: That no change of the base of operatio of the Army of the Potomac shall be made witho leaving in and about Washington such a force as, the opinion of the General-in-Chief and the co manders of army corps, shall leave said city entire secure.

That no more than two army corps (about fif thousand troops) of said Army of the Potomac, sha be moved en route for a new base of operations, u til the navigation of the Potomac, from Washingt to the Chesapeake bay, shall be freed from enemy batteries and other obstructions, or until the Pres dent shall hereafter give express permission.

That any movement, as aforesaid, en route for new base of operations, which may be ordered b the General-in-Chief, and which may be intended t move upon the Chesapeake bay, shall begin to mov upon the bay as early as the 18th of March inst., an the General-in-Chief shall be responsible that it s moves as early as that day.

Ordered: That the army and navy co-operate i an immediate effort to capture the enemy's batteri upon the Potomac between Washington and the Ches peake bay. A. LINCOLN.

L. THOMAS, Adjutant-General.

MR. LINCOLN DEPOSES THE GENERAL-IN CHIEF, AND CALLS MR. STANTON TO HI AID.

Only three days after promulgating th above, the President issued the following or der, of which General McClellan received n intimation until it chanced to meet his eye i The National Intelligencer:

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
WASHINGTON, March 11, 1862.

President's War Order, No. 3.

Major-General McClellan having personally taken the field at the head of the Army of the Potomac until otherwise ordered, he is relieved from the command of the other military departments, he retaining the command of the Department of the Potomac.

Ordered further: That the departments now under the respective commands of Generals Halleck and Hunter, together with so much of that under General Buell as lies west of a north and south line indefinitely drawn through Knoxville, Tennessee, be con-idated and designated the Department of the Mis-sippi, and that, until otherwise ordered, Major-neral Halleck have command of said department.

Ordered also: That the country west of the De-rtment of the Potomac, and east of the Department the Mississippi, be a military department, to be lled the Mountain Department; and that the same commanded by Major-General Fremont.

That all the commanders of departments, after the ceipt of this order by them, respectively report, verally and directly, to the Secretary of War, and at prompt, full, and frequent reports will be ex-cted of all and each of them. A. LINCOLN.

R. LINCOLN WITHDRAWS TROOPS FROM GENERAL McCLELLAN'S ARMY.

Just as General McClellan was about em-arking for Fortress Monroe, having previously nt his army thither, he received the follow-g note from Mr. Lincoln, notwithstanding e latter had, a few days before, promised ot to do what is ordered in the note:

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
WASHINGTON, March 31, '62.

Major-General McClellan:

MY DEAR SIR: This morning I felt constrained to rder Blenker's division to Fremont; and I will rite this to assure you that I did so with great ain, understanding that you would wish it other-ise. If you could know the full pressure of the ase, I am confident you would justify it, even be-ond a mere acknowledgment, that the commander-n-chief may order what he pleases.

Yours, very truly,
A. LINCOLN.

BLENKER'S DIVISION WITHDRAWN FROM GENERAL McCLELLAN.

Again did M. Lincoln, through his aid, Mr. Stanton, interfere with General McClellan and against the latter's wishes:

WAR DEPARTMENT, WASHINGTON D. C.
March 31, 1862.

Major-General McClellan:

The order in respect to Blenker is not designed to hinder or delay the movement of Richardson's or any other force. He can remain wherever you de-sire him so long as required for your movements, and in any position you may desire. The order is sim-ply to place him in position for reënforcing Fremont, as soon as your dispositions will permit, and he may go to Harper's Ferry, by such route and at such time as you shall direct—state your own wishes as to the movement—when and how it shall be made.

EDWIN M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

ANOTHER INTERFERENCE — GENERAL WOOL'S TROOPS WITHDRAWN FROM McCLELLAN.

[From General McClellan's Report.]

"Before I left Washington an order had been issued by the War Department placing Fort Monroe and its dependencies under my control, and authorizing me to draw from the troops under General Wool, a division of about ten thousand men, which was to be assigned to the First corps. During the night of the 3d I received a telegram from the adjutant-general of the army, stating that, by the President's order, I was deprived of all control over General Wool and the troops under his command, and forbidden to detach any of his troops without his sanction.

"This order left me without any base of operations under my own control, and to this day I am ignorant of the causes which led to it."

MR. LINCOLN INTERFERES WHILE FIGHTING IS ACTUALLY GOING ON.

The following is too plain to require explanation:

The troops composing the advance of each column were, during the afternoon, under a warm artillery fire—the sharpshooters even of the right column being engaged, when covering reconnoissances. It was at this stage and moment of the campaign that the following telegram was sent to me:

ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
April 4, 1862.

General McClellan:

By direction of the President, General McDowell's army corps has been detached from the force under your immediate command, and the general is to report to the Secretary of War; letter by mail.

L. THOMAS, Adjutant-General.

MR. LINCOLN ASSUMES THE DIRECTION OF GENERAL McCLELLAN'S MOVEMENTS.

WASHINGTON, April 6, 1862, 8 P. M.

General G. B. McClellan:

Yours of 11 A. M. to-day received. Secretary of War informs me that the forwarding of transportation, ammunition, and Woodbury's brigade under your orders, is not and will not be interfered with. You have over one hundred thousand troops with you, independent of General Wool's command. I think you had better break the enemy's line from Yorktown to Warwick river at once. This will probably use time as advantageously as you can.

A. LINCOLN, President.

MR. LINCOLN EXPLAINS HIS STRATEGY, AND GEN. McCLELLAN MUST ADOPT IT.

WASHINGTON, April 9, 1862.

Major-General McClellan:

MY DEAR SIR: Your dispatches, complaining that you are not properly sustained, while they do not offend me, do pain me very much.

Blenker's division was withdrawn from you before you left here, and you know the pressure under which I did it, and as I thought acquiesced in, certainly without reluctance.

After you left I ascertained that less than twenty thousand unorganized men, without a single battery, were all you designed to be left for the defence of Washington and Manassas Junction; and part of this even was to go to General Hooker's old position. General Bank's old corps, once designed for Manassas Junction, was diverted and tied up on the line of Winchester and Strasburg, and could not leave it without again exposing the Upper Potomac and the Baltimore and Ohio railroad. This presented (or would present when McDowell and Sumner should be gone) a great temptation to the enemy to turn back from the Rappahannock and sack Washington. My explicit order that Washington should, by the judgment of all the commanders of army corps, be left entirely secure, had been neglected. It was precisely this that drove me to detain McDowell.

I do not forget that I was satisfied with your arrangement to leave Banks at Manassas Junction; but when that arrangement was broken up and nothing was substituted for it, of course I was constrained to substitute something for it myself. And allow me to ask, "Do you really think I should permit the line from Richmond via Manassas Junction to this city to be entirely open, except what resistance could be presented by twenty thousand unorganized troops?" This is a question which the country will not allow me to evade.

There is a curious mystery about the numbers of the troops now with you. When I telegraphed you on the 6th, saying you had over one hundred thousand with you, I had just obtained from the Secretary of War a statement, taken, as he said, from your own returns, making one hundred and eight thousand then with you and en route to you. You now say you will have but eighty-five thousand when all en route to you shall have reached you. How can the discrepancy of twenty-three thousand be accounted for?

As to General Wool's command, I understand it is doing for you precisely what a like number of your own would have to do, if that command was away.

I suppose the whole force which has gone forward for you is with you by this time, and if so, I think it is the precise time to strike a blow. By delay the enemy will relatively gain on you, that is, he will gain faster, by fortifications and reënforcements, than you can by reënforcements alone.

And once more let me tell you, it is indispensable to you that you strike a blow. I am powerless to help this. You will do me the justice to remember I always insisted that going down the bay in search of a field, instead of fighting at or near Manassas, was only shifting and not surmounting a difficulty; that we would find the same enemy, and the same or equal intrenchments, at either place. The country will not fail to note, is now noting, that the present hesitation to move upon an intrenched enemy is but the story of Manassas repeated.

I beg to assure you that I have never written you, or spoken to you in greater kindness of feeling than now, nor with a fuller purpose to sustain you, so far as in my most anxious judgment I consistently can. But you must act. Yours, very truly,

A. Lincoln.

MR. LINCOLN SITS IN THE WHITE HOUSE AND DIRECTS THE MOVEMENTS OF McCLELLAN'S AND McDOWELL'S FORCES.

[Extract from order to General McDowell, dated May 17, 1862.]

While seeking to establish, as soon as possible, a communication between your left wing, and the right wing of General McClellan, you will hold yourself always in such a position as to cover the capital of the nation against a sudden dash of the rebel forces.

General McClellan will be furnished with a copy of these instructions, and will be directed to hold himself in readiness to establish communication with your left wing, and to prevent the main body of the enemy's army from leaving Richmond, and throwing itself upon your column, before the junction of the two armies is effected.

A copy of his instructions in regard to the employment of your force is annexed.

By order of the President.

Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War.

MR. LINCOLN AGAIN HAS A PLAN.

[Extract from his letter to Gen. McClellan, of May 24, 1862.

If, in conjunction with McDowell's movement against Anderson, you could send a force from your right to cut off the enemy's supplies from Richmond, preserve the railroad bridges across the two forks of the Pamunkey, and intercept the enemy's retreat you will prevent the army now opposed to you from receiving an accession of numbers of nearly fifteen thousand men, and if you succeed in saving the bridges, you will secure a line of railroad for supplies in addition to the one you now have. Can you not do this almost as well as not, while you are building the Chickahominy bridges? McDowell and Shields both say they can, and positively will, move Monday morning. I wish you to march cautiously and safely.

ANOTHER INTERFERENCE OF MR. LINCOLN —McDOWELL'S TROOPS WITHDRAWN.

May 24, 1862.
From Washington, 4 P. M., 1862.

Major-General George B. McClellan:

In consequence of General Banks's critical position, I have been compelled to suspend General McDowell's movements to join you. The enemy are making a desperate push upon Harper's Ferry, and we are trying to throw General Fremont's force and part of General McDowell's in their rear.

A. Lincoln, President.

MR. LINCOLN IN THE MAZES OF A CAMPAIGN—HE PENETRATES THE REBEL DESIGNS AND ISSUES ORDERS TO GEN. McCLELLAN.

Washington, May 25, 1862. 2 P. M.

Major-General McClellan:

The enemy is moving north in sufficient force to drive General Banks before him; precisely in what force we cannot tell. He is also threatening Leesburg and Geary, on the Manassas Gap Railroad, from both north and south—in precisely what force we cannot tell. I think the movement is a general and a concerted one, such as could not be if he was acting upon the purpose of a very desperate defence of Richmond. I think the time is near when you must either attack Richmond or give up the job, and come back to the defence of Washington. Let me hear from you instantly.

A. Lincoln, President.

LINCOLN'S NEXT DIRECTION TO GENERAL McCLELLAN.

WASHINGTON, MAY 26, 1862.

...or-General G. B. McClellan:

...an you not cut the Acquia Creek railroad? also, ...t impression have you as to intrenched works for ... to contend with in front of Richmond? Can you ...near enough to throw shells into the city?

A. LINCOLN, President.

...NERAL McCLELLAN'S ARMY ORDERED FROM THE PENINSULA.

WASHINGTON, AUG. 3, 1862. 7:45 P. M.

...jor-General Geo. B. McClellan:

... have waited most anxiously to learn the result of ...ur forced reconnoissance toward Richmond, and also whether all your sick have been sent away, and I can get no answer to my telegram. It is determined to withdraw your army from the peninsula to Acquia Creek. You will take immediate measures to effect this, covering the movement the best you can.

H. W. HALLECK,
Maj.-Gen. Commanding U. S. A.

Such, in brief, are some of the most notable instances in which Mr. Lincoln interfered with General McClellan when he occupied a position similar to that held by General Grant. They reflect so severely upon the President that no attempt to gloss them over by his apparent subsequent repentance can disabuse the patriotic portion of the nation of the matured conviction that he is to be held responsible for the lack of decisive victories in Eastern Virginia. The blame must and will rest upon him, to whom it belongs.

THE TAINT OF DISUNION.

"I will not vote for a man, no, not if he were my ...n brother, who had lain with me in the womb of ... mother, on whom there is the least shadow of ...spicion of disunion."—Rev. G. W. Bethune, D.D., the Academy of Music, N. Y., 1860.

To learn the real sentiments of the men for ...hom we are asked to vote, we must look ...ack to the opinions they avowed and de...nded before they came before the country ...sking for its highest offices. Then they were ...nder no temptations to conceal their own ...pinions, nor to avow others. What they were ...hen they are now, unless they have retracted ...heir published declarations of political senti...ment. The leaders of the party now in power ...re and always have been disunionists—men ...who believe in the right of secession, and the ...luty of disunion on account of slavery.

This will be readily seen from their own ...writings and speeches.

1. ABRAHAM LINCOLN. In the House of Representatives, while a member of Congress, Mr. Lincoln said, in a speech:

"Any people, anywhere, being inclined and having the power, have the right to rise up and shake off the existing Government, and form a new one that suits them better. Nor is this right confined to cases where the people of an existing Government may choose to exercise it. Any portion of such people that can may revolutionize, putting down a minority intermingled with or near about them, who may oppose them."

This declaration of sentiment Mr. Lincoln has never modified nor retracted; and the manner in which he has conducted the war, the removal of generals when they were about to achieve great success, his frequent interference with military plans, his abandonment of the Constitution for the law of his own will, his reconstruction plans based on the State suicide theory of Charles Sumner, his neglect to attempt any negotiations with any power other than Jefferson Davis, and his refusal of those except only on the basis of abolition—so that he proposes, in effect, an agreement between himself and the Richmond dynasty, to consider the Constitution dead, and the Union gone, and to reconstruct a new Government—all this, coupled with the fact that he has never modified or explained his old secession doctrines, abundantly justifies the belief that he is deeply tainted with DISUNION. If he is "honest old Abe," he believes now what he advocated in the prime and vigor of his life—the right of secession in a State, county, or town! Has he not done everything that human power can invent to make Union difficult, even impossible? We are hopelessly divided if his plans are sustained by the people.

2. WILLIAM H. SEWARD. In 1856, Mr. Seward, predicting civil war between the North and South, said:

"Then the free States and slave States of the Atlantic, divided and warring with each other, would disgust the free States of the Pacific, and they would have abundant cause and justification for withdrawing from a union productive no longer of peace, safety, and liberty to themselves."

"In 1850, Senator Hale presented two petitions—'praying that some plan be devised for the dissolution of the American Union.' This petition received three votes—J. P. Hale, W. H. Seward, S. P. Chase.

3. THE "REPUBLICANS" IN MASSACHUSETTS. After the election of James Buchanan to the Presidency, a disunion convention was called in the following words:

"We, the undersigned, citizens of Worcester, believing the result of the recent Presidential election to involve four years more of pro-slavery Government, and a rapid increase in the hostility between the two sections of the Union;

"Believing this hostility to be the offspring not of party excitement, but of a fundamental difference in education, habits, and laws;

"Believing the existing Union to be a failure, as being a hopeless attempt to unite under one Government two antagonistic systems of society, which diverge more widely every year;

"And believing it to be the duty of intelligent and conscientious men to meet these facts with wisdom and firmness:

"Respectfully invite our fellow citizens of Massachusetts to meet in convention at Worcester, on Thursday, January 15, to consider the practicability, probability, and expediency of a separation between the free and slave States, and to take such other measures as the condition of the times may require."

4. THE ABOLITIONISTS. Witness the abundant proof, nor doubt that we can furnish volumes of the same sort of evidence:

"The Constitution of our Fathers was a mistake. Tear it in pieces and make a better. Don't say the machine is out of order—it is in order;—it does what its framers intended." "Our claim is DISUNION, breaking up of the States! I have shown you that our work cannot be done under our institutions (laws). The Republican party is the first sectional party ever organized in this country. It does not know its own face, and calls itself national, but it is sectional. It is a party of the North pledged against the South!" —Wendell Phillips.

At an anti-slavery meeting, in May, 1844, at New York—

Resolved, "That secession from the U. S. Government is the duty of every abolitionist."

Resolved, "That the only exodus of the slave to freedom, unless it be one of blood, must be over the remains of the present American Church, and the grave of the present Union."

Resolved, "That the abolitionists of this country should make it one of the primary objects of this agitation to dissolve the American Union."

"I have labored for twenty years to break up t Union, and I glory in the fact."—Wendell Phill at Hartford, Feb. 21, 1862.

"The Fremont party is moulding public sentim in the right direction for the specific work the a litionists are striving to accomplish: the dissoluti of the Union, and the abolition of slavery throug out the land."—Wm. Lloyd Garrison, 1856.

"No act of ours do we regard with more cons entious approval or higher satisfaction; none do submit more confidently to the tribunal of Heav and the moral verdict of mankind, than when, s eral years ago, on the 4th of July, in the presen of a great assembly, we committed to the flames t Constitution of the United States."—William Llo Garrison.

5. PROMINENT FRIENDS AND SUPPORTERS MR. LINCOLN. The speeches, writings, acts these men, all form one black history of enmi to the Union. We make a few brief citations proofs, damning and disgraceful, and we cha lenge the radical party to meet these proofs.

"The Union as it was is played out."—Senat "Jim Lane" of Kansas.

"The Union as it was and the Constitution as it God forbid it."—Thaddeus Stevens.

"Who in the name of God wants the Cotton Stat or any other State this side of perdition, to remain the Union, if slavery is to continue?"—Senat Bingham of Ohio.

"Any obstructions to abolition must inevitably attended with discord and war. We cannot hav both slavery and the Constitution. We ought revolutionize slavery out of existence."—Brigadi General Phelps of Vermont.

"Should this (the election of Fremont) fail, n true man would be any longer safe here from the a saults of the arrogant slave oligarchy, who then woul rule with an iron hand. For the free North woul be left the choice of a peaceful dissolution of th Union, a civil war which would end in the same or an unconditional surrender of every princip held dear by freemen."—Francis E. Spinner, U. S Treasurer.

"I have no doubt the free and slave State ought to separate. THE UNION IS NOT WOTH SUP PORTING in connection with the South."—James S Pike, Minister to Holland, appointed by Lincoln afte this avowal.

Extract from the constitution of the "Emancipation League," William Cullen Bryant, president:

"Art. 1. The name of this Society shall be the Emancipation League in the City of New York.

"Art. 2. The objects of this Society shall be * * to insist that * * * NO STATE NOW IN REBELLION BE RECOGNIZED AS A MEMBER OF THE UNION EXCEPT ON THE CONDITION OF EMANCIPATION."

6. THE REPUBLICAN NEWSPAPERS. Here the evidence is overwhelming.

"Not a few of the Republican journals of the interior are working themselves up to the belief, which ey are endeavoring to impress upon their readers, at the seceded States, be they few or many, will be ripped back into the Union. We caution all such at in language of that sort they are adding new el to the flame which is already blazing too fiercely; d that the probabilities now are that the result will ove them to be false prophets. No man knows hat public policy may demand of the incoming Administration; but the drift of opinion seems to be at, if peaceable secession is possible, the retiring tates will be assisted to go, that this needless and tter controversy may be brought to an end. If e Union is to be dissolved, a bloodless separation is all means to be coveted. Do not let us make at impossible."—Chicago Tribune, Dec. 1860.

From the Tribune of Nov. 9, 1860.

"If the Cotton States shall become satisfied that ey can do better out of the Union than in it, we sist on letting them go in peace. The right to secede ay be a revolutionary one, but it exists nevertheless. * * We must ever resist the right of any ate to remain in the Union and nullify or defy the ws thereof. To withdraw from the Union is quite nother matter; whenever a considerable section of ur Union shall deliberately resolve to go out, we shall sist all coercive measures designed to keep it in. e hope never to live in a republic whereof one ction is pinned to another by bayonets."

From the Tribune, Nov. 26, 1860.

"If the Cotton States unitedly and earnestly wish withdraw peacefully from the Union, we think they ould and would be allowed to go. Any attempt to mpel them by force to remain would be contrary to e principles enunciated in the immortal Declaration f Independence, contrary to the fundamental ideas n which human liberty is based."

From the Tribune, Dec. 17, 1860.

"If it (the Declaration of Independence) justified ne secession from the British Empire of three millons of colonists in 1776, we do not see why it would ot justify the secession of five millions of Southrons rom the Union in 1861."

From the Tribune, February 28, 1861.

"Whenever it shall become clear that the great body f the Southern people have become conclusively alienated from the Union, and anxious to escape from it, WE WILL DO OUR BEST TO FORWARD THEIR VIEWS."

From the Tribune, January, 20, 1862.

"If three months more of earnest fighting shall not serve to make a serious impression on the rebels—if the end of that term shall find us no further advanced than its beginning—if some malignant Fate has decreed that the blood and treasure of the nation shall ever be squandered in fruitless efforts, let us bow to our destiny, AND MAKE THE BEST ATTAINABLE PEACE."

THE AMERICAN FLAG.

From the New York Tribune.

All hail the flaunting Lie!
The Stars grow pale and dim;
The stripes are bloody scars—
A lie the vaunting hymn.
It shields a pirate's deck,
It binds a man in chains,
It yokes the captive's neck,
And wipes the bloody stains
Tear down the flaunting Lie!
Half-mast the starry flag!
Insult no sunny sky
With hate's polluted rag!
Destroy it ye who can!
Deep sink it in the waves!
It bears a fellow man
To groan with fellow slaves.

Furl, furl the boasted Lie!
Till Freedom lives again,
To rule once more in truth
Among untrammelled men.
Roll up the starry sheen,
Conceal its bloody stains:
For in its folds are seen
The stamp of rustling chains.

From the Evening Post, Oct. —, 1863.

"The 'Union as it was,' means the utter destruction of those who now adhere to the Union; and in view of this fact it is the duty of every honorable American—of every one who values the loyalty of Northern men, to work with all his might against the plot of the slaveholders' friends."

Let the soberminded, intelligent, patriotic American people, who love the Union above property and life, read these opinions, and consider the conclusions to which they lead. Bear in mind that Mr. Lincoln, after he had avowed himself a firm believer in the doctrine of secession, was nominated by the influence, mainly, of The Chicago Tribune and New York Tribune men, who were the ultra abolitionists of the Republican party. He was elected by their enthusiastic support.

Not one of the men whose original deliberate opinions we have put on record above, has, in any shape or form, indicated any change of sentiment or purpose. They are to a man disunionists to-day. They have conducted the war with reference to that result, putting all possible obstacles in the way of adjustment, and seeking to make Union impracticable. With this key to their policy, their course is intelligible and consistent. If they obtain a lease of power for four years more, the destruction of the Union, and a separation of the North and South, which is their cherished purpose, will be an accomplished fact. These are hard sayings, but, in the face of the proof we have cited, who dare believe otherwise? Out of their own mouths we judge them, and the judgment is just. The Baltimore platform is a condensation of the quotations we have made.

BETRAYING THE UNION.

Having shown by copious extracts from the speeches of Abraham Lincoln, W. H. Seward, Wendell Phillips, Wm. Lloyd Garrison, and from the editorial writings of the Chicago Tribune and the N. Y. Tribune, and many other leading supporters of the present Administration, that they were all original secessionists and disunion men, we propose now to give the evidence that Mr. Lincoln himself has, within the last three months, been concerned in a movement to make peace with Jeff. Davis, on terms involving the direct proposal to divide the Union and let the South go.

Two Republican self-appointed commissioners recently went to Richmond, with Mr. Lincoln's permission, to attempt to make peace with Jeff. Davis and the South. These commissioners were Messrs. Gilmore and Jacquess.

Mr. Gilmore first went to Washington, and had two interviews with Mr. Lincoln, and, in his report, Mr. G. says of Mr. Lincoln:

"He told me, in a clear, direct way, the terms he would give the Rebels. A portion of these terms have since been included in the amnesty proclamation; the rest I do not feel at liberty to make public."

Mr. Gilmore was then authorized to communicate these private views to Mr. Jacquess. Subsequently these two men were permitted by Mr. Lincoln, with authority under his own hand, to go to Richmond to see Mr. Davis, and on their own account only, without consulting Mr. Lincoln, to talk about a plan of settlement. When in Richmond, Messrs. Gilmore and Jacquess sent the following note to Mr. Benjamin, the Confederate Secretary of State:

"SPOTTSWOOD HOUSE, RICHMOND, VA.,
"July 17, 1864.

"Hon. J. P. BENJAMIN, Secretary of State, &c.

"DEAR SIR: The undersigned respectfully solicit an interview with President Davis.

"They visit Richmond only as private citizens, and have no official character or authority; "but they are acquainted with the views of the United States Government and with the sentiments of the Northern people relative to an adjustment of the differences existing between the North and the South, and earnestly hope that a free interchange of views between President Davis and themselves may open the way to such official negotiations as will result in restoring PEACE to the two sections of our distracted country.

"They therefore ask an interview with the President, and, awaiting your reply, are,

"Truly, and respectfully, yours,
"JAMES F. JACQUESS, of Illinois.
"JAMES R. GILMORE, of Massachusetts."

We have seen how these men were authorized to say that they knew Mr. Lincoln's views. Their proposals therefore were, of course, in accord with his views. What was the proposal? Read it, as they themselves state that they laid it before Davis:

"Suppose the two Governments should agree to something like this: To go to the people with two propositions, say peace, with disunion and Southern independence, as your proposition—and peace, with union, emancipation, no confiscation, and universal amnesty, as ours. Let the citizens of all the United States (as they existed before the war) vote 'yes' or 'no,' on these two propositions, at a special election within sixty days. If a majority votes disunion, our Government to be bound by it, and to let you go in peace. If a majority, union, yours to be bound by it, and to stay in peace. The two Governments can contract in this way, and the people, though constitutionally unable to decide on peace or war, can elect which of the two propositions shall govern their rulers. Let Lee and Grant, meanwhile, agree to an armistice. This would sheathe the sword; and, if once sheathed, it would never again be drawn by this generation.'

Here we have Lincoln's plan! Armistice and disunion in so many words! We ask the solemn consideration of the American people to the facts here revealed by the confidential friends of Mr. Lincoln.

1. Mr. Lincoln told Mr. Gilmore "in a clear, direct way, the terms he would give the rebels."

2. Mr. Gilmore was permitted by Mr. Lincoln to communicate those views to Mr. Jacquess.

3. These two men were permitted to go South a pass in Mr. Lincoln's own hand, to have an int view with Jeff. Davis.

4. They gave a written pledge to the rebel "Pr ident" that they were in possession of the views the United States Government, in respect to ter of peace.

5. They laid their "views" before Mr. Davis, a these embraced: first, an armistice; and second DISUNION, OR UNION WITH ABOLITION, as the o question between the parties.

6. These men spoke of Davis as PRESIDENT DAV and of all negotiations as between TWO GOVE MENTS.

If the Democratic convention at Chicago had corporated a proposition so monstrous into its pl form, it would have been condemned as high treas by the indignant voice of every loyal man in t land; and yet Mr. Lincoln's party pretend to horrified at the idea of "a cessation of hostilities It is this proposal which the friends of Mr. Linc assured Mr. Davis to be the views of Mr. Linco which they were put in possession of before th came to Richmond by his permission!

Mr. Lincoln is therefore pledged by his friends this treasonable proposition. We have only to tha Jeff. Davis that the infamous proposal was not cepted!

If it had been accepted by him, where would be to-day? The South would vote for disunion a independence, and the abolition disunionists of t North would vote for disunion, as they are pledg to do, and as Mr. Lincoln knew they would, a thus a majority of the people would decide to d solve the Union and let the Southern Confeders become an accomplished fact.

This was the proposition made by the comm sioners who went to Richmond in full possession the views of the present Administration! We shri with horror from contemplating the gulf into whi the country was on the verge of being plunged!

But with the same disunion men in power, wi the same determination to divide the country unl they can secure universal abolition, we are expos to the same dangers every day, and God only kno in what unlucky hour our ruin may be consummate

Mark how Mr. Lincoln constantly keeps up t idea of negotiating only with Jefferson Davis. Wh does he never address himself to the people, or t States of the South? He can treat with people with States. But no, he disfranchises the peopl declares the States dead, and proposes to treat f union and abolition, or for disunion and indepen ence, with Jeff. Davis and only with him. Compa his policy with McClellan's expression of readine to receive any State when its people offer to subm to the Union. Mr. Lincoln declares the Union a ready dissolved. He regards the States as dead an gone. He magnifies and strengthens the position o the Richmond dynasty by everything he does. H recognizes Davis substantially from day to day.

It is time for all good men to pause and solemnl ask themselves if the destinies of our country ough to be again intrusted to the keeping of men who ar disunionists at heart, and have already offered t betray the Union.

Whoever loves his country more than party wi vote to expel disunion from the Government, and t put the helm into the hands of one who will guid the Ship of State into the port of UNION AND PEACE

MR. LINCOLN'S ARBITRARY ARRESTS.

The Acts which the Baltimore Platform Approves.

THE Baltimore platform, on which Abraham Lincoln is presented to the people as a candidate for their election to the Presidency, approves all that he has done, specifically commending all his course.

If elected on that platform, he will regard it as a distinct verdict of the people in his favor, and will perpetuate his course as part of the American system of government. He will continue the same acts, will govern the country with the same autocratic will, and for years to come the constitutional guaranties of life, liberty, and property by which alone AMERICAN LIBERTY exists, will be disregarded and trampled under foot.

What are the acts which Abraham Lincoln has done, and which his party, by their Baltimore platform, propose to perpetuate in this country?

When the war began, the people of the North rose as one man to the defence of their constitution. There was no shadow of excuse for considering the North, or any one State in the North, as disloyal. On the contrary, Democrats and Republicans in every State poured out their money by millions and sent their men by crowds to the support of the flag. Yet, in the very beginning of the contest, the will of Abraham Lincoln was made the only law of the citizens' liberty, and a system of arbitrary and despotic seizure and imprisonment was inaugurated, which has continued up to the present month of September, 1864.

A calm review of the facts would astound every reader. Before the close of 1861 the name of American had become a scoff instead of an honor in all Europe. The people of Austria and Russia heard with indignant astonishment of a system of tyranny in existence in America which rivalled all their own memories of the worst of their monarchs. While liberty was advancing with gigantic strides in other parts of the world, she veiled her face and left the Western continent. But not forever! God grant not forever! Four years of such oppression and wrong have been enough for a people educated in 1776, and blessed as we have been from that time to 1860.

True, there was civil war and rebellion in the land. But it is equally true that the violation of constitution and law by Southern rebellion was no excuse for the violation by Northern authority. Law makers ought never to be law breakers. If Mr. Lincoln had guarded constitution and law, exhibiting to rebels and to the world the grandeur of a free people observing their own laws while they exacted obedience from others; if he had offered to the rebels in arms the firm, unsullied strength of the Constitution as the measure of their duty and his requirements, we might have expected to see them turn to it with longing, after a vain experiment of war. Instead of that, he crushed down the North to obedience of his own will, and then demanded of the South submission to the same will, enunciated in autocratic proclamations. Read the simple words of the AMERICAN CONSTITUTION:

[From the Amendments.]

ARTICLE THE FOURTH. The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

ARTICLE THE FIFTH. No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service in time of war or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

ARTICLE THE SIXTH. In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defence.

ARTICLE THE EIGHT. Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.

And now read a brief sketch of some of the acts of Abraham Lincoln. We say brief, for a library of volumes would be necessary to describe all the cases. We have preserved with great care all accounts which came under our notice; and we have lying before us as we write (now in the hands of the Democratic campaign committee) particulars of more than one thousand cases, and brief mention, without particulars, of more cases than we could count without long labor, of arbitrary seizures and imprisonment of free citizens:

From a careful record made up from Townsend's Cyclopædia of the Rebellion—a work, containing, in some fifty volumes, a very full history of every event in the war—the following was compiled for the N. Y. Mercury:

Daniel Fish and Doctor Sabet, both of New York, were the first men arrested in the North by the order of the State Department, April 24, 1861, immediately after the fall of Fort Sumter. Up to November 30, 1861, a little more than seven months, 351 persons had been arrested and incarcerated by order of Mr. Seward, whose names are known and registered in Townsend's Encyclopedia of the Great Rebellion. In the same time, 150 are known to have been arrested at the instance of the same department, whose names have not been retained. Probably we shall never know the number of arrests made in the last three years. The record, if published, would be staggering. No usurpation in the history of the world would exhibit such astounding statistics. In several places of Mr. Townsend's book long lists of names of persons released appear. In many cases upward of a hundred names being transcribed at once—and the names of none of these were ever published when arrested. Hence they must have been spirited away, locked up without any trial whatever, and their friends probably knew nothing of their whereabouts, until, by one of Mr. Seward's arbitrary bulletins, they appeared out of jail. There cannot have been less than ten thousand State prisoners made by order of Lincoln and Seward since the opening of hostilities, and the number is probably more nearly three times that figure. How many of these ten thousand have had hearings? With the privilege of the habeas corpus set aside, with the judges overawed by the marshals or the soldiery, with Mr. Seward's "little bell," standing at his right hand to incarcerate some wretched being at every touch, how many men have gone into dungeons for a spite, a whim, or a lie? Has General Stone ever had a trial? He is now battling for the Union; but they have never taken the stigma of a long imprisonment from his name.

Great numbers of females appear among the incarcerated. In many cases there seems to have been no ground for the arrest, but an anonymous letter, some private gossip, or the allegation of a single office holder, whose severe ideas of loyalty would probably consign any political opponent to the penitentiary.

This record does not include many cases in our own collections. Great secrecy was observed by the Administration, and it was not easy to procure information.

All these seizures, in each and every instance, were made by order of Abraham Lincoln, without warrant, accusation, or authority of law, in the peaceful States of the North. In no one instance of all these has a man been brought to trial in any court. In no one instance has an accusation been filed, or an indictment obtained.

The writ of HABEAS CORPUS was first violated, and obedience to it refused, by Mr. Lincoln, in the case of JOHN MERRYMAN, in 1861. Mr. Lincoln had no color of authority for this at that time. His own party admitted his usurpation long afterward, and after hundreds of like cases had occurred, by passing an act of Congress (ex post facto) to save him from the consequences of his arbitrary use of power. The Merryman case brought out a decision from the venerable Judge TANEY, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, a loyal man of the best days of the Republic. Judge TANEY, boldly, and with a majesty that will long be remembered in history, announced his views as follows, from the bench:

I ordered the attachment yesterday, because upon the face of the return the detention of the prisoner was unlawful, upon two grounds:

First—The President, under the Constitution and laws of the United States, cannot suspend the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, nor authorize any military officer to do so.

Second—A military officer has no right to arrest and detain a person, nor subject him to the rules and articles of war for an offence against the laws of the United States, except in aid of the judicial authority and subject to its control, and if the party is arrested by the military, it is the duty of the officer to deliver him over immediately to the civil authority, to be dealt with according to law.

I forbore yesterday to state orally the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, which make these principles the fundamental law of the Union, because an oral statement might be misunderstood in some portions of it, and I shall therefore put my opinion in writing, and file it in the office of the Clerk of the Circuit Court, in the course of this week.

The Judge added that the military authority was always subordinate to civil; that, under ordinary circumstances, it would be the duty of the Marshal to proceed with posse comitatus, and bring the party named in the writ into court: but from the notoriously superior force that he would encounter this would be impossible. He said the Marshal had done all in his power to discharge his duty.

During the week he should prepare his opinion in the premises, and forward it to the President, calling upon him to perform his constitutional duty, and see that the laws be faithfully executed, and enforce the decrees of this court.

The radical press at once attacked this noble old judge with torrents of abuse. They called him traitor in every radical newspaper in the land. The court was vilified. The intent of the party to make their one-man law superior to Constitution and right, was then confessed. They determined to crush the Supreme Court. They declared its authority inferior to Mr. Lincoln's military power. The N. Y. Tribune, on the 1st June, 1861, thus ridiculed the writ of habeas corpus, and threatened with vengeance the defenders of that noble writ of personal liberty:

The thin varnish of extemporized and lukewarm patriotism, with which two or three of our city contemporaries attempt to conceal their chronic sympathy with treason and rebellion, is easily seen through by loyal eyes. Let them not flatter themselves that anybody who knows them doubts for a moment that they are as much friends of the Southern rebels now, as they were five, yea, even three months ago—only the North having risen almost as one man to save the republic from utter wreck, those admirers of Davis, Hunter, Toombs, Mason & Co., dare not so openly exhibit it now as then.

Among the most insidious of these sympathizers is The Journal of Commerce. It seems to be the special champion of Judge Taney and the writ of habeas corpus. It is evident that it does not understand the character and objects of either of them. We pass over the writ. It can take care of itself.

Last winter, when the rebellion began to assume formidable dimensions, some persons in and near Washington kept a strict watch upon certain suspected officials and prominent politicians. Among those thus carefully observed were some of the Judges of the Supreme Court of the United States. Facts are in possession of gentlemen of the highest character, which would authorize the prompt arrest of two or three of those Judges on charges of treason. The time not having arrived for proceeding in this matter, and, in fact the rebellion having gone on with such rapid strides as to get almost beyond the necessity of doing it, this serious matter remains in statu quo.

We tell the over-zealous champions of the Judges of the Supreme Court, that they had better be quiet.—June 1, 1861, N. Y. Tribune.

The madness which culminates in the Baltimore platform, took possession of them. Then followed countless instances of the refusal of Mr. Lincoln to allow the WRIT of liberty. Fort Lafayette, in New York harbor, a dismal, damp fortress, surrounded by water, was selected as the American bastile. Fort Warren, in Boston harbor, Fort McHenry, at Baltimore, the old Capitol prison, in Washington, and numerous other dungeons, one often another, were crowded with victims.

On the 20th day of July, 1861, Fort Lafayette opened its doors to the first political prisoner, Mr. E. S. Ruggles, of Fredericksburg, Virginia. Mr. Ruggles was alone for seven days, when Dr. Johnson, of Baltimore, joined him there. On the last day of July, seven persons had taken up their residence inside the fort, and from that time the number rapidly increased. The Evening Post, of Sept. 21st, 1861, contained a list of eighty-eight names of prisoners who had at that time been committed to the fort.

Mr. Lincoln at length issued an order to all policemen in the country, commanding their services in his lawless seizures. Wherever they were under Republican officers they obeyed. State machinery was thus subjected to his will. The police of New York city lent willing aid. The police stations were crowded with prisoners. Men of every station in life were brought up, tortured in CELL NUMBER FOUR (of which we shall give a description), and hurried off to Fort Lafayette, or elsewhere. At once began the same system pursued in France under the Reign of Terror. A high official at Washington informed us that Mr. Seward had received many thousands of letters accusing individuals of disloyalty, and recommending their arrest. Every radical politician seized the opportunity to persecute his Democratic neighbors. The same officer informed us that one clergyman in central New York had written more than thirty letters within two months, each letter containing a list of Democrats in his neighborhood whom he wished arrested, and that his letters grew more and more frantic from day to day, begging that he might be authorized to arrest them himself. "Democrat" was considered synonymous with "traitor."

Mr. Lincoln, Mr. Seward, Mr. Cameron, and subsequently Mr. Stanton, entered heart and soul into this crusade against political opponents. Men were seized at all hours of the day and night. The writ of habeas corpus was refused. Examinations were refused. Then followed the most infamous order on record in a free government. Mr. Seward proclaimed and caused to be read to the prisoners in Fort Lafayette his ukase, that the employment of counsel by any prisoner would be regarded as a circumstance against him, and forbidding any man to employ counsel! Not only were the laws suspended, but the miserable victims of tyranny were forbidden to enquire what the laws were, or had been in better days. We insert just here that most terrible record against Abraham Lincoln and his Secretary of State. It was read on the 3d of Dec. 1861, by the commanding officer at Fort Lafayette, to the prisoners there:

TO THE POLITICAL PRISONERS IN FORT LAFAYETTE.

I am instructed by the Secretary of State, to inform you that the Department of State of the United States will not recognize any one as an attorney for political prisoners, and will look with distrust upon all applications for release through such channels; and that such applications will be regarded as additional reason for declining to release the prisoners. And further, that if such prisoners wish to make any communication to Government, they are at liberty to make it directly to the State Department.

SETH C. HAWLEY.

And yet, in the face of this order, and this merciful offer to hear the prayers of prisoners, their letters were returned unopened—all their appeals were utterly vain—and to-day, men are languishing in those prisons, who have lain for three years, forgotten by all the world except their mourning families! Read the following, and compare it with Mr. Seward's promise to receive the communications of prisoners:

WAR DEPARTMENT, OCTOBER 4, 1861.

SIR; I acknowledge the receipt of a communication from Colonel Martin Burke, inclosing a letter from E. B. Schnabel, a prisoner at Fort Lafayette.

The person referred to is the son of a very worthy gentleman, a citizen of Pennsylvania, known to me for many years. He was educated at Princeton College, where he exhibited considerable talent. He came back to Pennsylvania, and has been "living on his wits" ever since. He is a man, I am sorry to say, of no character, and I have no desire to open any communication from him; I therefore return the communication forwarded by Colonel Martin Burke, unopened.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,

SIMON CAMERON, Secretary of War.

Lieut.-General W. SCOTT, General-in-Chief.

Was ever a more tyrannical letter written, or one more cowardly?

All avenues of help seemed closed; even public appeal was denied, for in September, 1861, the following order was issued in New York by the Superintendent of Police, subject to a resolution passed at a meeting of the Board of Police Commissioners:

GENERAL ORDER No. 275.

Resolved, That inasmuch as the publication of arrests and the attendant circumstances has caused serious embarrassment to the Departments, and has frustrated the attempts to arrest persons guilty of offences against the Government, that all information of arrests by members of the force, except such as is entered on the daily returns, be strictly forbidden, and that any violation of this rule will be deemed a cause for dismissal.—Sept. 18, 1861.

The Cabinet was in high glee. The Washington people, under Mr. Lincoln's facetious administration, thought the whole system a good joke. They went into it as great fun. The radical press throughout the country was jovial over the new plan. For example: the New York Times (under the editorship of the chief manager of the Baltimore convention and chairman of the Republican National Committee) gave this funny incident at Washington:

AN UNEXPECTED ARREST.

A singular instance of the adroitness of our authorities here in dealing with suspected persons occurred this morning at the Provost Marshal's office. A person, well known here as connected with a claim-agency broken up by the Government, presented himself, and desired a permit to see some friends confined in the Old Capitol. Upon hearing the name, the clerk looked up and said, "Yes, certainly"—proceeding at once to write it out. The gentleman received his permit, and upon presenting it at the Capitol, was ordered into a cell, and informed by the guard that he had brought with him an order for his own commitment.

The following extracts from papers will show the manner in which the system was built up and carried on. The New York Tribune of April 19th, 1861, contained the following paragraph:

MARK THE TRAITORS.

There are a few as genuine traitors scattered over the country as ever went lurking among honest men. It is not proposed to hang this class of sympathizers with rebellion, but it is proposed to mark, and, so far as it is possible, to withdraw all intercourse and trade with them. In short, to leave them alone in their glory. This course has been adopted in Mount Vernon, Westchester County. A brawling secessionist tavern keeper heads the list which the patriots are filling up as fast as the sentiments of the wretches are discovered. As soon as it is complete it will be published as the "blacklist of Mt. Vernon." Let the same plan be pursued in every town, village and neighborhood, and post the names in public places—so that the public may know who are open-mouthed shameless traitors, and let them be avoided by all patriotic citizens. * * Put their names on the "black list."

It was not long before the plan of "letting traitors alone in their glory," was dropped. The Tribune of Sept. 4, 1861, contained the following paragraph:

"FERRETING OUT TRAITORS.

The system of detective police adopted by Government is bearing the happiest fruits. Every day, for some time past, we have recorded the arrest of Southern spies and agents, and the confiscation of rebel property. * * * Every day the authorities are flooded with communications, authenticated and anonymous, respecting transient or permanent Southern residents. Frequently, the denunciations spring from petty malice or personal hatred, and the officers, after following up supposed important cases, for days and nights together, have finally become convinced of the innocence and loyalty of the suspected persons.

It should be considered the duty of all loyal citizens to aid in the discovery and arrest of real traitors by denouncing them to the United States Marshal. Marshal Murray has collected about him a number of the most intelligent, experienced, and shrewd detectives in the country—two of whom have recently 'worked up' some of their cases with marvellous good judgment and dexterity."

Two days after, Sept. 6, 1861, the Tribune announced, through its Washington correspondent, as follows:

"FLIGHT OF TRAITORS.

"While information by telegraph is lodged against suspected traitors with the State Department here, and replies framed and returned, and while the final orders for arrest are being made in Washington, the guilty birds are often on the wing. The Government desires the coöperation of patriots all over the country. Arrests should be promptly made of the guilty, and by local action, without waiting for the motion from Washington."

The same day the radical papers announce that—

"EIGHT HUNDRED names are entered on the books of the secret political police in New York, of persons suspected of treason, and many arrests will be made."

The Hartford Courant of the same day says:

"A large number of arrests are daily made at the North, the number averaging ten or twelve a day. These are made generally on complaints lodged with the Departments in Washington. The Government is somewhat annoyed and astonished that petty cases of treason should be sent there for consideration. Any MILITARY COMMANDER CAN COMMIT FOR TREASONABLE ACTS, and the local officers should promptly act themselves, when there is necessity for so doing."

A few days before, the Courant had published the following:

"Government is considering the propriety of organizing a National Detective Police Force. New York, St. Louis, Chicago, and other cities, were represented in the conference. The plan is to have agents distributed through the country, forming a network of surveillance, through whose meshes secret traitors will find it hard to escape. The detective force in Washington is largely increased by recruits from New York and Philadelphia. The results are daily becoming apparent."

From the Tribune of Sept. 21st, 1861:

"IMPARTIAL OFFICIAL VIGILANCE.

"So long as the ends of justice can be compassed, Marshal Murray seems to care little what work he prosecutes. A while ago he was ferreting out slave captains and crews, and made himself a terror to the guilty men, while for some weeks past he has hunted down traitors, seized the property of the disloyal, and effectually broken up the secret cabals and agencies engaged in furthering the dirty work of J. Davis and Co. The moral effect of his vigorous arrest of traitors has been wonderful. A real panic seems to have seized upon them, and there is not a secret sympathizer with the rebels who has not either fled the city, or, if remaining, is not trembling lest his turn should come next. We have reason to know that certain parties in very high station among us who were liable to attainder, and who were actually preparing (?) to send important intelligence to the enemy, have left the city between two days to escape arrest."

From the Tribune, July 23d, 1862:

"CAUTION TO TRAITORS IN OUR MIDST.

"Wilkes' Spirit says: 'We are informed that the Commissioners of Police have been industriously engaged for some time past in forming lists of all persons of secession principles and doubtful loyalty, who, at present, infest the community. The whole force of the Department has been secretly employed in this good work, and the use to be made of it will probably be to direct the Government when drafting shall commence, where to go for its first levy. Information as to disloyal persons is solicited by the Department from all good persons.'"

The newspapers teemed with violent attacks on individuals. Men, women, and children were accused in radical papers. Hundreds of good citizens, of Democratic principles, were thus attacked. Every encouragement was given to the business of denouncing and seizing all who opposed the abolition policy. Every man who ventured to oppose that policy was at once accused of treason, or of discouraging enlistments, or of some other offence. Abolitionists were not interfered with. The Boston Liberator continued to flaunt its motto: "The Constitution is a league with death and a covenant with hell;" but Mr. Lincoln did not object to that. Abolitionists advocated disunion, but were not arrested.

CLERGYMEN WERE SEIZED WHILE AT PRAYER AT THE ALTAR, ON THE MORNING OF THE SABBATH DAY.

TO THE PUBLIC.

A scene occurred in St. Paul's Church, Alexandria, Virginia, on Sunday morning, February 9th, 1862, which has, perhaps, never had a parallel among civilized nations, certainly not in the history of this country. The officiating minister, Rev. K. J. Stewart, had just got through the Morning Prayer of the Episcopal Church as far as the Litany, the prayer for the President being omitted, but without anything in its place, and was proceeding with the Litany, when an interruption occurred of the character which the law designates as "brawling"—that is, the intervention of noise and tumult by certain persons, who had come to the church with the intention of interrupting the service, should it not proceed according to their wishes. These persons commenced the disturbance as soon as they found the prayer for the President omitted. One of them, Captain Farnsworth, of the Eighth Illinois Cavalry, who sat near the chancel, dressed in uniform, with some five or six of his soldiers near him, undertook to officiate in prayer (if prayer it can be called) by reading the prayer for the President of the United States. How far he went in it does not appear in the confusion, but soon quitting his position as the offerer of prayer, he advanced to the altar where Mr. Stewart was kneeling, still continuing the Litany, and ordered his arrest. Mr. Stewart was dragged from his knees by the soldiers. The ground of the arrest Captain Farnsworth distinctly avowed to be the omission of the prayer for the President of the United States. With this avowal, he said, "I arrest you by the authority of the United States, as a rebel and a traitor."—"And I," responded Mr. Stewart, who by this time had advanced to the chancel rails, to Capt. F., "summon you to answer at the judgment seat of the King of kings and Lord of lords for interfering, by force of arms, with His ambassador, while in the act of presenting the petitions of His people at His altar." The solemnity of this appeal apparently caused the parties to fall back and pause; but soon the soldiers were ordered to seize Mr. Stewart, which two of them did with great violence, forcing the prayer-book from his hands, one of them drawing a revolver. Another revolver was presented to an old and venerated citizen within the chancel, when the officer ordered the soldier not to fire. Very soon a considerable number of armed soldiers appeared in the church. Mr. Stewart, refusing to yield voluntarily, was dragged by force from the altar, and through the aisle, out of the church. He was in the surplice, which he wore through the streets, and at Col. Farnsworth's quarters, where he was taken.

Capt. Farnsworth said that he went to church intending to arrest Mr. Stewart if he should offer any prayer for the Confederate States. Near him, in the same pew, sat Mr. Morton, the "detective" agent of the United States government, who there gave orders to Captain Farnsworth to make the arrest, which was executed as above described. Mr. Morton has declared that he was acting under authority from Washington. The scene in the church was such as may be imagined under such circumstances. Gentlemen were indignant and excited, and ladies giving utterance to their feelings of grief and indignation; but, of course, no serious effort was made to prevent the arrest. Mr. Stewart was taken away, and the congregation dispersed.

It is proper to state that these proceedings were without the knowledge of Gen. Montgomery, the Military Governor of the city, and were strongly condemned by him when they came to his knowledge. He telegraphed to Washington for instructions from the government, which, when received, were of such a nature as to lead to Mr. Stewart's release, after a few hours' detention.

The issues involved in the transaction, thus imperfectly sketched, are too grave to admit of comment. It will, however, be well to state that Mr. Stewart only insists upon the rights of all ambassadors to communicate with their King, untrammelled by civil or military interference, and that in no case have any of the services of this church assumed a political aspect; no prayer has been offered, and no sentiment advanced at any time that was calculated to offend even the most sensitive critic; but public worship is interrupted, soldiers invade the chancel, and with drawn revolvers drag the minister of religion from its altar, because he will not do their bidding. The undersigned were present in church, and testify to the facts as above stated. It may be proper to state that by request of the vestry, in the absence of their rector, the Rev. George A. Smith and Rev. Mr. Stewart have been officiating in St. Paul's Church for several weeks past, and that Mr. Smith was in the chancel at the time these occurrences took place.

JUDGES WERE SEIZED AND IMPRISONED FOR JUDICIAL DECISIONS RENDERED ON THE BENCH.

There is not on record in civilized nations a more clear and manifest attempt to destroy the purity of the bench by interposing the power of a tyrannical autocracy than was exhibited in the treatment of judges. We cite the case of Judge Constable, of Illinois, arrested for a calm and correct judicial opinion, rendered in the court of which he is an honored judge.

[From the Burlington Sentinel, March 27, 1863.]

THE ARREST OF JUDGE CONSTABLE.

We do not propose to discuss the merits of this the latest evidence of the character of the times in which we are living, and of the men who rule us. A simple statement of the facts in the case is sufficient to induce us to cast about us, and inquire if it be really in the American Republic rather than within the realms of the Czar that such scenes are enacted. The facts to which we allude took place on the 13th inst. They are thus briefly set forth by a city cotemporary:

"While the Circuit Court of Clark county, in Illinois, was in session, a woman appeared before a justice of the peace, and made oath that two persons from Indiana were attempting to kidnap her son upon the charge that he was a deserter from the Federal army. The justice thereupon issued a warrant for the arrest of the accused persons. They were brought before him, and at the request of their counsel the case was carried before the Circuit Court. Judge Constable of that court heard the case. It was established that a commission was in the possession of the accused authorizing two persons named 'to arrest deserters' in a certain district of the State of Indiana. It was not shown that the accused were the two persons named in this commission. Upon this, neither the question of desertion nor the persons of any alleged deserters being before him, Judge Constable held the accused to bail to answer for the crime of attempted kidnapping in the State of Illinois.

"These proceedings having been taken, Major-General Wright, military commander in the Indiana district, sent an officer under his orders, with a force of two hundred men, into the State of Illinois, arrested Judge Constable, and conveyed him out of that State to answer to the charge of 'harboring and protecting deserters.'"

This is the most serious outrage yet attempted upon personal freedom. The courts of law have always been looked to by the people as the great shield and safeguard against wrong or injustice committed by the executive upon the people. When this great protection is withdrawn, when the decisions of the judiciary are set aside as naught, and the persons of our judicial officers become the victims of administrative tyranny and violence, we may well feel that not only the substance but the form even of republican spirit and government has fled from amongst us.

We again say that this is but one instance among many. The attempt to suppress courts of law and justice by frightening judges was happily unsuccessful in the main, and we may point to a long list of able opinions of learned jurists, condemning the administration, and pronouncing its acts lawless and revolutionary. But, alas for Americans! the decrees of the courts were powerless, and they could not free the citizen from the grasp of radical persecution. Cases occurred, as in the instance of Rev. Mr. Benedict at Buffalo, where the United States Judge declared the accused free from stain, and ordered his release; but the United States Marshal, in the very presence of the Judge, refused to discharge the prisoner, seized him again in the court room, transported him from prison to prison, till he finally lodged him in the Old Capitol prison at Washington, under the very eye of Abraham Lincoln. Thus courts were defied, and law trampled on at the order of the President, who pretended to be enforcing the laws.

Judge Andrew H. Duff, one of the Circuit Judges of Illinois, was seized and taken to Washington, kept for months in prison, and finally discharged; no crime of any sort being found in him.

LADIES WERE SEIZED AND IMPRISONED, SUBJECTED TO NAMELESS INSULTS, FORBIDDEN THE VISITS OF FRIENDS, HURRIED FROM PRISON TO PRISON, AND MOST FOULLY TREATED BY THE OFFICERS OF MR. LINCOLN.

We recall the Brinsmade case. It has been almost forgotten in the rush of this fierce time. The following is from a statement made by her counsel to Simeon Draper, Esq., before the circumstances were fully known. It is accurately true in every sentence:

About two months since Mrs. Brinsmade, the wife of Dr. Brinsmade, a young lady of about twenty years of age, having a pass from Gen. Butler, arrived in this city from New Orleans, having been placed by the father, Theodore A. James, Esq., a highly respectable merchant of that city, in the charge of Dr. Phelps, one of the surgeons of the steamer upon which he had secured her passage.

She brought letters from her father to Messrs. J. D. Scott & Co., and other gentlemen of this city. Upon her arrival here she was accompanied to the Everett House by an invalid naval officer, who had been requested by Commodore Morris, at New Orleans, to protect and assist her.

Mrs. Brinsmade's object in visiting the North, was to reside with her uncles, one of them in Washington, the other in Troy. She remained a few days in this city and Brooklyn, and then went to Washington, where, after remaining four days, she was arrested by Marshal Baker, who kept her a close prisoner for four days, carefully guarded.

Some ten days after she left this city for Washington, a hackman called on one of her friends in New York, and said that a lady was brought on in the train of the previous night by a detective from Washington, and conveyed to the 47th street police station, and that her name was Mrs. Brinsmade.

An immediate application was made to Mr. Kennedy for the cause of her arrest, and for permission to see her. This was rudely refused by Mr. Kennedy, who threatened to lock up the applicant if the inquiry was repeated.

Another friend of Mrs. Brinsmade then saw a deputy marshal, and was informed that she could only be seen by permission of Mr. Kennedy. He stated that she was confined in the 47th street station house; that she was a giddy, foolish, secesh woman, who had been singing secesh songs; that it was thought best to send her home to her father, at New Orleans, and that she would sail in a day or two, but that no one would be allowed to see her.

With this assurance her friends were forced to be contented.

Thirty-five days afterward a letter was received by one of her friends, stating that she was still a close prisoner in the 47th street station house.

Application was at once made to you. Her friends were informed that you knew nothing of her case; that you would at once address the proper authority at Washington for information, and, if in your power, would release her.

Pending this correspondence, two ladies, the wives of two of our most reputable merchants, who had been for many years the neighbors and friends of Mrs. Brinsmade, called upon Mr. Kennedy for permission to see her.

They asked "What were the charges against her, and who were her accusers?"

Mr. Kennedy, in his usual manner, answered, "I, madam, am her accuser. She is a general spy. From the moment she set her foot in this city, my presence overshadowed her. I did not leave her a moment. She went to Brooklyn to visit her friends. I watched her, and when she returned to the Everett House, I watched her there. She went to Washington, and when I got her in the right place I arrested her and brought her back here, and put her where she is."

In reply to the inquiry if there was no more proper place for the confinement of this lady than a police station, he said, "No, that was the place for her. That her whole conduct on board ship indicated that she was a spy, and that she ought to be hung;—that a thoughtless, giddy thing like her, and the one who was arrested a few days since in Washington, who was making a wagon of herself, carrying quinine to the rebels, were the very ones to be employed as spies, and that they all ought to be hung."

In reply to the inquiry as to whether she was to be kept shut up where she then was, and had been for five weeks, and her friends unable to see her, or know where she was, he replied, "That is with the Department."

Through your kind intervention, after this long confinement, this lady was on Monday restored to her friends.

OFFICE OF THE PROVOST MARSHAL GENERAL OF THE WAR DEPARTMENT,
NEW YORK, Nov. 10th, 1862.

DEAR SIR:—In reply to yours of the 8th inst., I can only state that up to the 29th ulto., I had no knowledge whatever with regard to Mrs. Brinsmade's case. On that day Mrs. Elliott called and informed me that she was under arrest, and inquired what was the cause.

I on the same day wrote to Washington, directing inquiry to be made of the Judge Advocate-General.

On the 1st inst., I was informed that the Judge Advocate-General knew nothing about the case.

Upon this, I asked Mr. Kennedy upon what authority he held her as a prisoner. He replied, that she was arrested and held by order of Col. Baker, the provost marshal of Washington. This I forwarded to Washington, and on the 3d inst., received from Col. Baker and the Assistant Secretary of War, information by telegraph to the effect that the arrest had been made by one of Mr. Kennedy's officers, and Mrs. Brinsmade was detained by him without authority from the War Department.

I then called upon Mr. Kennedy, received from him an order directing Mrs. Brinsmade's release, and went with it to the station house, took her from it, and placed her in charge of her friends.

The foregoing is all the information that I can give bearing on the subject.

Your obedient servant,
S. DRAPER, P. M. Gen'l.

It subsequently appeared, on the legal proceedings which were instituted in this case, that Mrs. Brinsmade was subjected to infamous proposals as the price of her release. For forty days she was in the power of the scoundrels who held her, in secret—unknown to the world or to her own friends. Here is part of her own testimony:

A. On the 25th of September. Q. Where did you go? A. To the Everett House. Q. How long were you in New York? A. Eight or ten days. Q. Where did you then go? A. To Brooklyn. Q. Where did you there reside? A. With Mrs. O. T. Downs, in Bedford avenue. Q. Did you go from there to Washington? A. Yes. Q. Where did you stop there? A. With Mr. T. C. Downs, my father's uncle by marriage. Q. How long were you there? A. Four days. Q. Were you arrested? A. Yes. Q. By whom? A. By one Bowles and another officer. Q. What did Mr. Bowles say? A. That he arrested me by order of the provost marshal of Washington City, Col. Baker. Q. Did he take you away? A. Immediately. Q. Where? A. To Col. Baker's office. Q. Did he take your baggage? A. Yes, and papers, pictures, letters, and everything, and examined them. Q. What did Col. Baker say—what occurred on that examination when he examined your letters? Col. Baker told me he arrested me by order of the Secretary of War; that I was accused of being a rebel spy, having treasonable papers in my possession. My papers were examined and read, and he asked me what I came for. I told him private business. He then told me if I did not wish to go to New Orleans I should be sent to New York, and he pretended to the man Bowles, who had charge of me, that he would keep me as a prisoner at the St. Nicholas Hotel, as he had at Willard's, and that on Sunday he would release me. Q. Did he examine your private papers? A. Yes. Q. What did he say? A. He said there was no evidence to hold me. Q. What did he say about your letters? A. That they were very affectionate. Q. What did he say about your daguerreotypes? A. He said one or two were good-looking; and he proposed to keep them because they were good-looking. He promised me I should have my pictures the next day, because he had to show them to the Secretary of War before he gave them to me (laughter). Q. Well, you came on to New York in charge of Mr. Bowles? A. Yes; he brought me to Broome street in a carriage. Q. Who was Mr. Bowles? A. He told me he was employed in Mr. Baker's office, and would go back to the office in a few days. Q. What was Mr. Bowles's manner in escorting you to New York? A. He was exceedingly affectionate, and called me "My dear" and "Bella." Q. Had you ever seen him before? A. No, I never saw him before. Q. You were brought here to this office? A. Yes, I was brought to this station house on this corner. Q. What then was done? A. He got out of the carriage; he did not tell me what place it was, but said he must stop for some orders. The driver got down and I asked him wherever he drove me to tell me where it was, and to take a message to one of my friends in New York. Q. Where were you taken then? A. To the Forty-seventh street station house. Q. You never saw Mr. Kennedy there, did you? A. Never saw him in my life, sir; I would not know him if I was to see him. Q. How long did Mr. Bowles remain there? A. For a week or ten days, taking me regularly to my meals at the next house; I saw the captain, policemen and sergeants in the house every day. Mr. Baker came after I had been in nearly two weeks, and told me he had come to release me. He said the Secretary of War and Mr. Kennedy had been very anxious to send me to New Orleans, but he had seen the Secretary of War and persuaded him he need not do so. He said he had put Mr. Kennedy off from time to time merely to please him (Mr. Kennedy) in that way, saying he would put me on a vessel, but it was only to satisfy him, because he was so anxious to have me go. Then he told me Mr. Kennedy asked him, when he arrived in New York, whether he had brought an order for my removal. He told Mr. Kennedy no, he had brought an order for my release. Mr. Kennedy wanted to serve it; he said no, he preferred to serve it himself.

Commissioner Bowen remarked that this was so important he would like to have it repeated for the better understanding of all.

Mrs. Brinsmade.—When he (Mr. Baker) came to the station house he told me he had got my release; the Secretary of War and Mr. Kennedy had both been anxious to send me to New Orleans, and he said he had persuaded the Secretary of War that it was not necessary, it was not worth while, or something of that kind; Mr. Kennedy had written to him repeatedly requesting an order to send me to New Orleans; he had told Mr. Kennedy to make inquiries about some ships that were leaving, but it was merely to please Mr. Kennedy, who was very anxious to send me away. Then he told me I would be released the next day; that he was going to Albany that night, and would be back at 9 or 12; when he came to New York, Mr. Kennedy asked him if he had brought an order to send me South. He (Mr. Baker) told him no, he had brought my release. Mr. Kennedy offered to serve it, but he (Baker) refused, saying he wanted to see me himself. He advised me to leave New York for a few days, because, if Mr. Kennedy knew where I was going, he would arrest me again (laughter). I asked this man Bowles, while I was in the station house, what was to be done with me. He said he did not know; he had his orders from the War Department. I frequently asked the officers for Mr. Kennedy, and the invariable reply was: "Mr. Kennedy can do nothing for you until he receives orders from Washington." Q. When Mr. Baker promised to let you out did he urge to remain in New York? A. He wanted me to go to Philadelphia with him. He said if I would go he knew where I could be safe. If I would go with him I would be safe, because then he could place me where neither Mr. Kennedy nor anybody else could arrest me again. Q. Who was captain in that station house? A. Captain Sloat. Q. He knew, of course, of your confinement? A. Yes. I always asked him when he went down to see if there was an order for my release. Q. Why were you arrested? A. Because I was a rebel spy. Q. Well, were you a rebel spy? A. No, sir.

Remark by Mr. Barlow.—She means because it was said she was a rebel spy.

Mrs. Brinsmade.—Certainly. Q. Were you guilty of any charges whatever; any political offence? A. No. I had not meddled with politics at all. It was disagreeable to me to live in New Orleans, and I wanted to come North. Q. After you came to New York, while you were in Brooklyn or Washington, did you send any message by telegraph or otherwise, or give any information to anybody whatever, having any bearing upon any political or military subject? A. No, sir. Q. None, whatever? A. No, sir. Q. Who told you you were a rebel spy? A. Mr. Baker. Q. If he thought you were a rebel spy how could he let you out and take you to Philadelphia? A. I do not know how he could do it, only he said he would do it. Q. With whom are you residing here now? A. With Mrs. John H. Elliot, in Twenty-third street.

By Mr. Barlow.—Are you a friend of Mrs. Elliot?

Mrs. Brinsmade.—Yes. I knew her when I was a very little girl. She resided in New Orleans. Q. What other friends have you here? A. Mrs. Converse, who also lives in Twenty-third street. She knew me when I was a young girl. Q. And has taken care of you since? A. Yes. Q. When you came away from New Orleans, did you come with permission of the Government? A. Yes. I came from New Orleans with a pass from a military commander. Q. You were put in the charge of Dr. Phelps, surgeon of the ship? A. Yes. Q. Had you letters? A. I had no letters with me; they were sent in the ship to Mr. Elliot, and a member of the firm of J. B. Scott & Co., by my father. Q. Authorizing him to give you money? A. Yes, authorizing him to give me any money that I needed. Q. When Mr. Baker asked you to go to Philadelphia, what did you reply? A. I told him it was not necessary for me to go with him, for I had friends of my own to take care of me.

EXAMINATION RESUMED BY JUDGE DEAN.

Q. You never knew Mr. Kennedy before? A. I never knew Mr. Kennedy. I never saw him during the time I was imprisoned. I just now asked Mr. Barlow to point out to me which of the gentlemen present is Mr. Kennedy. I have seen him today for the first time. Q. So far as you know, then, he had nothing to do with your imprisonment? A. I always understood that Mr. Kennedy had nothing to do with it. The officers who had me in charge said Mr. Kennedy could do nothing until he received orders from the War Department. Q. Then you understood yourself to be the prisoner of Mr. Baker? A. Yes. I was the prisoner of Mr. Baker, lodged in the Forty-seventh street station house. Mr. Baker told me I was a prisoner by order of the Secretary of War, and that Mr. Kennedy was merely requested to hold me.

Commissioner Bowen.—I am going to ask this question, not that it has any relevancy to the case, but merely for information: What was your treatment in the station house?

A. I was treated with the utmost respect by all the officers, policemen, and captain. I was treated very rudely by Mr. Baker and Mr. Bowles.

Examination continued by Judge Dean.—In what part of the station house were you kept? A. In a little room separate from the policemen. Q. And were taken to an adjoining house for your meals? A. Yes.

Commissioner Bowen.—This room was comfortable? A. Yes, it was tolerably comfortable, but very cold. It had no carpet when I first went there, but one of the officers, after I had been there some time, gave me a rug. Q. Then you were treated respectfully? A. I was treated with entire respect, because they were convinced it was an outrage—my being sent there without a charge. Q. This room was not a cell? A. Oh, no! they would not dare put me in a cell (laughter).

By Mr. Barlow.—During this time that you were there were you allowed to send any letters or hold any communication with the outside world, or during that time was any one allowed to call upon you? A. No; I was not permitted to send any letters. I asked permission to send a letter to my friends, and it was refused, consequently I pitched it out of the window, and a man picked it up and put it in the post office. That was the last week I was there? Q. Had you asked permission to write letters? A. I had asked permission to write letters, subject to the inspection of the officers, but they said they had no authority to do so. I held no communication with my friends. None were allowed to see me. I told Mr. Baker, when I came, I was anxious to see Mr. Draper. Mr. Baker said Mr. Draper could do nothing for me, that he was a man of no influence or power, and could do nothing for me (laughter). Q. Until this did you have any means of communicating with your friends, or counsel, or any one else? A. No.

By Commissioner Bowen.—How long before your final release did Col. Baker call on you? A. nearly two weeks. Q. When was the last time Bowles was there? A. About five or six days before I was released I saw Bowles, who expressed extreme astonishment that I was still a prisoner. He said Mr. Kennedy would see me the next day, and I would have a hearing before the Board of Police Commissioners (laughter).

[From the World.]

ANOTHER INSTANCE of the seizure of females was the case of a poor girl in New York. A very beautiful and very honest servant girl lived for three years at domestic service in a family on Ninth avenue. For two years of the time she lived very happily, but unfortunately for her comfort, during the last year of her stay the head of the family endeavored to ruin her. This was the cause of her leaving his employ. She went to service in Madison street, but her former employer followed her there, visiting her frequently, and making overtures that she could not consent to receive. One day he essayed to take liberties which made her indignant, and which she resented by throwing a basin of dirty water over him. From her presence he went directly to the special provost-marshal, charged the poor girl with treason, stating that she had uttered disloyal sentiments. Among others, that she had hurrahed for Jeff. Davis, said she hoped President Lincoln would be hung, and as for Provost-Marshal Kennedy, she would like to hang him herself. She was immediately sent for, had a preliminary examination, and was then removed to the bedroom occupied by the detectives, just beyond "Number Four." Here she gave vent to her grief in cries and sobs. She was detained among felons and vile characters, and finally discharged, no one knows how.

In connection with these cases, we quote the World's remarks on New York arrests under Kennedy:

The case of Mrs. Brinsmade is by no means the most flagrant example of the abuse of power made by this man. Since his advent to office the sufferers at his hands may be numbered by scores and hundreds, and to such an extent was the business carried after his appointment as special provost-marshal, that upon the arrival in this city of the Hon. L. C. Turner, Judge Advocate General of the United States, to investigate into certain abuses existing here relative to prisoners of state, he found the station houses swarming with these unfortunates, who had been taken for no crime that they had been aware of, and who had been allowed no hearing either at the time of their arrest or subsequently. It is now stated that there are others still confined in the various station houses in the city, whose cases are of a character to call the blush of shame to the face of every man and woman in the community who has any regard for their liberties as residents of a republic under republican rule.

HOW ARRESTS WERE MADE.

It may not be generally known how arrests were made by the provost-marshal. Citizens were taken off Broadway and hurried before the Government official without a word of warning, or a whisper of what they were arrested for. Others were taken from their beds at midnight, and compelled to visit police headquarters, there to learn, for the first time, the nature of the charges preferred against them. No warrants were exhibited by the officers, no explanation given, nothing but the announcement: "The provost-marshal has ordered you to be brought to his office." It was useless to resist or ask questions. The officers were dumb, but they were powerful, and could listen to no expostulations, or make answer to any inquiry. These parties were usually held at headquarters over night; sometimes, however, the cells would be full, and the floor of the officers' room also covered with the sleeping victims. In such cases the parties were sent to some of the station houses adjacent to Broadway, and not unfrequently these would be full also, to such an extent was the business of arrests carried. The nearest station house to the police headquarters is that located in the Fourteenth precinct, in Spring street, near Marion.

Two parties, whose names can be obtained at this office, were arrested by Provost-Marshal Kennedy on the broad charge of disloyalty. They had been guilty of offering a resolution, at a public meeting, calling upon Government to make some compromise, upon the basis of which a peace could be effected. They were taken to the police headquarters, and interrogated after the style in vogue at that place, and from there were sent to the Fourteenth precinct station house, where they were put in solitary confinement in a cell. On Friday, the 19th of September, the following letter was received from one of these parties by a prominent business man in this city, a personal friend of the prisoner, and was the first intimation he was able to obtain of the locality in which his friend had been confined, although fourteen days had elapsed since his arrest. The letter was hardly legible, having been written in a dark cell with a pencil:

FOURTEENTH PRECINCT STATION HOUSE,
In Cell, Sept. 17, 1862.

To ——— ———:

MY DEAR SIR: You no doubt will think it curious to receive a correspondence from this place. I and a friend of mine were arrested on a charge of disloyalty on the 5th inst. We proposed a resolution at a meeting, which appears to have given offence to some persons. We were arrested without a warrant, have had no hearing or trial, nor does there appear to be as yet any prospect of one. We are not permitted to utter a syllable in our defence. My brother prisoner is ———. I should very much like to have a personal interview with you. You will excuse this style of correspondence, as it is written hastily and stealthily, and in a dark cell, by your friend, ——— ———.

P. S.—It may be necessary for you to get an order from Kennedy to see me.

This letter, by a little financiering, was sent out of the station house, and in the course of two whole days and one night, arrived at the place of destination in Fulton street. The very day after it was received the party was discharged from custody by some process not fully explained.

THE PROVOST-MARSHAL THREATENS THE LAWYERS.

Abont two weeks after the establishment of the provost-marshal's office, a sailor, a British subject, was arrested on a charge that he was a citizen of the United States about to leave the country. He protested that he was a British subject, but it was alleged that he had once voted in Baltimore. He was seized and locked up in the Fifteenth Ward station house. His cousin applied to a well-known member of the bar in this city to act as the prisoner's counsel in the matter. This gentleman called upon Provost-Marshal Kennedy, and made a statement of the facts concerning the case, adding that he was to act as counsel for the accused party, and desired an interview.

The provost-marshal, who was resting from the labors of the day, with his heels upon the table, and himself almost lost in the huge chair he occupies, sprang to his feet with all the energy of his nervous nature, and exclaimed:

"I know you, sir. I know you. No, sir! You can't see him, sir! Are you aware, sir, that the writ of habeas corpus is suspended in this city?"

The gentleman was thunderstruck, but replied, mildly:

"I have said nothing about the habeas corpus. I simply called here to say I had been engaged to act as counsel for this man, and as such counsel requested the liberty of seeing my client."

Provost-Marshal: "Well, sir, if you come here again to interfere with my business, I'll send you down below."

"Now, sir, I give you personal notice that if you or any other lawyer comes to interfere with my business, I'll lock him up. That's all, sir."

Of course that was all. The gentleman could not resent the insult, for he knew the man he was dealing with well enough to know that he would not scruple to incarcerate him on the spot if he should utter the words that burned in his bosom.

In this case the British consul was appealed to, investigated the matter, and obtained the man's release, he being proven a British subject.

ANOTHER CASE,

illustrating the treatment extended to parties applying to see relatives and friends shut up in station houses, was developed a day or two since.

On the 15th of August an Irish laborer, named Hugh Boyle, was arrested for discouraging enlistments. He was placed in the Fifteenth Ward station house. A wife and two children were dependent upon him for support. In this case his wife makes a statement to the effect that her husband was willing to take the oath of allegiance immediately after being arrested; that after his arrest she went to the provost-marshal with a letter from Gen. Corcoran, and upon a subsequent occasion with letters from other parties, but that they proved of no avail. She states that on the 19th of September she took another letter to the official from Archbishop Hughes. The letter was in behalf of the prisoner. She states that the answer returned was that the man would not be released if all the bishops and gentlemen of New York should intercede for him; and further, that he wondered that the old gentleman (the archbishop) should interfere with his business.

This man had been confined over a month without a hearing, although the third section of the order issued from the War Department authorizing arrests, expressly provides that cases shall be tried by military commission as soon as possible after the arrest of parties. Catharine Boyle, the wife of the prisoner, declares that the provost-marshal treated her and all the letters she took to him with the utmost scorn. She applied to every one whom she thought could have the slightest influence with the provost-marshal, and as a last resort, to have her husband restored to his family, which was actually suffering for the comforts of life in his absence, she was advised to request Archbishop Hughes to present the case to the War Department. This is only one of a long list of cases of a similar character, which, for all the great public may ever know, may teem with a myriad more disgusting details.

MOURNERS WERE SEIZED AT FUNERALS WHILE BURYING THEIR DEAD.

[From the Baltimore News, Aug. 12, 1863.]

THE ATTENDANTS OF A FUNERAL ARRESTED.

"Yesterday afternoon the funeral of the late Capt. William D. Brown took place at Greenmount Cemetery, and was attended by the relatives and friends of the family. Mr. Brown, the father of the deceased, stated that he had called on the military authorities and was told that there would be no objection to the funeral, and the body might be buried anywhere. The people assembled at the grave, the funeral ceremony was performed, and the body interred. A portion of those who had attended left the cemetery, shortly after which a detachment of soldiers appeared and arrested all who stood about the grave, numbering some eighteen or twenty persons, whose names are withheld at the instance of the military authorities for the present.

After reaching the Gillmore House they were placed in Gen. Tyler's room, where subsequently Col. Chesebrough, of Gen. Schenck's staff, made his appearance. He stated that information had reached Col. Don Piatt, Chief of Maj.-Gen. Schenck's staff, that the body of Capt. Brown had been dressed in a new Confederate uniform for burial, and upon that information the arrest of the parties was ordered. The superintendent of the cemetery declared that since the body was deposited in the vault it had not been touched. What was done with it before it reached the cemetery he knew not, but nothing of the kind had since occurred. After some conversation, Col. Chesebrough released the whole of the parties to report at Maj.-Gen. Schenck's headquarters at nine o'clock this morning."

Dr. Samuel H. Bundy, of Marion, Ill., was seized, Aug. 18, 1862, while burying his little child, and carried off from his weeping family to the Old Capitol prison, a thousand miles distant. No charge was ever made public against him.

YOUNG CHILDREN WERE ARRESTED AND IMPRISONED FOR MONTHS, AND EVEN YEARS.

On Dec. 13, 1862, among the prisoners discharged from Fort Lafayette, was a boy of 17. No one could ascertain on what charge he had been imprisoned. He was poor and unknown. It was suspected that he was the son of a poor but ardent Democrat in Connecticut, whose political enemies had procured the arrest of his son as a means of persecuting him.

George Hubbell, a news-boy on the Naugatuck Railroad, was arrested Sept. 20, 1861. A poor, hump-backed boy, the only support of his mother. He was complained of by Connecticut abolitionists for selling Democratic newspapers on the cars. He was taken by a file of soldiers, carried under a large military guard to Brooklyn, received at Fort Lafayette by the Colonel in command with all the pomp of a dangerous rebel, and was there plunged into a military dungeon. The arrest of this poor boy was hailed with shouts of delight by the Connecticut radical party. Civilization was never more foully disgraced.

[From the Columbus Crisis, Dec. 24, 1862.]

"A little boy thirteen years old, belonging to Gallipolis, Ohio, was for months kept in Camp Chase garrison during the summer and early fall, whose only crime was that being on a boat, he owed a loyal woman, in Western Virginia, fifteen cents, a balance on washing she did for him while the boat laid at the wharf where she lived on the Ohio River. For this debt of fifteen cents he was reported to the military authorities as disloyal, was seized and sent to this political prison, where he was kept for months."

In Kentucky a school of boys was seized. The little fellows were required to take an oath prescribed by the provost marshal, including various arbitrary provisions. Most of the frightened boys submitted. Two little fellows about twelve years old, brothers, named Woolsey, stoutly refused. They were sent to jail. For more than two years they have remained in jail. They are there now.

We repeat that we are only giving a few instances to illustrate hundreds which occurred. There have been scores of young children seized and incarcerated by the authority of Abraham Lincoln, young frames broken down in dungeons, young hearts broken, young eyes dimmed forever by the cruelty of this American tyranny. Fathers, mothers, think of this, and pray God to forgive this poor President. He needs forgiveness!

THE VICTIMS OF MR. LINCOLN'S ARBITRARY SEIZURES IN NUMEROUS INSTANCES WERE DRIVEN TO MADNESS AND TO SUICIDE, OFTEN DIED UNDER THE CRUELTY OF THE TREATMENT THEY RECEIVED.

Capt. J. E. Elwood, confined on a false charge, forbidden to see any one but the man who brought him his meals, worn down by anguish, at length destroyed himself.

[From the N. Y. Times, Dec. 4, 1862.]

"SUICIDE OF CAPT. ELWOOD.—A good deal of excitement is caused by the suicide last night of Capt. J. E. ELWOOD, an inmate of the Carroll Prison, adjoining the Old Capitol. Capt. ELWOOD was an officer of the regular army, and was for some time Mustering and Disbursing Officer, but about a month preceding his arrest, was relieved and placed on duty in New York. While there he was selected as Colonel of one of the New York Regiments, but shortly afterwards was arrested by order of the Secretary of War, and committed to this prison, in which he has been kept in close confinement for about three months. He was a native of Pennsylvania, known to a large circle of acquaintances, and very popular among his friends, and great complaint has been made in consequence of the rigor of his confinement upon unknown charges. The suicide was committed by severing the jugular vein with a pocket knife, and he was this morning found dead in his cell. military inquest was held on the body."

MELANCHOLY RESULTS OF AN ARBITRARY ARREST.

[From the N. Y. Express.]

ONE OF THE ACCUSED PARTIES LOSES HIS REASON.

A brief paragraph appeared in the Express of yesterday, headed "Cheering for Jeff. Davis," in which it was stated that Alexander Hutchings, a Scotchman, and Henry Kerner, had been arrested for cheering for Jeff. Davis in a public bar-room and restaurant. Further particulars in regard to the case have since transpired, and as from the serious illness of one of the accused parties, fatal results may attend the arrest, we deem it proper to lay all the facts before the public.

It appears that three parties named Alexander Hutchings, Henry Kerner and John Marsh were in a drinking saloon and eating house down town, and that a wager was laid by one of the parties that he could drink the contents of a quart bottle of champagne at a draught. The champagne was opened and poured into a pitcher. The party who had made the wager, upon taking up the pitcher, exclaimed, "If this was Jeff. Davis himself, I could take it at a draught," and he swallowed the champagne and won the bet. Mr. Hutchings and his companion applauded the drinker for his success in gaining the wager. Two parties named Charles A. Meigs and James W. Warren, catching the words "Jeff. Davis," and hearing the applause, almost immediately afterward concluded the parties were uttering treasonable and disloyal sentiments and hurried off to inform the police. The trio were taken to the Police Court and from thence before Major-Gen. Wool, who, upon the affidavits of Meigs and Warren, gave the orders for the parties to be sent at once to Fort Lafayette. They were locked up over night, and in the morning taken to the office of U. S. Marshal Murray, preparatory to going down the bay in custody of one of the Marshal's officers. Fortunately, friends appeared in time, counter affidavits were made, the accusers themselves, upon being examined, were not quite sure of the facts stated, and the parties were paroled until orders could be had from the War Department.

The indignities to which these gentlemen were subjected could easily have been borne by them, but more serious results are likely to follow. Mr. Hutchings now lies in his house, a nearly hopeless lunatic. During the whole of last night he was wildly delirious, talking incessantly of the prison bars, and having horrid visions of dungeons and racks, that would make him scream out in agony. He is attended by the best physicians and may recover. The probabilities are, however, that he will entirely lose his reason. So that for a trifling word, imperfectly understood by his accusers, and not uttered by himself, this young man may be the inmate of a lunatic asylum for a life-time, while his accusers go unmolested, and still possessed of the power to make other indiscreet affidavits, and subject others of their fellows to the terrible experiences that have fallen upon Mr. Hutchings.

FURTHER PARTICULARS.—KENNEDY'S DOINGS IN THE MATTER.

We have received, from the friends of the parties interested, some further particulars in regard to the arrest of Messrs. Hutchinson (not Hutchings, as erroneously printed on Saturday), Kerner and Marsh, the gentlemen falsely charged with "cheering for Jeff. Davis" in Schultz's restaurant last week, which we deem of sufficient interest to lay before our readers, and thus enable them to see the arbitrary and cruel manner in which arrests are made by the police of this city. It appears that Mr. Marsh, who had been discharged shortly after his arrest on that day, when standing before the New York Hotel the same evening, was accosted by Captain Caffrey, of the 15th Precinct, who, having asked for his name, told him that he had orders from Superintendent Kennedy to arrest him. Mr. Marsh asked for Capt. Caffrey's warrant, to which the Captain replied that he had none, that there was no necessity for any warrant, and that he had Kennedy's peremptory orders to bring Mr. Marsh to headquarters; in fine, to use the Captain's own words: "You must come, sir." Mr. Marsh, seeing there was no way of escape, followed the Captain to headquarters, where he was detained all night, without any charge being brought against him. He, of course, was, with the remainder of his friends, discharged the next morning. It being ascertained the same evening, by the friends of Mr. Hutchinson, that the latter was detained at the First Precinct Station House, several gentlemen, among whom was Mr. John Collins, Jr., son of E. K. Collins, Esq., called upon the Superintendent to induce him to release his prisoner. They told Kennedy that the charge brought against Hutchinson was based upon error, and that Mr. Hutchinson had such a nervous temperament that a night's incarceration would certainly work to such an extent upon his mind, as to endanger his life. Mr. Kennedy's only response to the entreaties of these highly respectable gentlemen was, "a night's lodging in the station house is the best cure for such temperaments, much better than the assistance of all the N. Y. doctors." Mrs. Hutchinson [wife of the prisoner] soon after called upon Mr. Kennedy, and begged, entreated, aye, even almost prayed to him, to permit her to visit her husband in his cell, but "no, you can not," was the cruel, cold reply of our "Fouche." Poor Mrs. Hutchinson was so overcome with the coarse brutality of Kennedy, that on leaving headquarters she fainted, and had to be taken home in a carriage.

"Mr. S. H. Barry, released in December, 1862, became a helpless lunatic upon his release. Repeated attempts to obtain an examination and learn what was the accusation against him having failed, he sank into hopeless melancholy, and broke down in body and mind."

"DEATH OF A POLITICAL PRISONER.—Mr. A. L. Fessenden, of Wisconsin, was ordered to be released from the military prison in St. Louis, unconditionally, on the 16th inst., 'the charges against him not having been sustained.' The order for his release arrived at the prison hospital on the same day of, but a few hours subsequent to, his death."—Dubuque Herald, Nov. 30, 1862.

"ANOTHER ARBITRARY ARREST AND DEATH.—It is with profound sorrow that we announce the death of Hon. L. W. Hall, of Bucyrus, Ohio. He died last Sunday at his home in that place, aged about 50 years. Last fall, while in delicate health, he was arrested, taken to Camp Mansfield, and there incarcerated as a political prisoner. He was unconditionally released some time ago, and went home to die—his death doubtless having been hastened by what he endured while in durance. He was for some years a Common Pleas Judge, served a term in Congress, and was a man of acknowledged ability."—Columbus (O.) Statesman, Jan. 1863.

John W. Keyes, Editor of the Circleville Watchman, was imprisoned July 1, 1862, became a lunatic, and was sent to the State Asylum.

CAPTAIN MICHAEL BERRY.

"It was our fortune, while an inmate of the Bastile to which we were consigned by the order of the brutal tyrant who is the first instrument and representative of the infamous, abolition, disunion party which holds the reins of power at Washington, to form many pleasant acquaintances, and some warm friendship. But of all with whom we were associated, none so won our regard as Capt. Michael Berry.

"He came to this country early in the present century, a poor, friendless, homeless Irish boy; but soon after his arrival he engaged as a cabin boy with a Connecticut shipmaster running a vessel between New York and Charleston. In the family of his employer he found a home where he was kindly treated and respectably reared and educated. He gradually arose from his first position to that of mate, and finally received the command of a vessel in the New York and Charleston line, and was the first to introduce steam in that line. He was ever a popular and trusted commander, never having suffered a shipwreck or lost a man from a vessel that he commanded. Such a favorite was he, that always when a new vessel was built and put into the line, he was given the command, turning over the vessel which he left to some other commander. When the present troubles broke out he was in command of the steamship Columbia, the newest and best vessel on the line. He was also a part owner, and had accumulated a handsome property, having considerable real estate in Charleston.

"For four months we were a room mate of Capt. Berry at Fort Warren, and daily and hourly during that period of trial and suffering did we have occasion to be thankful that we had such a companion to cheer our prison gloom and alleviate the hardships of prison life. A bluff, frank, manly sailor, he was at the same time as gentle and tender-hearted as a woman. Generous, kind, considerate of all the rights and feelings of others, his heart instantly melted at a scene of suffering, and his purse was ever open and his hand ever ready to relieve and succor the unfortunate and distressed. In short—for we have not space to say more—he was the noblest man we ever knew.

"And this good old man is dead—has been killed by the tyrant who, without cause and without authority of law, had him kidnapped, and for six long months incarcerated in a military prison, from which he was finally discharged only to die.

"Capt. Berry was committed to Fort Lafayette on the 8th of October, from there was sent to Fort Warren with the other political prisoners the last of that month—and was discharged about a month ago. We saw, during the winter, that his spirits were failing and his physical system giving away under the confinement to which he was subjected, and the sense of wrong which was eating into his soul. We feared the consequences, and now our apprehensions are but too plainly realized.

"And why was this noble hearted old man persecuted and murdered? He was no politician—he had never cast a vote in his life—he had taken no part in the sectional troubles in which the country was involved. But private enmity and personal malignity marked him for destruction, and a pretext was found which brought the necessary order from Seward for his incarceration. It was charged that in March, 1861, when leaving New York harbor with his vessel, he raised the Palmetto Flag—the State Flag of South Carolina. The charge was true. But now for the explanation:

"It was a flag which he had used as a private signal and racing flag for fifteen years. Daniel Webster, Wm. H. Seward himself, and many other prominent men of the North had gone passengers with him under that very flag; and only two years ago, John A. Dix took passage with Capt Berry, to Charleston, on his way to Florida, whither he was hastening, with all possible speed, to the bedside of his sick wife, and was extremely anxious to reach Charleston in time to take the Florida steamer from there. Capt. Berry assured him that he should be put on board, or he would take him on to Florida himself. When they arrived near the port of Charleston, they found the Florida steamer just leaving, and had to give her chase, and finally signalled and brought her to with the same Palmetto Flag.

"Now what offence was there in raising the Palmetto Flag on the Columbia in March, 1861, more than at any other time? There was uninterrupted intercourse between the North and South. Vessels, passengers, and freight were allowed to go and come as before the troubles. The mails were still in operation between the two sections. And more than that, the Lincoln Administration was professing a peace policy, and assuring the country that there would be no war. When Capt. Berry left New York harbor on the occasion referred to, the steamship Yorktown, one of the New York and Richmond line, was just leaving port, and the two vessels went in for a trial of speed, and Capt. Berry, as in all such cases, raised the Palmetto Flag, and the Yorktown raised the Virginia State Flag. But both vessels had, at the appropriate and customary place, the United States Flag flying. This was all there was of it. The act was one of no political significance whatever. Captain Berry made several trips after that, and his vessel was not drawn off until the bombardment of Fort Sumter.

"Now mark—this was in March, and justice slept and vengeance did not strike till October, seven months after, during all which time Capt. Berry was openly in the City of New York. But then a leading Black Republican, who had a private grudge against the Captain, in consequence of his having detected and exposed him in some dishonorable act years ago—and who was probably the only enemy the Captain had in the world—told the story of the Palmetto Flag to Seward, and Seward, ever prompt and eager for new victims, had him kidnapped, and imprisoned, and resisted all appeals for his discharge, and there he was kept, dying by inches, till the Commissioners appointed by the Secretary of War visited Fort Warren a week since.

"As it was with Capt. Berry, so it has been with most of the political prisoners—they have been incarcerated upon equally groundless pretexts—and in most instances, as in his, at the instigation of private malice. How it was in this county, let the wretches whom we have in our eye, and who will yet be brought to a fearful reckoning, answer."

THE CONTEMPTIBLE AND TRIVIAL NATURE OF CHARGES AGAINST SOME MEN REMAIN AS MONUMENTS OF LINCOLNIAN FOLLY.

In The New York Evening Post, Oct. 3, 1863, we find an account of the arrest of what they called "a knot of cowardly traitors," "in the act of drinking the following infamous toast: 'Damn the goose that grew the quill that made the pen that wrote the Proclamation of Emancipation.'"

Dr. L. M. Ross was arrested in Illinois, carried to Washington, and kept for months in the Old Capitol prison. The only charge against him was that he had been seen in the public street to draw his finger under his nose. This was suspected to be a private signal of a secret association, but it was subsequently proved that no such association existed. The Doctor learned, however, that in Mr. Lincoln's dominions a man cannot make free with his own fingers or his own nose without danger of months in the Old Capitol prison.

ARREST OF LADIES AT WASHINGTON.

On Tuesday, June —, 1863, the Washington gossips were furnished with a fresh subject by the arrest of three ladies—two of whom were the wife and daughter of a prominent officer of the Senate—while passing the Old Capitol prison, in which are confined the Rebel and State prisoners. One of them raised her handkerchief to her face and passed it several times with rapidity over her mouth. This movement was observed by the guard, who stopped the carriage and requested the ladies to alight. On being conducted to the guard room they were informed that they were under arrest for violating a public order prohibitory of any waving of handkerchiefs or making any other signal likely to be interpreted as a signal to the prisoners. The lady stated that she had been eating oranges and was merely wiping her mouth.

The mother and daughter were released on a promise to be careful not to violate the rule again. The other lady's case is as yet not disposed of.

The order is imperative on the officers to make such arrests.

[From the Columbus Crisis.]

THE CASE OF PETER HEFFNER.

We have intended several times to notice the imprisonment of Peter Heffner, an aged German, naturalized some dozen years ago.

Peter Heffner is a citizen of Meigs county, Ohio, and resides a few miles from Pomeroy, the county seat. By his own honest industry he purchased a few years ago a little farm, on which he resides. When the war broke out, a young German hired to work upon his farm, joined the regiment making up in that county, and went to the wars. Mr. Heffner himself had been a soldier in Europe, and served a full term in the army of his country.

During last summer Mr. Heffner was at Pomeroy with his wagon, and on his return home overtook one of his neighbors, an abolitionist, on foot, and invited him to ride in his wagon. While proceeding on their way, this abolitionist asked Heffner if he had heard from his young man in the army. Mr. Heffner said "no." The abolitionist then said that the young man was shot dead on the field in a recent battle. Mr. Heffner, in his very broken English, said, "Dat ish good," meaning, as he testified, and all the facts in the case corroborated it, that it was good that the young man was killed at once, instead of being wounded and left to suffer a thousand deaths, before his final death struggle. Mr. Heffner had been a soldier, and everybody knows that the soldier desires actual and sudden death in preference to mortal and lingering wounds.

But this declaration was enough for this black-hearted abolitionist—he had found a clear case of Democratic secesh. Forgetting the kindness—as such scoundrels always do—of a ride home, he proceeded to enter complaint against Mr. Heffner, and had him sent to Camp Chase, where he remained in close confinement for "disloyalty" near two months! His crops went to ruin, and he lost a wheat crop, as it was too late to sow when he regained his liberty from the loathsome prison.

This old man fled from a land of despotism, as he supposed, to one of freedom, and found himself within the walls of a prison, on the false charges of a perjured villain!

MORAL.

A Democrat was punished and an abolitionist got a few dollars fees!

ONE OF THE ARBITRARY ARRESTS.—The Utica Herald, one of the most abject apologists of arbitrary arrests, states the case of F. M. Ellis, of that city, who held a confidential post under government, the duties of which he fulfilled with remarkable fidelity, industry and tact. A subordinate official, to whom certain parties from prejudicial motives had made sundry charges, caused his arrest, basing their accusations upon certain documents found in his possession. When the time for the investigation came, it was satisfactorily shown that the documents were not legitimately held by Mr. Ellis, but they were actually requisite for the successful prosecution of his operations. Yet he lay in prison three months, under this false charge.—Providence Post.

David C. Wattles was arrested at North Branch, in Michigan, 23d November, 1862, carried to Fort Lafayette, New York, detained five months, and finally discharged. The following is from the N. Y. Evening Post, of April 24, 1862:

ANOTHER INDIGNANT FORT LAFAYETTE PRISONER. David C. Wattles, of North Branch, Michigan, who was arrested in November and sent to Fort Lafayette, was recently released, and on returning home amused himself by giving a long account of his experiences. We find the story carefully reported in the Pontiac Jacksonian, which paper says:

"On Monday of last week a commission, consisting of General Dix and Edwards Pierrepont, with a secretary appointed by the Government for the purpose, commenced what they were pleased to term an 'examination' of the political prisoners at Fort Lafayette. Mr. Wattles with nine others were first called up and asked the following questions:

"'When were you arrested?' 'Where were you arrested?' 'What is your age?' 'What were you arrested for?' These questions were each answered by Mr. Wattles, except the last one, which he informed them was one he was as anxious to have answered as they could be. After asking him if he sympathized with the rebels, and a few similar questions, the commission expressed themselves satisfied. Their secretary, however, was not so clear, and interposed to ask him if there was not a secession flag raised at North Branch, and if he did not participate in raising it? To this Mr. Wattles responded that he heard that Isaiah Butler had an old shirt which he had used in straining blackberry juice for wine making which he on an occasion exhibited as a secession flag, and that the story of this flag had travelled throughout the country, receiving additions as it went.

"This closed the examination, and Mr. Wattles was removed to the 'house of detention,' where he was retained until the day following, when he was again brought before the Commission and informed that he could have his liberty by signing the parole."

MALICIOUS ARRESTS.—The Burlington (Iowa) Argus tells us of the arrest of three men in that county. The facts of the case were these:

A recruiting officer came to Rome after volunteers, and remained there some days. While there, he took occasion to abuse a certain Doctor White, formerly of that place, who had entered the Federal army, and was killed at Pittsburgh Landing,—stating that he was glad he was killed; that he was a secessionist, etc. These persons—friends of Doctor White—protested against such language. They said that White was no secessionist; that he was a Democrat, and had given his life for his country; and no man should call him a secessionist in their presence. Their feelings and indignation were aroused, and they told the officer that he must stop abusing Federal soldiers, or leave the place. With a malignity most devilish, this miscreant proceeded to Mount Pleasant, and told that he had been threatened and forced to leave Rome for recruiting for the Federal army, and had the three men arrested for discouraging recruiting. They were arrested and sent to this city, without a form of trial or an opportunity to prove their innocence.

Supposing that they would not be taken from the State without a trial, their counsel obtained a writ of habeas corpus, to have the matter examined and the men set at liberty. The writ was served on the sheriff, and Captain Newton pledged himself to obey its commands.

But, instead of complying with their agreement, and obeying the writ of court, last evening, after dark, the men were taken to the river, put into a skiff, and taken across the river to the cars for Chicago, and sent forward to an Eastern prison.

The case is the most damnable one that has yet transpired in the history of this country.

THE TREATMENT WHICH AMERICAN CITIZENS RECEIVED in many of these cases, is illustrated by the following statements.

[From the Kennebec Courier, of January, 1863.]

"LIBERTY IN MAINE.

It will be recollected that Captain Asa Turner, of Brooklin, Maine, was arrested and imprisoned in Fort Preble, a few months since, on a charge of 'resisting the draft.' Captain Preble has lately come out with the particulars of his offence and arrest, which reveal a story of high-handed wrong and oppression which would elicit condemnation in a land of despots. It appears he had two sons drafted. One of them was of age, and the father did not interfere at all with him, but left him to decide the question for himself. The other, on account of physical impediment, was unable to do military duty. He endeavored to get them examined, but a Dr. Drinkwater (an abolitionist), examining surgeon, told him that he should 'pronounce them sound, examination or no examination.' He said to the orderly sergeant that the youngest boy, not of age, should not go without his consent, as he did not consider him capable of doing military duty. This constituted the offence for which Captain Turner was dragged from his home and consigned to the tender mercies of a set of scoundrels who treated him like a brute. Captain Turner relates the circumstances as follows, and it is enough to cause the blood to boil with indignation.

"STATEMENT.

"I returned home to get help about mending my nets, &c., where I stopped for a day or two, and then, taking my sister, who lives with me, and a Mrs. Wilson, my partner's wife, and a boy to assist in rowing the boat, I started for the Island, but had not proceeded over three miles, when a boat containing six men rowed across the bow of my boat, and Nutter, who was one of the six, called out to me, 'You are my prisoner;' and like tigers on their prey, three or four bounded into my boat and on to me, and cursing and swearing, dragged me from my boat to theirs, and shoved me under a seat, when, taking my boat in tow, they pulled for the shore. I was then taken from the boat and heavily ironed. I demanded by what authority I was thus seized and brutally treated; was I guilty of any crime? Thereupon Nutter produced a paper, purporting to come from Hodgdon, the Adjt.-Gen. of the State, and proceeded to read. It commanded him to take my two sons and one Samuel E. Wilson, and take them to Bangor. My name was not mentioned. I asked him what that had to do with me. He replied enough, and said he should take my sons dead or alive. They were then about starting to take me away, when I requested to be allowed to send word by my sister to my family, that they might know where I was gone, and about my business, but this was peremptorily refused. After taking supper at Sargeant's, they took us directly by my house, not allowing me to speak for a moment to any one, to the store of Merrick & Reed, where they stopped with me for two or three hours, and then to Nutter's house, where we remained for the night.

The next day I was taken to Bucksport, where we stopped all night, being again ironed before starting. I have a sister residing in Bucksport, but was not permitted to see her, although bonds to any amount asked were offered for my appearance at any time they should mention, and at any place, if I could be allowed to go, either alone or under guard, to her house. I told them I wished to get some decent apparel before going further, as I was taken in my working clothes, and it was for this I wished to go to my sister's; but it was of no avail, they would not allow me to go. The next day I was taken to Bangor, where I remained at the barracks, under guard, till the next morning, then taken handcuffed and carried to Augusta by cars. By this time I was barely able to get one foot before the other. The treatment I had received, and the exposure had produced cramp colic, but notwithstanding I was suffering extreme pain, I was not permitted to have the irons from my hands, or to get anything to relieve me. At Augusta, I was taken first to the capitol, where I was exhibited to those in authority, and ordered to be lodged in jail. In the jail and the key turned, I was relieved of the irons, and sick and scarcely able to stand, I was immediately locked in a cell, where I found, TO ME IN SUCH A SITUATION, a more comfortable bed. The next day I was handcuffed by a Deputy U. S. Marshal, called Woodward, and taken to Portland and lodged in jail.

When taken from the jail in Augusta I was still suffering from the colic of the day before, and on my way to Portland, in the cars, the diarrhœa set in, when Woodward kindly consented to remove ONE handcuff. I remained in the jail at Portland two days, when I was taken to Fort Preble, and kept under guard two weeks and then released. I never made any threats to any one that I should resist the draft. I never procured arms or ammunition for that purpose, and the statement in some of the prints that I had guns for this purpose are base fabrications. This was my "resistance to the draft." For this, as alleged by the newspapers (I know nothing of my offence except what I have seen), I was brutally dragged from my home and family, denied counsel until my lodgment in the fort, or even an intercourse with friends, handcuffed like a felon, and treated in a manner that would cause a demon to blush if compelled to use such treatment; provided with no charges, and confronted by no witnesses; shut up in a fort under guard for two weeks, and then mysteriously released, to be told by the newspapers that the truth of the charges preferred against me were sufficiently established but that the process under which I was arrested was "irregular;" yet we live in the nineteenth century, in a land where constitutional liberty was bequeathed to us by our fathers, and, as I supposed, where a citizen could not be deprived of life, LIBERTY, or property without due process of law. From early boyhood I was thrown upon my own resources for support, and at the expense of my constitution I have earned an honest livelihood for myself and family. Feeble in health, I have not many years to live, but God grant that in the few years that remain to me I may see the once glorious Union restored, the Constitution obeyed and espected, and liberty of speech, freedom of the ress and the person from unjust and 'irregular' rrest and imprisonment, once more established.

ASA TURNER."

Hon. HENRY CLAY DEANE, arrested at Keokuk, owa, May 13, 1863, thus describes his treatment:

After my arrest at the house of Judge Clagett, was placed in the front of the crowd, with a low-red, insolent man, who commenced asking me nsolent questions, which I of course took no no-ice of. After hurrying me through several streets, t length a hollow square was formed, where I was hreatened, taunted, and insulted for a full half our. I was first informed that death was entirely oo mild a punishment to be administered to a "Copperhead," who, in the choice language of heir newspaper, was "foolhardy and demented nough to venture through Keokuk."

The soldiers were all strangers to me, and were ed on and prompted to their action by a Puritan lique who had an unsettled account with me for ome very candid talk about the year 1860, when was a candidate for elector of the State at large n the Democratic ticket, headed by the name of Judge Douglas. These benevolent men thought nature at fault that she had not endowed me with our separate and distinct lives, that each of them night be entirely gratified in having me put to leath in his own choice way. On the outside of he crowd there stood a merchant of thin visage, harp nose, red head, and exceedingly thin lips who cried out at the top of his voice "He ought o be drowned, seeing the Mississippi is close at hand," when there went up a yell, "Drown him," "Drown him," "Drown him." Near by another of the malignants spoke up and said: "Drowning was entirely too easy and speedy a death for a Copperhead," and cried out "Hang him, hang, hang him!" Still another commenced, and the cry went up, "Shoot him," "Shoot him," "Shoot him."

A fourth, with the murderous laugh of a Pawnee, said burning would better measure out the allotted punishment, lengthen the scene of enjoyment, and minister more thoroughly to the gratification of the executioners. This gentleman found no response. Every manner of insult and opprobrious epithet was used to jeer, to mortify and offend.

After being thus brutally treated, I addressed the crowd for some moments, and told them I had been sick for nearly a week, was then taking medicine, and desired a place to be at rest. After much parleying, yelling, and coarse insult, I was marched down to the office of the provost marshal, and there commanded by this young man, Ball, to strip myself stark naked, which I had to do in the presence of a large crowd, and remaining in that condition for fifteen minutes, while my clothes were searched, and each one of the party had taken his full liberty in about the same kind of jesting that had occurred in the street, except that it was coarser and broader in the room. I told this young man, Ball, that I had understood that he was an officer, educated at West Point, from which I inferred that he was a gentleman. He informed me, to my surprise, that he was not a West Pointer, which I placed to the lasting credit of that institution. After I had been allowed to put on my clothes, my carpet-sack was sent for to the hotel, carefully searched, and my private letters and papers read aloud in the presence of the crowd, open to the inspection of everybody. The letters of my wife and my business papers were jumbled together, and my knife and other articles taken, which I have never been able to recover.

After all this was over, Mr. Ball sent some one of the crowd to inform the soldiers that he would assure them that I would be severely dealt with, and they were permitted to retire.

I was soon lodged in the guard-house, where there was neither chair, stool, table, nor stand. Sergeant Newport kindly furnished me a cot. One filthy towel was the wiping cloth for a large body of men, some with sore, diseased and scrofulous eyes. I cannot better describe the place than I have done in a brief sketch which I wrote in it, and which Sergeant Newport, in the presence of John H. Craig, Esq., and Judge Trimble, declared was true to life; and I take here great pleasure in stating that Sergeant Newport, and every other soldier of the provost guard, treated me with civility, courtesy, and respect, for which I am grateful.

[From the N. Y. Express, Dec. 15, 1862.]

NEGROES IN FORT LAFAYETTE.

There have been two rebel negroes in Fort Lafayette,—one, by the name of Stephens, who was taken for running the blockade. He was let loose some time since. The prisoners, more or less, often wrote to the officials in Washington, asking what they were confined for, but they got no answer. Stephens wrote, among others, and got no answer. At last, one of the prisoners said—"Stephens, write; tell them you are a colored man." Stephens did write; did say he was a colored man,—and in a very short time a letter came back from the Judge Advocate, opening the doors for Stephens, the colored man. The negro was the only prisoner that could get an official answer from Washington.

There is another rebel negro there, named Robinson. He was taken in running the blockade, as pilot or cook. He declines writing a letter to say he is a colored man; and hence, it may be, he is continued in prison. He considers it beneath his dignity to take the oath of allegiance or to write to Washington.

Conscious of the crimes they were committing, and fearful of the personal retribution they might sometime receive, these evil doers tried to force and often forced from their poor victims (when the prison doors were opened, and they were permitted, after months of languishing, to go forth again) the following oath:

COPY OF OATH AS ADMINISTERED.

I, ——— ———, of ———, do solemnly swear that I will support, protect and defend the constitution and government of the United States against all enemies, whether domestic or foreign, and that I will bear true faith, allegiance and loyalty to the same, any ordinance, resolution or law of any State convention or Legislature to the contrary notwithstanding; and further, that I do this with a full determination, pledge and purpose, without any mental reservation or evasion whatsoever; and further, that I will neither enter any of the States now in insurrection against the authority of the federal government nor hold any correspondence whatever with them or with any person in them during the present rebellion, without permission of the Secretary of War, and that I will in all things deport myself as a good and loyal citizen of the United States and that I will not, at any future time, commence or cause any action or suit against the officers of any loyal State or of the United States for causing my arrest or imprisonment, so help me God.

Sworn to and subscribed before me, this 11th day of November, 1862.

L. C. TURNER, Judge Advocate.

CHARACTER OF THE PRISONS.

[From the Columbus (O.) Crisis.]

HORRIBLE DISCLOSURES IN RELATION TO A POLITICAL PRISON.

We speak wholly of the political prison, the prison of State, as we know nothing whatever of what occurs in the prison where "rebels taken in arms" are kept—that is, "the prisoners of war."

It must not be forgotten that there have been from six to seven hundred political prisoners at Camp Chase at a time; and although several hundred have been lately discharged without trial, there are yet there some four hundred—one or two hundred of those have arrived there within a few days past from Kentucky and Western Virginia. These men are taken from their homes, some from their beds at night, some from their houses in daytime, and a great many of them are picked up in their fields at work, and never suffered to see their families before being spirited off to Ohio and incarcerated in this celebrated Bastile, which will soon be as famous as Olmutz itself.

Our Ohioans are put into the same prison with these men from other States, and from them we have learned some facts which the people of Ohio ought to know. Many of these men have been kept in this prison for over one year, a great many for five, six, seven and eight months, without even seeing outside, or being allowed to communicate personally with any one, not even wife, child, father, mother, or stranger.

They are furnished with nothing but a single blanket, even these cold nights, unless they are able to purchase additional comforts with money they may be able to command. Many are poor men; and unable to purchase: they were not permitted to bring along a change of clothing, and many had on when seized nothing but summer wear, and that has become filthy, worn out, and scarcely hangs upon their backs.

They have no bedding, and are therefore compelled to sleep on the bare boards. They have not enough wood furnished to keep fires up all night, and hence the suffering is intensified by the cold weather. If they attempt, after night, to walk out in the yard to take off the chills of the dreary night, they are instantly threatened to be shot by the guards, as ordered by those in command.

Dr. Allen, of Columbia county, Ohio, said he laid on a bare board until his hips were black and blue. The wood furnished them is four feet long, and they are compelled, each mess, to chop it up for themselves. Recollect, always, that these are political prisoners, against whom no one appears as accuser, and no trial is permitted.

The prison has become filthy—awfully so—and the rats are in droves. If the prisoners attempt to kill one of these rats, they are forbidden, and threatened with being shot instantly. Recollect, always, as we said above, these are political prisoners, against whom some malicious negro-worshipper has created a suspicion of disloyalty, but whose name is kept secret, and hence there can be no trial.

The prison is perfectly alive with lice, and no chance is given to escape the living vermin. A dead man, one of the prisoners, was the other day carried out to the dead yard, and laid there over night, and when visited in the morning by other prisoners, who heard there was a dead man there, they found the hair on his head stiff with lice and nits—the lice creeping into his eyes in great numbers, and, as he lay with his mouth open, the lice were thick crawling in and out of his open mouth.

Not long since two of the prisoners got into a scuffle in trying their strength, and finally into a fight, as was supposed, and several other persons rushed to part them, when the guard from the lookout above fired on them, killing an old man by the name of Jones, from Western Virginia, and a ball grazing the skull of another, he fell, and it was supposed at first he was killed also; another of the balls passed through a board at the head of a sick man in the hospital, and only escaped him but a few inches. Two men in the scuffle were not hurt.

We might go further, but God knows, this is enough for once. It is enough to make one's blood run cold think of it.

Now, if any one doubts this—if the authorities at camp or at the State House doubt it, if the Legislature when it meets, will raise a committee, we promise to name the witnesses who, if sent for, will, under oath, prove all this, and as much more, some of which is too indecent to print in a newspaper for the public ear.

We do not bring these things to light for any other purpose than an act of humanity, out of respect to the fair fame of Ohio, and to direct public attention to them that the brutal authorities of that camp may have justice done them. The commandant of the camp is himself a member of the Ohio House of Representatives. He will no doubt appear on the first Monday of January to take his seat. Let him answer to his peers on that floor—let him answer to his constituents who elected him—let him answer to the whole people of Ohio, if he dare, whether these things are so or not. Heaven be blessed if any modification can be put upon these transactions—any excuse of the most trivial nature, by which the fame of Ohio may be vindicated from the crime and stigma which otherwise must go down to all time upon the pages of our history. * * * * * *

The officers in charge of prisoners, hit upon the plan of making a speculation out of them at the same time, as some of the prisoners were among the wealthiest men of Kentucky and Western Virginia, and some, we believe, all the way from Tennessee. The plan was arranged and carried out in this wise:

A man was put up on the parapet on guard (at night) where he could hold conversation with the prisoners. He would agree with them that for a certain consideration in money he would fix a plan for their escape. As they all wanted to get out of such a place as speedily as possible, some of whom had been there for a year and no prospect for a trial or release, the prisoners bit at the offer ; and a certain hour the next night was fixed on for their exit. One of the prisoners gave the guard twenty dollars and a gold watch ; what others gave we never learned. At the time fixed an outer plank was pryed off, and the night being very dark, they commenced issuing from the prison. But before they had got many yards they heard a command given ; and instantly sprang up before them from the grass a file of soldiers, and click, click, went the rifle locks, and they were, all who got outside, brought up standing at the point of bayonets and cocked rifles and hustled back to prison !

The men who entered into the arrangement, and paid their money and gold watch, were punished by forty-eight hours in the dungeon, and the money and watch never returned ! Not even when they were discharged, which most of them were, because there were no charges against them.

POLITICAL PRISONERS.

In the Government post-office building in this city seventeen persons are confined for alleged political offences. They were arrested upon affidavits made in some, if not all the cases, by partisan and personal enemies, upon which they are deprived of their liberty without any means of redress ; without the opportunity of disproving the charges made against them through the judicial tribunals of the country, a right guaranteed by the Constitution and which should be held sacred. If guilty of any crime against the Government these persons should be punished. If they have violated the law they should suffer the penalty therefor. But it is palpably unjust that citizens should be taken from their homes and business and incarcerated in a prison for weeks and months for alleged political offences, and denied the privileges granted the meanest criminals in the land. Three of the prisoners have very comfortable quarters, but fourteen are confined in cells built for criminals. In one cell, a small room, nine are confined, and in a still smaller one are five. Neither of them have side windows, but light and air comes through a skylight in the roof. Here they eat, sleep and live, shut out from the world, and only permitted to see the light of heaven through the small opening in the roof. Under no circumstances are they permitted to leave their cells, and before the iron grated door of their prison house, securely fastened, armed sentries, day and night, watch them. One prisoner, who came here sound in body and mind, for some days was insane through the effects of his confinement. Who two years ago would have anticipated that such arrests would have been made? Who would have thought two years ago that the President would have brought all the people of the United States under martial law, to be administered at his own discretion, and that in our magnificent Post-office building, in a State loyal to the Government and in which the administration of the civil law has never been obstructed, seventeen of its citizens would be confined, deprived of all their civil rights ?

THE PROVOST-MARSHAL AND CELL NO. 4.

We rather tire of Secretary Stanton and Fort La Fayette ;—will our readers excuse us if we put them off this morning with Provost-Marshal Kennedy and Cell No. 4 ? A glimpse of these remarkable objects is offered in another column. They are not an agreeable picture, we admit. And yet there can be no understanding of the full depths of the infamy to which our good cause has been sunk by official folly and wickedness, if we leave the Provost-Marshal and his methods out of view.

Now it is generally imagined that torture was done away with, among the English-speaking race, a good many hundred years ago, even in the case of convicted offenders. The common law discouraged it ; positive statutes prohibited it. The tenth article of the Bill of Rights under the Restoration, provided against "cruel or unusual punishments." The coronation oath imposes it as an everlasting obligation upon English sovereigns to execute justice with mercy. Inquisitorial torture, inflicted before the guilt is established, has been even more opposed to the Anglo-Saxon spirit. It has been treated almost from time immemorial as an utterly barbarous and unconscionable resort. Even the old Roman pagans had enough of the same spirit to confine the criminal quaestion, as it was emphatically styled, to slaves ; and as long as the faintest remembrance of the national dignity was kept alive, they would never consent to violate the sacred person of a citizen, till they possessed the clearest evidence of his guilt. But American citizenship, in these days, has no immunities. There is no ignominy to which, in these parts at least, it is not exposed. We are simply indebted to the sovereign grace of the Provost-Marshal if we breathe this upper air at all. "In the palace lives a man who can cut my head off," said Quenay, describing the guarantees of Louis Fifteenth's monarchy. At the corner of Elm and Broome Streets sits a man who can put us in Number Four, sums up our own condition.

Provost-Marshal Kennedy, some fine summer morning, sends his detective commanding you to repair to his presence. Useless to question. Your business is to go. You accompany the officer. Ushered in, you find yourself called to account for some thoughtless word or act that may or may not have come from you. Be careful how you bear yourself. Answer promptly and humbly. Don't let any of your father's blood in your veins ruffle you. Though you are not wont to be catechised in this curt, imperious style, you must forget all that. This is a Provost-Marshal, remember, Try to be meek. Study to please. Help him to magnify his office. Perhaps he will be good to you, and, when he has finished, graciously bow you off to a room that a Christian man can manage to live in for a few days and nights. If, on the other hand, you chafe under his questionings, or in any wise fail in deference, or if you do not confess up to his expected mark, he will probably make short work of you. You are booked for Number Four. You need not expostulate. "That 's all, Sir." A wave of the hand ; a word to the officer ; and there you are, a subterranean.

Well, the iron door closes upon you. Now grope. You can't go foul. Three feet by six is all the measure. Don't trouble yourself about the furniture. A plank shelf for a pallet, a pine block for a a pillow, a dipper and a water waste—that is the sum total. Are you alone ? You are in luck. You should know that there have been as many as three men of your size—and you know you are several sizes larger than the Provost—accommodated here at one and the same time, two sitting on the plank, and the third face downward on the floor. Now you have a chance to reflect upon the glorious blessings of constitutional government and the inscrutable dispensations of Provost-Marshals. No you haven't. Oh horrors! The swarms are upon you. Your flesh quivers. Your blood burns with poison. You are driven half mad with agony. You faint with heat. You gasp for air. Ah; you begin to understand now what meant that last vindictive look. You are getting a glimmer of what it costs to cross the humor of a Provost-Marshal. No danger now but that you will please him. To go from that den you would creep to his very feet. But be not impatient. Endure as you can. There will be no hurry to release you. You have not only to learn your lesson, but you have a little penalty to pay for your contumacy. Men no worse than you have been kept here for hours, nay days. Provost-Marshals are not so easily propitiated.

We may talk as we please of the thumb-screws, jack boots, wheels, racks, pinchers, and all the paraphernalia of mediæval persecution—they were all an infinitely more respectable means of propagating the true faith than this unutterable abomination which is used against political heretics, or those suspected to be such, in this so called land of freedom. Torquemada tortured, but he did it in a clean, gentlemanly way. He was content with ingenious applications of wood, and iron, and fire, and water. Fanatic as he was, he never degraded his cause by making loathsome vermin the ministers of its vengeance. It has been reserved for Provost-Marshal Kennedy to bring into requisition this new sort of peine forte et dure—the old anguish made all the more intolerable by an overpowering disgust.

In the name of American civilization, we protest against it. It calls for the execration, we will not say of every loyal but of every decent man. It is bad enough that we should be subjected to the arbitrary will of an officer unknown to the laws, however discreetly that will might be exercised; bad enough, at best, that we are hourly exposed to summary arrests, and commitments, and imprisonments, without bail, without trial, and even without offence:—but when it comes to this, that American manhood is made the prey of the vilest of creeping things, deliberately and expressly for inquisitorial purposes, it is adding to the lowest deep of ignominy a yet lower deep, which we are worse than slaves if we endure. Consent to such treatment forfeits not only our claims as freemen, but our titles as men.

ANOTHER ACCOUNT OF CELL NUMBER FOUR.

[From the World, September 12th, 1863.]

REFUSING TO GIVE A NAME.

Upon another occasion an individual was brought in for refusing to give his name to an enrolling officer.

PROVOST-MARSHAL—"What is your name, sir?"

UNKNOWN—"Well, I declined to give my name there, and I think I shall here."

PROVOST-MARSHAL—"Oh, you think so. Now I'll tell you what I think. I think you'll give it before you've been here a great while.

He sprung the bell again.

"Here is a man who won't give his name. Take him down and give him number four. He will probably give his name before many hours."

The young man, who was not above twenty years of age, seemed like a person hardly compos. He was pale-faced, and gaunt-looking, was seedily dressed, and had the appearance of having just come off a night's debauch. He was taken down to the detective office, again interrogated, and again declined to give his name.

"Give him number four," said the officer in charge, and he was at once seized and hurried off to the fated locality.

NUMBER FOUR.

Horror of horrors. Possibly no place since the black hole of Calcutta or the prison hulks of the Revolution could compete with cell number four at police headquarters.

Under the reign of the provost-marshal it became part and parcel of the machinery of the office, and was used as occasion called to hold fast the worst class of the prisoners arrested, or such as were considered the most flagrant cases.

Passing through the outer room of the detective office in the basement, you come into the sitting room—a close, badly ventilated chamber—the larger half of which is underground. Midway in the room at the right is a small half glass door cut in a partition, through which you enter upon a narrow corridor facing four small cells. These are numbered, beginning at the south end, one, two, three, four, the latter being at the extreme right as you enter the corridor, which is scarcely wide enough to admit the passage of a man.

The sides of cell number four are ceiled up with boards to the top. It is about three feet wide by six in depth. A stationary board fifteen inches wide is put up on the right hand for a sleeping pallet, and a three-cornered pine block, fastened at one end of the board, serves as a pillow—there being neither bed clothes, mattress or straw. A water waste and dipper in one corner completes the furniture of the cell. The sides of the place are thickly coated with whitewash in the vain effort to purify it. The door is composed of iron bars about one inch in width, and a quarter of an inch in thickness, arranged crosswise, so as to intersect each other at every two and a half inches. At the top is a small aperture eight inches square.

The entire place swarms with vermin. In dog-days, when the cell door was shut, and the door and windows leading to the outer apartment were closed, the atmosphere was stifling in its character, while the vermin ran riot over the unfortunate victims, who could neither lie down nor sit down from very agony, sometimes imploring in heaven's name to be let out, if only for a few moments. In the hottest weather of the season three persons have been confined in this cell at once, two of them sitting on the board and the third lying at full length on his face upon the floor, and all evidencing untold horror and misery.

Sergeant Young has often given directions to have the prisoners taken out at night, and allowed them to lie around on the floor of the outer room.

HOW THE UNKNOWN FARED.

The individual above alluded who would not give his name, was put in No. 4. The door of the cell was shut and bolted and the outer door was closed also, although it was one of the hottest days of the season. In fifteen minutes his cries were heard, the door opened and he was found in a profuse perspiration with the vermin crawling over and tormenting him.

"For God's sake let me out of this," he said, "and I will do anything you want."

The man or beast that Number 4 cannot tame is beyond the reach of the most injurious torture. Every delinquent who is alluded to as an atrocious villain, is wished no worse fate than incarceration within its walls. "Number 4" is a by-word among the officers and frequenters of headquarters, and is promised as a sort of bugbear to such inmates of the detective office as behave themselves unruly.

One of the individuals who had been arrested for some criminal offence, upon reading an account in the paper of a Rebel victory, laid the paper down as if in disgust, and remarked, "That's the way with our boys, just prick 'em and they run." The words were reported up stairs and the order came down.

"Place him in number four. He will be pricked where he can't run."

The history of this awful receptacle for prisoners can never probably be fully told; and we have only briefly sketched it to show some portion of the machinery used in conducting the business of the provost-marshal's office.

From the Rochester Union.

AN ARBITRARY ARREST.

On Thursday last, a citizen of Canandaigua was riding from this city home in the cars, when he engaged in a political discussion. Being a Democrat, and disapproving of the policy of the Federal Administration in some particulars, he expressed his opinion freely, as he had a right to do. He did not say that President Lincoln was a traitor and deserved hanging—he did not want to push home the charge of treason upon the President—in fact his language in expressing his views of the policy of the Federal Administration was not personal upon the President or calculated to beget disrespect for the man—as is that of the radicals toward Governor Seymour. But the indignation of two men wearing shoulder straps was aroused. They had heard about the suspension of the habeas corpus and concluded that they had a right to arrest a citizen, if they thought he ought to be arrested, and lock him up. So they took the gentleman aforesaid into custody and carried him to Geneva. He made no resistance, and when he reached Geneva was ready to be locked up or otherwise disposed of as his captors might think proper. He presumed that they were acting under Lincoln law—which has displaced all others—and to resist would be rebellion and tend to anarchy, which, as a loyal Union man, he could not engage in. At length somebody advised these military chaps that they had been too fast in making the arrest, and might get into difficulty. Thus alarmed them—as it naturally would men who had taken the course they had—and they sought to get rid of their prisoner. They gave him an opportunity to run away, but he would not do anything of the kind. If he was a prisoner he would remain so till legally discharged. He would not go home a fugitive from custody or by stealth. These fellows, finding that their prisoner would not escape, resolved to run away from him, which they did. They went with him to a saloon to take a drink before taking him to the guard house of the camp, while he was there they skedaddled. The prisoner made diligent inquiry for his custodians, and remained on the spot where they left him until he became satisfied that they had given him the slip, and then he returned by cars to Canandaigua.

American citizens of the State of New York must hear the Executive of this great State denounced as a traitor and threatened with death by the friends of the National Administration, but if a friend of the Governor, elected by a majority of the people of the State, only a year ago, ventures to express an opinion adverse to the policy and some of the acts of the President, he is liable to summary arrest and punishment without the benefit of trial by jury or the habeas corpus. Is not this humiliating, and is there a people anywhere but in this country, who would submit to this humiliation? The fact that our people will bear such indignities—such oppression and injustice—proves that they are capable of self-government, and ought to make every man contend still more for the preservation of the Union and the Republican form of government under our Constitution as it is.—Sept. 1863.

THE PRISONERS AT FORT LAFAYETTE.

THE DOCTRINE OF NON-INTERCOURSE.

Lieutenant-Colonel Burke, the efficient commandant of Forts Hamilton and Lafayette, thoroughly understands his duties respecting the strict guardianship of the rebels and traitors under his charge. A day or two since a gentleman of this city went down to Fort Hamilton with a note from an official source, asking the Colonel "if his duties would permit" to allow the bearer to visit Mr. ——, one of the most distinguished guests of the nation at Fort Lafayette.

The Colonel knew his visitor to be as loyal as need be, read the note, and then said:

"My dear sir, I would give twenty dollars to see Mr. —— myself. He was formerly an old and esteemed friend of mine, and I should be delighted to pass an hour with him; but my official position and my orders forbid such an interview. The only communication I have had with him has been through one of my officers. Only yesterday his sister came here with a priest and begged permission to see him. The family is Catholic, and I am a Catholic myself, but I was obliged to refuse their application. No one, except the proper officer in charge, can have any intercourse with my prisoners.

Just then the mail from the city was brought into Colonel Burke's office. There were twenty or thirty letters addressed to the prisoners. Colonel Burke looked them over and picked out one. "There is a letter for Mr.——, and I know the hand which addresses it; the letter is from his sister, but I cannot send it in to him. As you know the family, you may open and read it. I shall be obliged to; as I open all letters which come to or from the prisoners. Their family letters I glance at, and if there is anything important to communicate, the purport of the letter is sent to the person to whom it is addressed. My orders with regard to the prisoners are very strict, and I obey them."

"May I leave my card for Mr. ——?" said the visitor. "Certainly, you may write him a note, if you wish. The visitor wrote a note, merely stating that he had called, &c., and Colonel Burke sent it by a sergeant.

"It must be very much like state prison over there." "Oh, no," said the Colonel, "the prisoners have nothing to do, plenty to eat, plenty of air and exercise. They have the run of the fort at proper hours. Do you see that man leaning against the doorway?" "Yes." "Well, let me get the glass, I think that is Mr. ——." He looked, handed the glass to the visitor, and it was Mr. ——. The visitor returned to the city, with the following consolation from the Colonel: "Well, you came down to see Mr. —— and you have seen him." And the Colonel bade his visitor a courteous farewell.—Evening Post, September, 1861.

A GOOD DEAL DEPENDS ON YOUR COLOR.

In the Senate of the United States a few days ago, Mr. Saulsbury, of Delaware, a Democrat, offered a resolution, calling on the Secretary of War to inform the Senate whether Dr. John Lane and Mr. Meredith (white men) citizens of Delaware, had been arrested and imprisoned, what charges were made against them, and all the papers relating to their arrest, &c.

This resolution was "LAID OVER," which means it was REJECTED.

On the same day, Mr. Sumner, of Massachusetts, a Republican, offered a resolution that the Secretary of War be requested to furnish the Senate with any information which he might possess with reference to the sale into slavery of freemen (black men) captured or seized by the rebel forces, and state what steps have been taken to redress this outrage on human rights. This resolution was adopted.—Dec. 16, 1862, Hartford Times.

LIVING IN FORT LAFAYETTE.

Rats are abundant in Fort Lafayette. It is stated that as the unfortunate prisoners lie in their uncomfortable cribs, at night, they are literally covered with the disgusting vermin. One case is reported, in which the unhappy occupant of one of the cells was aroused by a nightmare, to find six of them revelling upon his breast, and of another who felt something nibbling at his pedal extremities, and, immediately kicking a rat was thrown to the ceiling, and fell with a thud to the floor. This is a part of the punishment inflicted by a paternal government upon those who incur its suspicion or the enmity of its subordinates, not a single prisoner of that fortress has been confronted by his accuser, or tried by his peers. Many have languished there al most from the beginning of the war.—Boston Courier.

THE PRESIDENT AND LIBERTY.—The Evening Post favors the country with the following astounding piece of intelligence, which the "order" of Mr. STANTON, this day published, partially confirms:

"The President is fully convinced that the sense of the country is overwhelmingly against anything savoring of tyranny or of a military despotism."

Is he, indeed! After eighty years of American liberty and independence, a lawyer from Illinois, elevated to the chair of WASHINGTON, has actually learned that "the sense of the country" favors freedom, and is not altogether indifferent to justice and the laws! Had an enemy put this scorn upon us it had been easier to bear. But that an American journal should thus, in the language of a court flunkey, record the shame of the land, is almost too much for mortal patience.

Quite too much for mortal patience, a trial beyond all imagined for JOB, is the same journal's explanation of the process through which this light has reached the presidential mind:

"Some of the arrests made have been unnecessary and unjust, and the Administration has suffered for its mistakes."

The "Administration has suffered," mark you—not the American citizens "unnecessarily and unjustly arrested;" not American liberty indecently outraged; not the American name made a laughing stock and scandal of the world, but the "Administration!" The temporary servants of the people have been made to tremble for their wages; the intriguers of party for the success of their schemes.

Can the force of bland unconscious baseness further go?—World, Nov. 24, 1862.

The growth of this monstrous system of despotic power in America has astonished the world. To the disgrace of the American name, Mr. Seward, Secretary of State, boasted to a foreign minister, an Englishman, that he had but to touch his little bell and arrest a man in any part of America. This boast, from an American to an Englishman, will live in history as an evidence of the debasement to which radicalism can bring a people once proud and strong in throwing off a British yoke to establish free institutions.

We have given the faintest outline of the history of despotism in America. The particulars of hundreds of cases might be given, showing the atrocity of the whole system, men were often called from their beds in the middle of the night, to the front door, dragged into carriages, and taken away, without being allowed to communicate with wife or children, leaving their families in total ignorance of their fate.

During all these years the courts were open, and justice might have been administered according to the Constitution. There was no possible excuse for substituting the will of the President for the arm of the law. However guilty a man was, he could and should have been dealt with according to the Constitution and laws of his land. The fact that of these thousands of men seized and imprisoned, no one was ever indicted, no one ever confronted with the witnesses against him, no one ever tried by a jury, this fact abundantly shows the innocence of the suffers, and the gross violence done the Constitution by one who had sworn to support it. But lest our opinion be called partisan, we quote the letter of a distinguished jurist of New York, a Republican in politics, with which we conclude this tract:

LETTER OF A REPUBLICAN JUDGE.

LETTER FROM JUDGE GOULD, OF NEW YORK.

The letter following sufficiently explains itself. It was sent to the President two days after its date by a friend of his, who afforded the first opportunity that could be relied on to insure the delivery to the President in person, and it was so delivered. It was read, and a verbal reply that the case would be investigated was given. But no pretence was made that the cause for the arrest was not correctly stated in my letter.

Though the claim to "investigate" by means of an arbitrary arrest, personal duress, and whatever secret appliances a Cabinet inquisition might see fit to resort to, was reasserting the right so to arrest for such causes, and thus was a claim as utterly at variance with all law, as would have been the similar arrest of a man who (in New York) had picked the Secretary's pocket, still steps were taken to present the case again to the President and the Secretary, through their personal and political friends (and they in high position), in the hope of obtaining redress without publicity.

But as up to this time (after nearly three weeks) nothing has resulted, except an infamously rigorous imprisonment of Mr. Tracy, forbearance has reached its limit. It is highly important that the people should thus and now have a specific statement, showing the enormity of actual oppression exercised in this case, as a warning to them and to the Administration.

Yours, &c., GEO. GOULD.

TROY, N. Y., Dec. 4th, 1862.

JUDGE GOULD TO MR. LINCOLN.

NEW YORK, Nov. 14th, 1862.

To his Excellency ABRAHAM LINCOLN, President of the United States:

SIR:—On my arrival in this city, from my residence in Troy, N. Y., I find that a cousin of mine, G. Golden Tracy, a broker of this city, has been, first, arrested and sent to Fort Lafayette; and secondly, to-day taken as a prisoner to Washington. The newspapers say—and so far as I can learn by all inquiries of authorities, I can hear nothing different—that the cause of the arrest is some dealings he had had in contractors' drafts on government officers for moneys; and, it is said, some frauds were committed in or by the drafts, and he is charged with complicity therewith.

If this be so, it is a crime cognizable by the courts, and only by the courts. And I am amazed at the fatuity of public officers who can take no warning from the distinctly uttered voice of a free people.

I am, and always have been, an unwavering enemy of this rebellion—(cursed in its origin, most accursed in its progress)—and a supporter of the Administration. I am a judge of the highest court of this State. And if no honest voice has yet reached the ears of our Government, I wish to say, and to be heard in saying, that Star Chamber process and Secretary's warrants are dangerous instruments to play with, and that, among us, the true, staunch supporters of the Government, who would crush treason with the iron heel, but who know the law, are compelled to hang their heads in silence at the mention of cases which have occurred in our midst.

Spies are hardly cautioned when they are where they can do infinite harm; but a powerful hand, and an oppressive one, is laid on a person here, who is not in a position for doing mischief if he would, and who is supposed to have no friends.

In this respect, I thank God, there has been a mistake. It is true that he is a young man, of not much means or influence; it is also true that he has a young wife (married not long since); and for no assigned cause, and for no assignable cause that those in power dare to give breath to, he is taken away from home, without giving to his wife an instant's interview or a chance to see him. Is this country the France of a century ago?

The young man is the grandson of that Uriah Tracy, who lived and died a Senator of the United States from Connecticut, who was the first man buried in the Congressional burying ground at Washington, and whose ashes are insulted by this atrocious invasion of the liberties of the people in the person of his descendant.

I am not speaking merely my own opinion of such arrests. I know the opinions and the feelings of many of my brethren of the bench. And if the Government is desirous of so proceeding as to make it our duty to make public our opinions, they will be heard, not merely in the writ of habeas corpus, but in open declaration to the world.

Had I been a few hours earlier made aware of this case, I should not have troubled you with a word; but I would have seen that the process of the Supreme Court of this State was so executed as to protect is citizens accused of such offences from arrest, other than under the appropriate process of the court.

I beg again to assure you, in all sincerity, that this kind of proceeding has gone too far already, and, that, while to the last of our men and our means we are ready and determined to sustain the law and the Government in enforcing the law over this whole land as one country, we are also determined to be judged by the law, and not by any Secretary or any one who is not commissioned for that purpose. We know and acknowledge the rules of war, where the necessity of the case requires the existence of martial law. But we know, also, the common law of liberty, and the broad, great charter of the Constitution.

I write warmly, zealously, because I cannot bear to think of our cherished government's taking any course to injure itself; at a time, too, when our only hope of escaping the eternal disgrace and humiliation of letting the cause of human liberty perish in our hands, is to sustain this government of this Union, and to have it a government worth sustaining. With great respect, yours, &c.

Camp near Harrison's Landing, Va., July 7, 1862.

MR. PRESIDENT: You have been fully informed that ie rebel army is in our front, with the purpose of verwhelming us by attacking our positions, or re-ucing us by blockading our river communications. cannot but regard our condition as critical, and I rnestly desire, in view of possible contingencies, to r before your Excellency, for your private considera-n, my general views concerning the existing state the rebellion, although they do not strictly relate the situation of this army, or strictly come within ope of my official duties. These views amount to nvictions, and are deeply impressed upon my mind d heart. Our cause must never be abandoned; it the cause of free institutions and self-government. ie Constitution and the Union must be preserved; ntever may be the cost in time, treasure or blood. secession is successful, other dissolutions are clear-to be seen in the future. Let neither military aster, political faction, or foreign war, shake your ttled purpose to enforce the equal operation of the ws of the United States upon the people of every ate.

The time has come when the government must de-rmine upon a civil and military policy covering the vole ground of our national trouble. The responsi-ity of determining, declaring, and supporting such il and military policy, and of directing the whole rse of national affairs in regard to the rebellion ist now be assumed and exercised by you, or our ne will be lost. The Constitution gives you power fficient even for the present terrible exigency.

This rebellion has assumed the character of war; as ch it should be regarded; and it should be con-cted upon the highest principles known to Chris-n civilization. It should not be a war looking to subjugation of the people of any State in any ent. It should not be at all a war upon population, t against armed forces and political organizations. either confiscation of property, political executions persons, territorial organizations of States, or forci-abolition of slavery should be contemplated for a oment. In prosecuting the war, all private proper-and unarmed persons should be strictly protected, bject only to the necessity of military operations l private property taken for military use should be id or receipted for; pillage and waste should be ated as high crimes; all unnecessary trespass stern-prohibited, and offensive demeanor by the military wards citizens promptly rebuked. Military arrests ould not be tolerated, except in places where active stilities exist, and oaths not required by enactments nstitutionally made, should be neither demanded r received. Military government should be con-fined to the preservation of public order and the protection of political rights. Military power should not be allowed to interfere with the relations of servitude, either by supporting or impairing the authority of the master, except for suppressing disorder, as in other cases. Slaves contraband under the act of Congress, seeking military protection, should receive it. The right of the government to appropriate permanently to its own service, claims to slave labor, should be asserted, and the right of the owner to compensation therefor should be recognized.

This principle might be extended, upon grounds of military necessity and security, to all the slaves within a particular State, thus working manumission in such State; and in Missouri, perhaps in Western Virginia also, and possibly even in Maryland, the expediency of such a measure is only a question of time.

A system of policy thus constitutional and conservative, and pervaded by the influences of Christianity and freedom, would receive the support of almost all truly loyal men, would deeply impress the rebel masses and all foreign nations, and it might be humbly hoped that it would commend itself to the favor of the Almighty.

Unless the principles governing the future conduct of our struggle shall be made known and approved, the effort to obtain requisite forces will be almost hopeless. A declaration of radical views, especially upon slavery, will rapidly disintegrate our present armies.

The policy of the government must be supported by concentration of military power. The national forces should not be dispersed in expeditions, posts of occupation and numerous armies, but should be mainly collected into masses, and brought to bear upon the armies of the Confederate States. Those armies thoroughly defeated, the political structure which they support will soon cease to exist.

In carrying out any system of policy which you may form, you will require a commander-in-chief of the army; one who possesses your confidence, understands your views, and who is competent to execute your orders by directing the military forces of the nation to the accomplishment of the objects by you proposed. I do not ask that place for myself. I am willing to serve you in such position as you may assign me, and I will do so as faithfully as ever subordinate served superior.

I may be on the brink of eternity, and as I hope for forgiveness from my Maker, I have written this letter with sincerity towards you and from love of my country.

Very respectfully,
Your obedient servant,
G. B. McCLELLAN,
Major-General Commanding.

SPEECH OF HON. JAMES GUTHRIE.

ADDRESS DELIVERED AT NEW ALBANY, IND., SEPTEMBER 15—THE MEANING OF THE CHICAGO PLATFORM—PEACE ON THE BASIS OF THE UNION.

FELLOW CITIZENS OF INDIANA: Kentucky bids you God speed in this great work of saving the nation. I have been in Chicago. I know the platform there adopted by the assembled Democracy. I assisted in making it. I know what it means. It means peace. It means peace upon the basis of the reëstablishment of the Union in all its integrity. Who would give up the mouth of the Mississippi and the grave of Jackson for a peace which divided this Union? Who would give up the glorious Constitution of our fathers for a peace which separates this great Republic? Not the Democratic and conservative masses now arrayed under the standard of that hero-statesman, George B. McClellan. No, fellow citizens; it is another party which would thus disrupt this nation if its hideous dogmas of abolitionism are not accepted by the people of the South. The Chicago platform, and the letter of acceptance of McClellan, mean that the President of the United States, and every official of the Government, either in the civil or military department, shall be as obedient to the Constitution as the humblest citizen or soldier. It is a peace platform on the basis of the Union, the Constitution, and the laws. Who dares be against such a platform? Who dares say we shall not have peace upon the basis of the integrity of the Federal Union? If the South is against such a peace; if she refuses to accept the offer of such a peace; if a frank, earnest, and persistent effort to obtain these objects should fail, then the responsibility for ulterior consequences will fall upon those who remain in arms against the Union. But the Union must be preserved at all hazards. Such is the construction of this Chicago platform, as given by General McClellan, the nominee of the convention. Such is the construction I place upon it. Such is the construction placed upon it by the Democratic and conservative masses of the country. We will never give up the mouth of the Mississippi for Jeff. Davis and all his crew. I know him well. The South are for peace. Offer them peace upon this basis, and they will take it—yes, take it with joy, and return to their allegiance. It is the principle of the Constitution that the majority shall rule. It is not for one man to say that we shall or that we shall not have peace. Who is it that reverses this principle of the Constitution, and says that the majority shall not rule? Abraham Lincoln and his party; he who denied the people the right of free speech and the liberty of the press. This is the first time since Abraham Lincoln was elected—the first time since he violated the Chicago platform of 1860—since he violated the laws of Congress—since he violated the Constitution—that the Democratic party has had a chance to speak. And now it will speak until it saves this great republic—this precious Constitution. It will speak at the ballot box, the great and sacred forum from which every American citizen may speak with power. I have a right, as a Kentuckian, to speak of Jeff. Davis and Abraham Lincoln. They were both born in Kentucky, and both have disgraced that noble commonwealth, and her principles of equal rights and just laws. Both of them take men against their wills to fight their battles. Lincoln is doing this now—forcing men to fight for the abolition of slavery, not for the restoration of the Union—sending men into your houses with bayonets, to hold in awe peaceable, loyal citizens. He has to-day scattered throughout the loyal States of the North soldiers enough to subjugate Jeff. Davis's confederacy, to dominate over a free people. I am for peace—for a peace which will give us back the old Union under the Constitution. I was a member of the Peace Congress in 1861. that congress I was for peace, concession, and r newed guarantees to all the States. I believed the as now, that the great waste of precious blood whi has taken place would not restore the Union. I ask that the seven border free and the seven border sla States might propose a basis for the settlement of difficulties. They could have proposed such a basis would have been a full, final, honorable, and satisfa tory settlement. But the radicals in that Congre would not consent to it. Neither the abolitionists the North, nor the secessionists of the South, won consent to it. They would have nothing but bloo Well, have we not had blood to the heart's content the nation? Even the preachers have preached wi and desolation, and blood; the temples of the me and lowly Jesus have been made the temples fro which war, and rapine, and blood has been preache by ministers with hands dripping in blood. Th must be ended. We will hold out the olive bran like a great, and magnanimous, and powerful peop We will offer to the South their rights in the Uni under the Constitution. We will guarantee the rights, and dispose of conflicting and vexatious que tions, so that never again will the toosin of war sounded which shall arm father against son, a brother against brother. We have a noble leader inaugurate this work of the regeneration of a nati George B. McClellan is a young man—but thirty-eig years old; but he is a good man. He is a statesma an able general, a great commander, a Christian ge tleman. It is by his nobleness of heart that he has tached his soldiers to him, so that they regard hi as a father, rather than as an austere command He is the soldiers' friend. Such is the noble McCl lan, the standard-bearer of the Democratic party. will, no doubt, get the votes of the soldiers and honest Democrats and conservatives; but he will n get the votes of the shoddy contractors and those w are making mints of money off of the adversities their country. I need not tell you to-day, my fello citizens, how we have suffered in Kentucky under t iron rule of this weak, vacillating, and tyrannic A ministration. Our desolated fields—the blood of o sons—the destruction of our property—the almost t tal suspension of our trade, are known throughout t land. If a citizen dares to utter complaint again this wholesale outrage and violation of rights, he spotted by the myrmidons of power, and is incarce ated in the dungeons of the felon. What agonies w told the people of Kentucky have suffered, remain be told by the future historian, when he comes write out the history of this terrible rebellion. B this tyrannic policy of the party in power has be reviewed in our resolutions at Chicago. We will no put a great and a good man into the Presidenti chair, a man who, had he been sustained with t power that Grant has been sustained, would ha given the country peace two years ago. There is upheaving of the masses, and I believe we would less than American citizens if we did not make effort to change the present state of affairs in t country. The ballot box is the great weapon of t American people. It is the weapon of peace. To let us appeal for a redress of grievances. But the da might come when the effort may be made to stifle th voice of the people at the ballot box. Then I will n to-day say what the people should do. I couns united zeal and exertion for the cause of the count and liberty. All the people must work to the sam end. You have only till November to work. Be ea nest, then, and zealous. I speak to you thus, becau I believe that upon the result of this election is su pended the fate of the American republic. Ever man to his post—every man to his duty; then all wi be well, and peace and happiness will be again re stored to the country.

:ON. JOHN VAN BUREN FOR McCLELLAN—HIS LETTER TO THE GREAT MASS MEETING AT ALBANY.

Gentlemen: It will not be in my power to attend e meeting at Albany on Wednesday, but I hope bee the campaign closes to have the privilege of ad-ssing my old friends at the capital. Without un-rtaking to dictate to others, I had marked out a rse which it seemed to me the part of patriotism pursue. While war was raging, and no presidenl canvass was pending, I endeavored to give to the ad of the Government, a cordial and unreserved pport. I should have preferred to continue so doing the 4th of March, when the official term of our ief magistrate closes. But the President precludes s course by stepping into the arena, before any can-date is nominated against him, and demanding, rough his office-holders and friends, a re-election.
does this against the protest of a respectable body his former supporters, who present for the offices President and Vice-President the former Republicandidate for President, and the present Republi-attorney-general of this State. The representa-es of the Democratic party, with wise forbearance, d deferred the nomination of candidates until the of July, some two months later than the usual ne, and afterwards, in conjunction with conservative n of other parties, had again postponed the com-encement of the canvass until the end of August, as leaving barely time for the delegates from distant ates, like California and Oregon, to attend the con-ntion and return home to participate in the elec-
n. Under such circumstances the name of General cClellan, a tried and able soldier, a cultivated and complished gentleman, and a thorough patriot, s been presented in opposition to his own shes for the chief magistracy. A contest thus allenged by the President, and deferred till the test moment by his opponents, is now before us, and is important at the outset to bear in mind how it iginated. Although short in duration, it is likely be severe beyond all previous example. The enor-ous patronage of the Government will be used with-t reserve to perpetuate power in the hands that now old it. A trained band of office-holders constitute effective political organization. Executive conraint of the press, the mail, and the telegraph, puts e means of communication to a vast extent in the ower of the President. Against this formidable mbination, an undisciplined mass of men is to contend. But I have no apprehensions as to the result. Much association with the American people and hourly observation of their intelligence, courage, and sagacity, inspire me with entire faith as to their action now.

They will, as heretofore, pour forth their blood and treasure without stint to put down the rebellion. They will hold up the hands and strengthen the hearts of those gallant soldiers, Grant, Sherman, Meade, Hancock, Smith, Blair, Granger, Thomas, Rosecrans, Sheridan, Kilpatrick, Stoneman, Averill, and their associates; and those enterprising sailors, Farragut, Porter, Winslow, Dupont, Worden, Drayton, and others. They will, thus, I trust, overthrow the organized and armed resistance of the rebel States, despite of all the obstacles to success that have been or may be interposed at Washington. But the discharge of those sacred duties will not interfere with the careful and intelligent selection of a new chief magistrate, who is not only competent to make war but able to make peace.

There are two men who obviously can never make a peace that will receive the sanction of the American people. They are Abraham Lincoln and Jefferson Davis. The former has declared the abolition of slavery an indispensable preliminary to a proposition for peace. The latter avows that the confederate States accept no alternative but independence or annihilation. With the former we have to deal at this election. The latter must be left to the fortunes of war, or the fate that the rebel States have in store for him. But unless we are prepared for an eternal war, and the slaughter, debt, taxation and the suspension of the Constitutional liberty that attends it, Abraham Lincoln must be made to retire on the 4th of March next, and a President must be chosen in his stead who will consent to peace on the basis of the Union and the Constitution. Such a man is General McClellan, and I cannot allow myself to doubt that the loyal people of the United States will call him to the discharge of this, as well as all the other grave duties that belong to the chief magistracy. The overthrow of Davis and his associates at Richmond, will soon follow, and peace once more smile on our distracted country.

Truly yours,

J. Van Buren.

:HE SOUTHERN LEADERS WANT LINCOLN RE-ELECTED.

[From the Richmond Enquirer, September 5th.]

The Democratic nominees in the United States re McClellan for President and Pendleton for Vice-President. What concern have the people of hese Confederate States in the fate of these canlidates at the approaching election? In our opinon, the interest and hope of peace is not greatly dvanced by these nominations. From General cClellan our people can have but little hope of eace, other than a reconstruction peace. * * *
What hope do his antecedents hold out that should ncourage our people to believe that he would rield our nationality any sooner than Mr. Lincoln?
He is by far the more dangerous man for us; had his policy been persistently followed, and the war conducted on the principles of civilized warfare, he might have divided our people and, perhaps, conquered our liberties. With consummate abilities, he clearly foresaw that emancipation might possibly free the negroes, but could not unite the sections; that confiscation might enrich his soldiers, but could not reconcile our people; hence, with an earnest and honest love for the Union, he avoided those fatal acts, and conducted the war for the restoration of the Union, rather than the destruction of the South. His policy was the olive branch in one hand and the sword in the other, to conquer by power and conciliate by kindness. It was a most dangerous policy for us; for if the ameliorating hand of Federal kindness had softened the rigors of war, our people would not have been subjected to those terrible fires of suffering by which Mr. Lincoln has hardened every heart and steeled every sentiment against our merciless foes. As a sincere secessionist, preferring war and nationality to peace and the Union, we looked upon the fact of a difference between Mr. Lincoln and General McClellan as to the proper policy of conducting the war, as peculiarly fortunate for our cause. We hailed the proclamations of emancipation and confiscation, and the policy of plunder and devastation as sure pledges of our ultimate triumph; they were terrible ordeals, but they most effectually eradicated every sentiment of Union, and arousing the pride as well as the interest of our people, inflamed the patriotism of the whole, until they would have accepted death as preferable to ultimate defeat.

Now, between McClellan and Lincoln there are many points of difference—the former is a man of talents, of information, of firmness and great military experience and ability—the latter is a supple, pliant, easy fool, a good but vulgar joker.

While McClellan has the interest of the Union only at heart, Mr. Lincoln has the fanatical object of freeing negroes for his inspiration. Between "my plan," as General Grant has conducted it, and one by General McClellan, there could not have been the same success that has already attended our arms, for we lost more men fighting the science of McClellan on the Peninsula than we have in repelling the furious but ill-conducted assaults of General Grant.

THUS, WHETHER WE LOOK AT THIS NOMINATION IN THE LIGHT OF PEACE OR WAR, WE PREFER LINCOLN TO MCCLELLAN. We can make better terms of peace with an anti-slavery fanatic than with an earnest Unionist. We can gain more military success in a war conducted on "my plan" than one of a real soldier like McClellan, and sooner destroy the resources and strength of our enemy where they are managed and manipulated by the light-fingered gentry of Messrs. Chase and Fessenden, than when husbanded and skilfully controlled by such a man as Guthrie. Our best hope is from the honest fanatics of the United States, men who believe in their hearts that slavery is the "sum of all villanies," and who really and sincerely believe it to be their duty to separate their country from this "relic of barbarism." Such men, when they find that their people are tired of the war, will end it by a peace that sacrifices territory to freedom, and will let the South "go," provided she carries slavery with her. These men believe no less that the just powers of government are derived from the consent of the governed, than "that all men are created free and equal." The two postulates are of like importance to an abolitionist.

Both the Abolitionist and the Democrat is our enemy—the one, because we have slaves, the other, because we are disunionists. Nor does their enmity differ in degree; they both hate us most intense The Chicago platform is that "peace may be restor on the basis of the Federal Union of the States"—t is: reconstruction of the Union as it was—with sl ery protected by nominal laws, but warred upon by real sentiment, aggravated and embittered by the w The reconstructed Union of the Chicago platfo would be the certain destruction—first, of slavery, a next of slaveholders. With Lincoln and the Ba more platform, we of the Confederate States kn where we are—outside of the pale of mercy, devot to ruin and destruction, with no hope save in t justice and protection of God, and the courage a manliness of our soldiers and people. With swor and muskets and cannon we fight Lincoln, and t past affords no reasons of apprehension of the futu But in the reconstructed Union of the Chicago pl form, we would be deprived of our weapons witho being reconciled to our foes.

There is no question that between the two m General McClellan enjoys far more of the respect the people of these States than Lincoln, and t Democratic party far more of our confidence than t Republican, and that if reconstruction were possible would be more probable under General McClellan a the Democracy than under Lincoln and the Republican The Northwest inspires one, and New England t other; but as long as New England imposes the do mas of her civilization, and the tenets of her fanat cism upon the mind and people of the Northwes there may be peace and separation, but there neve can be union and harmony. If the Northwest desir the restoration of the Union, let its people shake o the bondage of New England, and show to the wor that a new era of toleration and fraternal kindness h risen in the place of fanatical Puritanism and selfi ostracism.

LETTER FROM THE HON. REVERDY JOHNSON, of Maryland

SARATOGA SPRINGS, Sept. 16, 1864.

GENTLEMEN: Your invitation to the meeting to-morrow, of the Democratic and conservative organizations of your city (just received in this place), to ratify the recent Chicago nominations, I would cheerfully accept, if it was in my power.

In the early days of Mr. Lincoln's administration, I lost almost all hope of a successful termination of the rebellion, whilst he was at the head of the government, and this, the merest hope, is now wholly extinguished. His infirmity of purpose, his unsteadiness in any policy, his once expressed dislike to radicalism—his subsequent adoption of its worst features—his ignorant and mischievous interference with our military campaigns—his appointment, often against advice, of high military officers of notorious incompetency—his frequent and nearly fatal changes of commanders, his abandonment of the, before, uniform practice of his predecessors of cabinet consultations, his permission of dishonoring dissensions among its members, displaying itself constantly, to his knowledge, before others, and often, as it is known, in his presence, in personal abuse of each other; his obstinate and reckless disregard of the wishes of his political friends, communicated to him on one occasion in the solemn form of a committee, representing, as he was aware, nine-tenths, if not every friend he had in Congress; and again, and recently, expressed in terms not to be mistaken, in one of the resolutions of the convention which nominated him for reelection; his permitting military interference with elections, virtually subjecting the ballot to the control of the bayonet; his justifying arrests without specifications of charges, though over and over again demanded, and long-continued imprisonment: and, after release, without trial or explanation, his tolerating trial, by military commission, of offences made cognizable exclusively by acts of Congress passed since the rebellion, by the civil courts, and the virtual confiscation of private property, without even a resort to any mode of trial, and other matters of like illegality and outrage, too many to detail in a letter, whilst they demonstrate his utter unfitness for the Presidency, give no promise of a successful result of the contest whilst he is the commander-in-chief of the army and navy, and intrusted, by the power he wields, with the shaping of et peace and war policy. This must be arrested, or, in my opinion, the country will be ruined.

This fatal career can be and would be stopped by th election of almost any loyal man in his stead, and the re sult is certain if Gen. McClellan becomes the successor His perfect devotion to the Union and his expressed de termination to make its restoration the "one condition o peace"—the purity of his character, his demonstrate ability, and his military attainments—furnish guarantees that in his hands the executive power will not be abused but be directed, in strict subordination to the Constitu tion, to the sole end of restoring the Union, which is our inheritance, and causing it again to shed its blessings over a now sorely troubled and bleeding nation. Wild, insane, and reckless partisans may assail him with every opprobrious epithet—men who have tasted of that insane root, the obtaining of high office at home or abroad, may tell us, to the disgust of all patriotic men, that "it is not too much to say, 'that it would be far better that Robert E. Lee should enter Washington at the head of his army, as its conqueror, than that George B. McClellan should enter it as President.'" A ludicrously inconsistent and even illogical premier, the half of whose official papers and speeches answer the other half, may threaten treachery on the part of the Administration, on the happening of Mr. Lincoln's defeat in November, by declaring himself unable in that contingency to "vouch for the safety of the country against the rebels during the interval which must elapse before the new Administration can constitutionally come into power," and the canvass may be continued as, with some honorable exceptions, it has begun, by the billingsgate abuse and calumnious charges against our candidates and their friends; yet, from all these causes we have nothing to fear. Success is in our hands, if we are true to duty. Under the protection of Divine Providence we can achieve for our country a victory, greater in its results than any present military success. We can elect McClellan and Pendleton in spite of office holders, contractors, and administrative influence and power; and that done, in a short time thereafter State after State will be found returning to allegiance, until, at a date not remote, the Union will be restored, fraternal affections revived, and peace, and plenty, and happiness, and national character and power be substituted for division, hatred, war, destitution, wretchedness, national dishonor and comparative weakness. With regard, your obedient servant,

REVERDY JOHNSON.

THE TWO
Letters of Gen. H. M. Naglee about Gen. McClellan.

PHILADELPHIA, Sept. 27, 1864.

MY DEAR SIR: Our acquaintance, and all of he relations that have ever existed between s, are confined to two or three accidental meet-gs, at one of which you were pleased to refer the lasting impression made upon you, when poor boy, by the kindness of my father, who ways took you by the hand, and gave you neering, friendly words of encouragement and dvice. You were pleased to acknowledge to he son the kind and valuable influences re-eived by you from the father, and to proffer our friendly services whenever they would be eceptable.

Under the above circumstances you prepared r me and my friends no ordinary surprise hen you deliberately composed, delivered and ublished in the Press of the 23d inst., a volun-ary, unprovoked attack upon me, in the follow-g words:

It got out that the President was determined to ave the army moved, and it was found that General cClellan had no plan; and here I may state that e owe the Peninsular campaign to those distinguished enators, Latham, of California, and Rice, of Minne-ota, and a brigadier in the column of Joseph Hook-r. General McClellan's plan was concocted by thers and put into his hands. It was agreed on in council of war. That plan was submitted to the resident. It was submitted in the presence of Sec-etary Stanton. Stanton put them through a strict ourse of examination. One general (Blenker) owned hat he did not understand the plan, but would sus-ain it, as he thought he had to obey the mandates of is chief. General Naglee was one of those present, nd Stanton observed that he had but one star. Sir," said Mr. Stanton, "you have no right here." I am representing General Hooker," said he. It as afterwards found out that General Naglee was bsent without leave, and that fighting Joe Hooker new nothing of the council." (Applause.)

Now, my dear sir, this statement is simply alse, and on the part of your friend, Mr. Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War, maliciously false. The Peninsular campaign was not indicated y "Senators Latham, of California, and Rice, f Minnesota, and a brigadier in the column of oseph Hooker," as asserted by you. General Naglee was at Washington with proper leave, nd with the full knowledge of General Hooker, nd was a member of the council of war by irection of General McClellan, to represent he division of the army at Budd's ferry, in the bsence of General Hooker, who was too far emoved from Washington to be present. And nfortunately for the veracity of Mr. Stanton, he impertinent remarks which you ascribe to im could not have been made, for there were o officers of the council of war entitled, at hat time, to more than one star.

Now, Judge, you knew, or should know, that the reputation of Mr. Stanton for truth and veracity is not above suspicion, and that you may well believe anything that may be said regarding his great incivility and rudeness, for not excepting yourself, I have never seen or heard of an officer or civilian who did not condemn him for the utter want of all of the requisites of a gentleman.

This is not the first time Mr. Stanton has been guilty of the most deliberate, malicious misrepresentation, and for your gratification I will relate an instance that occurred upon my arrival in Washington, immediately after the conclusion of "the seven days' fight," in the beginning of July of 1862, and when I was surprised to learn that during the continuance of that desperate struggle, and during the time of dreadful suspense, whilst nothing could be heard of General McClellan and his gallant army, Mr. Stanton had everywhere denounced General McClellan as a traitor to his country, and as incapable of commanding a regiment. I learned this from a number of the members of Congress, who were astonished and confounded, and who, with pain, eagerly sought from me some explanation of such extraordinary conduct. I could render them no satisfaction, but reported the circumstances to General McClellan upon my arrival at his headquarters on the following day, the 8th of July. His surprise, Judge, was greater than mine; without uttering a word, he turned to his portfolio, took from it a letter, which he placed before me, and said: "Read that; I have just received it from Mr. Stanton."

With his consent I made a copy of the letter, and returning to Washington, placed it in the hands of those who had heard the denunciations of Mr. Stanton, and who had advised me of them. They desired to read it to the Senate, and to publish the outrage and the vindication, and they telegraphed to General McClellan for his permission, which he declined to give them. The following is a copy of the letter:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON, D. C., July 5, 1862.

DEAR GENERAL:—I had a talk with General Marcy, and meant to have written you by him, but am called to the country, where Mrs. Stanton is with her children, to see one of them die. I can, therefore, only say, my dear General, in this brief moment, that there is no cause in my heart or conduct for the cloud that wicked men have raised between us for their own base and selfish purposes. No man had ever a truer friend than I have been to you, and shall continue to be. You are seldom absent from my thoughts, and I am ready to make any sacrifice to aid you. Time allows me to say no more than that I pray Almighty God to deliver you and your army from all peril, and lead you on to victory.

Yours, truly,

EDWIN M. STANTON.

Now, Judge, what think you of this man, who, made Secretary of War by the request and influence of General McClellan, was vilifying and abusing and uttering falsehoods against him, and who could at the same time sit down and deliberately write such a letter?

You have referred to the council of war held in Washington in March of 1862. Every effort has been made in vain to bring the proceedings of that council before the public. A call was made for them in the House of Representatives and was tabled by the Republican party. A request made by the recorder of that council, of Mr. Stanton, to allow him to have the proceedings made up in proper form, was refused in a most rude and insulting manner, and the papers have never been allowed to leave his possession since.

Now, Judge, for your especial benefit, I will relate the history of that important event, that you may, if you will, do justice to all concerned.

The council of war consisted of Brigadier-Generals Sumner, McDowell, Franklin, F. J. Porter, McCall, Heintzelman, Keyes, A. Porter, W. F. Smith, Barnard, Blenker and Naglee, each entitled to but "one star." It was called together by order of General McClellan on the night of March 7, 1862, to convene at ten A. M. on the following day.

General McClellan came into the council room at the hour appointed, and placing on the table a large map, explained his proposed Peninsular campaign, which, before this time, I believe to have been known to no one present excepting General Franklin and probably Fitz J. Porter. Upon retiring he left upon the table, for the consideration of the council, the following inquiries:

1.—Whether it is advisable that the base of operations shall be changed, the transportation being ready at Annapolis in all of next week?

2.—Whether it is better to make an advance to the front before changing the base, should such a change be determined upon?

3.—Whether a forward movement, with the object of destroying the river batteries, is advisable, and when it can be commenced, and whether the naval force, with the assistance of the Ericsson battery, can alone accomplish that object?

After a session of three hours the council were summoned to appear before the President. He advised them that he was quite unwell and exceedingly nervous; that the pressure had been intense against General McClellan. He expressed himself gratified to have the opportunity to see and know the officers of the army, and to be instructed by them in regard to army matters, which were to him very incomprehensible.

I informed him that, as recorder of the council of war which had held its session by ord of Gen. McClellan, I would advise him of t result of its proceedings, and then read them him. "What, said he, "have the council d cided by a vote of eight to four—two to one in favor of the Peninsular campaign?" then asked many questions in regard to t same, until Mr. Stanton came in, and I pr posed to read the proceedings to him. He r plied, "Give me the papers, I'll read them m self," and, after reading them over and prep ing his notes, he, as you say, "put them (t council) through the strict course of examir tion" which you refer to. This examinati made for the purpose of neutralizing the eff of the decision of the council of war on t mind of the President, and thus carry out t objects of those who had been insisting up the removal of General McClellan, lasted four or five hours, during which time it w only interrupted by an occasional expression the President, indicating his satisfaction a gratification at the many explanations of mi tary movements contemplated, and which had not before been able to comprehend.

It was now getting dark. Mr. Stanto questions indicated approaching exhaustion, a finding there was a silence which called for cessation of hostilities on his part for the nigh Mr. Lincoln expressed himself highly gratifi with the interview, said he was impressed wi the earnestness and intelligence of the offic present, and that he had every confidence them. He was now determined not to remo General McClellan, as he had promised to d but that he should make his campaign, as a proved by the council of war, under restrictio which he would make known on the followi morning, at ten o'clock, when he desired t presence of all the officers of the council, a until after which time he desired that none them should leave the city.

Before leaving the President the recorder the council approached the Secretary and sai —"If you please, Mr. Stanton, permit me have the proceedings of the council of wa that they may be copied in a fair hand, a General Sumner, the president of the counc will sign them, the recorder will sign them, a they will then be in proper form." "I'm ju as good a judge of the form as you are," w the reply of your friend.

Other incivilities have been attempted b Mr. Stanton towards me, the manner and r sult of which he has neither forgotten nor fo given, and which he may relate to you whe ever he may feel so disposed.

On the following morning, at the appointe hour, when all of the officers of the council o war had assembled, Mr. Lincoln said:—"I hav slept better than for two weeks. I feel relieve of an immense responsibility. I have dete mined upon the following programme," whic he submitted verbally, and which was substa tially as follows:—

"I will permit General McClellan to carr

t his campaign. He shall leave sufficient ·ce to defend the works before Washington. e shall embark fifty thousand men from An- polis; and then, unless the batteries on the otomac, which you assure me will necessarily abandoned, are withdrawn or silenced, I shall serve my authority to embark other troops." e then said, "I have determined to divide eneral McClellan's army into four corps, and hall appoint the commanders of them." And terwards he promoted the four officers who id opposed General McClellan's campaign, ree of whom he appointed to the command corps, and, with the exception of Generals anklin and Smith, who have been the subjects constant annoyance and indignities since, the hers have all been dismissed from the army. The Peninsular campaign was proposed by eneral McClellan whilst commander-in-chief the armies of the United States, and was in- nded to be made with the forces then under s command in Eastern Virginia, estimated at er two hundred thousand men. It was so cepted by the President, and the movement as commenced upon that basis. General Mc- llellan had scarcely left Washington to take the eld when the Secretary of War relieved him all the armies not under his (General Mc- llellan's) immediate command, and assumed ommand of them himself. The troops left in ortheastern Virginia were placed under the ommand of McDowell, Banks, Fremont and igel, each being independent of the other, and General McClellan, and all subject to the rder of Mr. Stanton. Whilst the above divi- on of our army was taking place, the Confed- rates concentrated theirs until, on the 26th ay of June, General McClellan found himself efore Richmond with eighty-five thousand nen (including McCall's division), and was ttacked by the concentrated Confederate force f one hundred and seventy-five thousand at he very moment when McDowell, under pro- est, withdrew his assistance from McClellan, y the orders of the President and Secretary of War.

The campaign under General Grant did not ommence until the 4th of May, 1864. That f Chancellorsville, in which the casualties of hat army were estimated at thirty thousand nen, and which, but for the providential kill- ng of Stonewall Jackson, would have been nnihilated, was planned by the President and General Hooker, or to use the President's own words, "by Joe and I," of which the Secretary of War and General Halleck were kept pro- foundly ignorant, and was not commenced until May 2, 1863; whilst that of the Peninsula, for the delay of which General McClellan was so much censured, was commenced on the 25th of March, 1862, forty days in advance of either of the others.

Why this bitter enmity and persecution of General McClellan? why, in the beginning of March, was the President pressed to death to remove him, even before he had made his first trial in command of the Army of the Potomac? Why did a distinguished member of the Senate, on the 17th of March, write to me: "The cry against McClellan is increasing; every effort is being made to crush him." What possible chance had General McClellan to succeed, when his own Government did everything in their power to embarrass his movements and break him down? One would think his task sufficiently onerous, laborious and responsible, when, without experience, after the first disastrous rout at Bull Run, he reorganized the armies of the United States and was preparing to fight them without the additional conviction being forced upon him at every step that his own Government were determined "to crush him."

Judge, you and I met within ten days after the dreadful battles before Richmond. You attacked General McClellan with a bitterness and feeling that ill becomes a Christian gentleman. I then begged you not to break down General McClellan until you had given him a fair trial, and until you had found a better man, and challenged you to name a better general. I now do the same thing, and appeal to the record of the past thirty months, and to the rivers of blood that have flown since, to sustain what I then asserted. I refer you to the opinions of foreign officers, and I assure you that among the old officers of the army I shall be fully sustained.

The preference of General McClellan for the Peninsular campaign, and the condemnation of the President's plan, have been fully sustained. The families and friends of the one hundred and thirty thousand men lost south of the Rapidan since the 4th of May last, proclaim it everywhere. Mr. Stanton told the country at that time, he had a hundred thousand men more than he wanted, and now he tells you he wants a hundred thousand more men.

General Grant crossed the Rapidan with an army variously estimated from 118,000 to	120,000
He afterwards added Butler's . . .	40,000
He was reënforced	45,000
Making, exclusive of Sigel's 30,000, .	205,000

On the 1st of September, our forces were estimated, exclusive of Sheridan's 30,000, at 50,000.

General Lee had on the Rapidan, after he had concentrated his army, .	85,000
Beauregard joined him at Richmond with his forces from the South, which, with those near Petersburg, amounted to	30,000
Breckinridge brought	10,000
And Lee was reënforced, probably, .	30,000
Making, in all, ...	155,000

On the 1st of September, his forces were es timated at Richmond at 45,000, exclusive of Early's command—30,000—showing the discharges and loss from General Grant to be 150,000, and that of Lee to be 85,000.

Judge Kelly, were the records of the council of war, and that of "the strict course of examination" made by Mr. Stanton, indicating the very difficulties and dreadful losses General Grant has lately sustained, ever placed before him? And why not? And who is responsible for the one hundred thousand men unnecessarily and wickedly sacrificed south of the Rapidan, in the experiment made to prove that General McClellan and the council of war were wrong, and that the President's plan was right.

The army of the United States, as you found it at the commencement of this war, was composed of a high-toned, intelligent, honorable, gallant set of men, fully equal to the contest before them. They had always studiously avoided all political connections; many of whom had been thirty years in the service of their country and had never voted. They held their country and the honor and integrity of it before every other consideration. Had a rule been adopted requiring that no political subject should be introduced into the army, but that all political rights should be respected, and had army officers only been held responsible for the conduct of the war, it would have terminated long ago.

Why have McClellan, and Sedgwick, and McPherson, and Bayard, and Franklin, and Buell, and Meade, and Averill, and Porter, and a score of other general officers, with hundreds, if not thousands, of officers of an inferior grade, been offended and held back, and many of them dismissed from the army without a word of explanation—an arbitrary act unknown in Great Britain—while Pope, and Burnside, and Hooker, and Butler, and Hunter, and Banks, and Sigel, and Sickles, and hundreds of others, certainly no better than the former, have been preferred? Why was Gen. Stone, than whom there is not a more loyal man and accomplished gentleman and gallant soldier in the country, confined in prison for fifteen months? And when released by an act of Congress, why was it that neither the President, nor Secretary of War, nor Secretary of State, or other persons at Washington, would assent to any knowledge or any participation in the arrest? Such outrages are calculated to break down the honor and esprit du corps of any army, and all have looked on with disgust and horror and pain at the shameful injustice and outrages that have been continually heaped upon so many of their old friends and comrades in arms, whom they know incapable of an ungentlemanly, dishonorable, unsoldierly, or disloyal act.

Why did the Committee on the Conduct of the War investigate and falsify with such nice precision the conduct of McClellan and his friends, and overlook the volumes of charges filed in the War Department against Fremont, and Sigel, and Hunter, and others, and entirely overlook the immense slaughter at Chancellorsville, and Fredericksburg, and south of the Rapidan? Why did a secret political inquisition, with no other pretext than that they suspected him of political ambition, sit over five hundred days, and manufacture over seventeen hundred pages of ex parte testimony against a young officer, a Christian gentleman, an honest man, who, Heaven only knows, never had but one purpose, and that, to serve his country and his God?

You know, Judge, that while in Washington General McClellan studiously avoided all political association, and to such an extent that many of his friends of both parties were much offended.

The first knowledge that I ever had of any political ambition on his part, was after he had been retired from active service and sent in disgrace to New Jersey; and this was after his fitness for the succession had been discovered by Mr. Lincoln, and the people had signified their affection for him. His letters and orders have been called political; but they were eminently proper, and refer entirely to the military policy of the country. But, Judge, suppose we admit that General McClellan had an ambition to be President of the United States was it not a laudable ambition, and is there any impropriety in it? Is the field not open to him as well as to Mr. Lincoln, or Mr. Fremont, or Mr. Chase, or the many others infinitely his inferiors? So far as the objections to his military qualifications are concerned, we have only to remind you that, within the last sixty days, a confidential friend of the President was sent to offer him one of the most important commands of the army. But this proposition was coupled with the most dishonorable condition—that he should decline to be a candidate for the Presidency. General McClellan restrained his indignation, and replied to the bearer of the message, "Go back to Washington and say to the President for me that when I receive my official, written orders, he shall have my answer."

Beware, Judge, of the intemperate abuse of your political opponents, as proud and loyal as you are, who would rather see the continent of America sink into the ocean, with all that dwells upon it, than see our nationality destroyed; who will not endure this constant usurpation of authority and encroachment upon their rights, and whom you may drive into a dreadful conflict, in which the abolitionist and the negro may find themselves arrayed against all who will unitedly stand, hand in hand, and shoulder to shoulder, in defence of the Constitution and the fundamental laws of the land. Very respectfully,

HENRY M. NAGLEE.

To Hon. Wm. D. Kelley, Philadelphia.

SECOND CHAPTER

FROM THE

ECRET HISTORY OF THE WAR.

PHILADELPHIA, Oct. 6.

MY DEAR SIR: I once went hunting, and d at a mischievous, chattering chipmonk, l found, when the smoke had cleared away,
t the chipmonk, although badly wounded, de a great pretence that he was not hurt at But, strange to say, when firing at the ser game, I had hit a fox, and that fox one the most cunning, destructive animals that l ever infested the neighborhood. Would u believe it, I never stopped to listen to the ipmonk, but loaded again for the fox.
Now, Judge, the moral: Without a word or act on my part to justify it, you attacked , and I responded. Although winged, you clare you are not hurt; but the President
d Secretary, I am informed, are badly hurt, e latter mortally; the former so much so that hall let you flutter until I try another load.
ok on, Judge; be quiet, await your time; I ve ammunition for both the fox and the chipnk.

In the Press, North American and Inquirer, d in all of the Republican newspapers of the untry, I have found the following:

GENERAL NAGLEE'S LETTER.

E OF HIS STATEMENTS ABOUT PRESIDENT LINCOLN AUTHORITATIVELY DENIED.

[From the National Republican (Official), Oct 3.]

The copperhead press of the country are giving culation to a letter addressed by General Naglee to n. William D. Kelley, of Philadelphia, in which the thor, speaking of General McClellan, makes the folwing statement:

"So far as the objections to his military qualificans are concerned, I have only to remind you that, thin the last sixty days, a confidential friend of the esident was sent to offer him one of the most imrtant commands of the army. But this proposition as coupled with the most dishonorable condition—at he should decline to be a candidate for the Presiney. General McClellan restrained his indignation, d replied to the bearer of the message, 'Go back to ashington, and say to the President for me, that nen I receive my official written orders, he shall have y answer.'"

We are authorized to say that the President has no recollection of sending any message or messenger to General McClellan, or of receiving any from him, at any time since he was relieved of the command of the Army of the Potomac, and certainly none such as mentioned in the published letter of General Naglee. If the President sent a message in writing, the writing can be produced; if a messenger, he can be named. Let either be done if it can.

To this I answer, that before the assembling of the Chicago Convention, about the middle of August, the President sent one of his old and confidential friends to propose to McClellan that if he would decline to be a candidate for the Presidency before the Chicago Convention, and would consent to throw the weight of his influence, with the Democratic party, in favor of the Republican nominee, he should have any position, civil or military, in the gift of the President, when reëlected, and that the whole influence of the next Administration should be thrown in his (McClellan's) favor for the succession.

Pardon me, Judge, but hold still just one moment longer, that I may inform you, that prior to this, there was a written correspondence between the son of this confidential old friend of the President, and a prominent Democrat, making substantially the same proposition. Now, in connection with the above, let me call the attention of your friends to the following extract from the published speech of the Hon. Montgomery Blair, made since my letter to you of the 27th of September, was written.

"On his (Vallandigham's) motion, every voice that had been raised to fury against the nomination of McClellan was silenced, and the vote in his favor made unanimous. There was a potent spell in his voice that made 'a cessation of hostilities,' 'a convention of the states,' of course as equals and independent, and a quondam chief of the federal army—(one whom to the last I believe to be true to the cause in which his country is embarked, and, I may add, whom the President held to be patriotic, and had concerted with General Grant to bring again into the field as his adjunct, if he turned his back on the proposals of the peace junto at Chicago)—to lead the last assault pressed by the Southern conspirators, countenanced by foreign powers, against the institutions of the country."

Let us rejoice. There is some hope for our country. Let us rejoice that we have found one honest man, one who would not sell himself, and betray his country, and who, amidst the most outrageous persecution that ever a strong government inflicted upon a single, unsupported, inexperienced young officer, had the courage to resent a disgraceful bribe and insult.

You have affirmed and re-affirmed that General McClellan had no plan, and that finally, about the end of February, in your own words, McClellan had exhausted the President's stock of patience; but that he had in the kindness of his heart determined to give General McClellan a chance to redeem himself from utter ridicule, and had given him ten days in which to propose a plausible plan of a campaign. It was then "you said he had no plan, and that when several of the promised ten days had passed he was still without a plan." You further say that General Naglee received a communication from a Democratic senator, Mr. Latham, of California, which let you (General Naglee) know that General McClellan was in danger of removal, because he had stipulated to submit a plan of campaign "within a certain number of days, and would be removed if he did not, and requested you (Naglee) to hasten to Washington." And now, Judge, listen to the truth. No doubt, having indulged so freely in fiction, the truth will be a little distasteful to you, but, as a favor to me, listen to it until I have done, after which, as far as I am concerned, you may resume your natural inclinations.

First, then, for the purpose of falsifying your declarations read the following:

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
WASHINGTON, February 3, 1862.

MY DEAR SIR: You and I have distinct and different plans for a movement of the Army of the Potomac; yours to be done by the Chesapeake, up the Rappahannock to Urbana, and across land to the terminus of the railroad on the York river; mine to move directly to a point on the railroad southwest of Manassas.

If you will give satisfactory answers to the following questions, I shall gladly yield my plan to yours:

1st. Does not your plan involve a greatly larger expenditure of time and money than mine?

2d. Wherein is a victory more certain by your plan than mine?

3d. Wherein is a victory more valuable by your plan than mine?

4th. In fact, would it not be less valuable in this: that it would break no great line of the enemy's communications, while mine would?

5th. In case of a disaster, would not a retreat be more difficult by your plan than mine?

Yours, truly,
ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

Major General McClellan.

And for the further refutation and falsification of what you have said, I hereby assert what I know to be true. During the month of January, 1862, General McClellan had been very ill. The President became very restive under the outside pressure which demanded, through the Republican press, that the army should "on to Richmond," and was about consent to some movement proposed by Ge eral McDowell. On hearing this, General M Clellan arose from his sick bed and proceed to the presidential mansion, there to join t President and his Cabinet, who had been sembled to meet him. He was asked by t President "to give his plan of campaign." hesitated for a moment, during which he membered that all information furnished to t Cabinet found its way to the confidential frien of some of them, and thence by the multitu of spies that infested the War and other d partments it was forthwith communicated the enemy, and he replied that he would do if the President ordered it, but as the Preside must know how immediately such informati was transmitted to the enemy, he, McClella preferred not to make known his plan of ca paign to the Cabinet unless the President shou order it, and the President declined to mal the order.

Mr. Chase remarked to one present, that Mac persists in thus refusing information, he a ruined man.

These circumstances occurred in January a on February 3d. Do you still intend to r affirm "that McClellan had no plan, until t Democratic senators, Mr. Latham and Mr. Ric and a brigadier from the column of Josep Hooker, concocted one, and packed a counc of war to approve of it?" on the 8th of Marc thereafter.

Now, Judge, you will save yourself and friend much confusion, which you have caused the in following you, if you would read the orde and letters that have been published upon a of these military subjects, and which may a be found in your favorite work of the repo of the committee on the conduct of the war, o in General McClellan's report, which is not s great a favorite with you. You evince, again the most extraordinary confusion when you as sert that the President gave him ten days t find a plan, and confound the orders I have re ferred to with the following order of the Presi dent:

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
WASHINGTON, March 8, 1862.

President's General War Order, No. 3.

* * * * * * * *

That any movement, as aforesaid, en route for a new base of operations, which may be ordered by the Commander-in-chief, and which may be intended to move upon the Chesapeake bay, shall begin to move upon the bay as early as the 18th March instant, and the General-in-chief shall be responsible that it moves as early as that day.

A. LINCOLN.

L. THOMAS, Adjutant-General.

In which you will observe, he did not order General McClellan to produce a plan within ten days, as you assert, but that his movement should commence within ten days.

Shifting from your original nomenclature, you now assert that the council was designated as a "Council of Division Commanders," and

, with the exception of General Naglee, it composed of division generals. Now, as usual, you falsify the record. There e but nine division officers detailed, and it convened by General McClellan as a "coun- f war."

our voluntary, unprovoked attack made n me on the 22d ultimo, needs no denial, the mere fact of my being a member of a ncil of war convened by order of General Clellan, shows of itself that I was on de- ied duty by proper authority, over which ther your friend Mr. Stanton nor General oker had any control. The attack upon me ler such circumstances, as well as your as- tion that General McClellan had no plan il it was prepared for him by Senators ham and Rice, and General Naglee, on the of March, 1862, in face of the letters and ers of the President, of February 8, and rch 8, herein referred to, and long since jects of constant public discussion, exhibits your part a recklessness of assertion and in- ference of proper self-respect, that few of ir friends will comprehend, and none of m attempt to justify.

Judge, if ever a question of veracity comes between you and myself, we alone must tle it, and you must not attempt to shuffle your responsibility and place it upon others, r to protect yourself behind such "well- own individuals" as "Puffer" Moore and eorge Hacker. This may have been your actice heretofore, and you may have so acted th impunity, but rest assured it will not be rmitted by me.

You refer to some great surprise that Gen- al McClellan proposed to make on the rebel ie at Brentsville; and you make out, no ubt to your satisfaction, that the success of e surprise depended entirely upon a certain idge to be constructed of canal boats, that ere to have been passed into the Potomac ar Harper's Ferry, and that it was found, hen the movement was about to be made, at the outlet lock was too narrow for the boats. ow, this surprise of Brentsville may be en- rely clear to you and Senators Wade and ohnson, but to myself and to my military iends, we cannot understand how the rebels the direction of Brentsville could have been irprised by any movement in the direction in- icated by you; but I suppose that that is not nportant with you, your real object being nly to relate the story of that obstinate canal oat, that had passed through all the other ocks upon the canal, but refused, in the face f the enemy, to pass the outer lock. Did it ver occur to you that an empty canal boat, in he hands of thousands of men, could be trans- erred down hill, from the canal to the river, vith but little difficulty, and that there might ave been some other reason than the one as- igned by you? But, admitting all that you laim, did it never occur to you that the entire letail, attending the movement of a large army, is to be superintended by the commander thereof in person? I will even grant you that in theory you are right, and that General McClellan should not have had officers attached to his staff, who neglected to use every precaution to prevent failure. But be charitable. Don't fail to remember the awful disappointment when that pontoon train failed to appear upon the Rappahannock, and when the vials of wrath were poured, not upon the head of the favorite of your party, General Burnside, but upon those of Generals Halleck, Meigs, and Woodbury, and again be charitable, and do not fail to remember how carefully you have secreted that more terrible blunder than ever occurred in the annals of this or any other war, by which we have no less than twenty-three monitors, constructed at an expense of over twelve millions of dollars, and which, by the nice calculations of the naval engineers, brought in after one of them was launched, it was determined that with their armament they would float just five inches under water. Now, Judge, but do not fail to remember, who is responsible for this? Again be charitable, that the President and "Fighting Joe Hooker," carefully concealing their plans from the Commander-in-chief and the Secretary of War, to that extent that, while the battle was going on at Chancellorsville, I was informed directly, by the best authority in the premises, that "neither General Halleck nor the Secretary of War knew more of what was going on than I did," and "that all of the requisitions made during the preparations for the movement, instead of going through the ordinary channels, were ordered directly by the President;" and do you know that, to the present hour, the country has never been informed that, on that occasion, Hooker and the President fought the best army that was ever got together, numbering no less than one hundred and sixty-five thousand men, against General Lee, with an army of fifty-seven thousand—lost thirty-five thousand men —were completely routed, and to such an extent that, as I said before, but for the providential killing of Stonewall Jackson, our army would have been annihilated? Why has not Mr. Stanton told this to the families of the thirty-five thousand so unnecessarily slaughtered, instead of attempting to console them with the pitiful story that "the Eleventh army corps gave way in confusion," and that "but one third of General Hooker's army had been brought into action?"

Why did not your Committee on the Conduct of the War exhaust a few of those five hundred days, and a portion of those seventeen hundred pages, devoted to General McClellan, upon the military successes of that great leader, General Butler, before Petersburg, where six thousand of his men were marched prisoners into Richmond almost without his knowledge—he and Mr. Stanton coolly assuring the country that there had been a great fog, and that it came before breakfast?

Before I leave your friend, Mr. Stanton, I will instance another evidence of his treachery to General McClellan. All know of the disasters caused by the interference of the President and Mr. Stanton with the Army of the Potomac. It was necessary to have a victim, and General McClellan was selected and removed. A short time afterward, Pope, being placed in command, failed most disastrously, and Washington was again threatened. The President and his cabinet were alarmed to that extent that a steamer was prepared and ready to assist in their escape. With earnest entreaty and supplication McClellan was solicited to assume command and save them and Washington. He consented, ignoring the solicitations of his friends, who desired that he should first insist upon the removal of Mr. Stanton, which he utterly refused, replying that he would not permit any personal considerations to influence his conduct when the Capital was in such imminent danger. He then accomplished the greatest military success of the war. He reorganized the demoralized army of Pope while on the march, and gained the glorious victory of Antietam. McClellan's star was again in the ascendant. Mr. Stanton begged forgiveness for the past, and promised his devoted friendship for the future.

Again, General McClellan's trusting nature prevailed over the advice of his friends, and the treacherous conduct of Mr. Stanton was forgiven by General McClellan, only to be again more wickedly betrayed than ever. Washington was no sooner relieved and the President and his Cabinet safe, than, by the influence of Mr. Stanton, General McClellan was again removed from the command of the Army of the Potomac, when upon the verge of battle, and ordered into retirement.

You call up the ghosts of the departed soldiers. Be assured, General McClellan's sleep will not be disturbed by them; but what must be the broken slumbers of those who are responsible for the tens of thousands lost by Pope, and Burnside, and Hooker, in attempting to carry out what the President called his "plan," and the hundred and fifty thousand lost since the 4th of May, south of the Rapidan; and what must be the dreams of the President, who could, amid the groans of the dying that lay upon the gory field of Antietam, call for the singing of a ribald song?

In times like these we want some other than the weak and vacillating President who assi Mr. Crittenden, and the patriots who accon nied him from Kentucky, that they might home and inform their friends that he wo not violate their rights and interests by proclamation of emancipation. Before th assurances could be transmitted to the peo of Kentucky his promises had been broken, just such a proclamation, violating all th pledges, was issued.

If any State has done nobly, and earned tinction for pure patriotism under the most t ing, dreadful sufferings of this war, in whic whole people have been despoiled, families bittered against families, and members of same family against each other to that ext that harmony can never prevail, it is the St of Kentucky; and if there was any one St that should have had influence with the admi tration, it was that State. But her voice, ami the din and blood of battle, has never b heard, or, if heard for the moment, it was s lost under the influence of Massachusetts, ai by the demon yells of radical men, who cr out extermination, and, in the same bres proclaimed a higher law than the Constituti which they only denounce as a covenant w hell.

The people of the South are members of same national family with us; they must brought back by continued force, if they v not come back by consent. But we must r pect their rights, whatever they are. There no more power in the President of the Unit States to control whatever right of prope there may remain to them in the slave on t day on which they lay down their arms, th there is in the sheriff to insist that the poor c prit, who has violated the law in the most o rageous manner, shall be deprived of his food his clothing, prior to his execution. The mi tary authority of the President during the istence of the war, can apply only to perso property in the actual possession of the arm and all military authority ceases the mome peace is restored, and the only authority th can be exercised over the same from the mome hostilities cease, is lodged in the Constitutio and laws of the States, and the United Stat whose mandates he, by the Constitution, bound by his oath to obey.

Very respectfully, &c.,

HENRY M. NAGLEE.

ORRUPTIONS AND FRAUDS OF LINCOLN'S ADMINISTRATION.

When the present Republican Administration as-ned federal power, it found itself confronted with nts of the gravest import to the safety, honor, welfare of the Union. Everything conspired to ke men serious, unselfish, and patriotic. The ie which the men of the revolution had erected, of decaying nationalities, the keen jealousies of es, and earnest differences in respect to treatment he great problem of slave labor, was tottering to fall. In such an hour, it is next to impossible to ceive that the leaders of the dominant party could it in their hearts to place personal objects above siderations of the public good. But so it was.
spectacle of a great nation struggling for life, y seems to have inspired the motley horde of ce-seekers, who followed Mr. LINCOLN to Wash-ton, to confederate together to see how they ld best rob and plunder the national pocket. The acity of these Republican leaders presented an mple of indecent lust for pecuniary gain, amid agonies of death, which has been only equalled rebel wretches on a smaller scale, on so many tle fields.

t would require volumes to give even an outline the myriad cases of pecuniary fraud and corrup-n which have marked the track of the present deral Administration since its advent to power.
it were possible to group together all the mon-ous frauds, presided over by Mr. LINCOLN, as Chief ecutive, it would be still impossible for the mind grasp and realize their enormity. Our faculties uld be no more equal to the tremendous task, n they are to take in, and duly appreciate the ful suffering and agony of a great battle, where thousand of our kindred, neighbors, and coun-men are maimed, butchered, or killed by the iron apon of relentless war. The manly nature, whose sibilities are overcome by the spectacle of even human being in the struggle of mortal pain, is uck dumb by the contemplation of ten thousand the same frightful state. So with the pecuniary uds of the present Administration. If presented a whole, they paralyze the conscience and judg-nt of honest men. We can only consider them in tail, and it is the purpose of the present paper to ll the attention of voters and tax-payers of the untry to one or two of the wretched schemes of culation and plunder into which the prominent rtisans of Mr. LINCOLN have embarked.

We begin with the New York Custom House, and from one case we may learn all.

President LINCOLN, having to select his cabinet advisers, elected upon the doctrines of Helper's "Impending Crisis," proceeded to select his cabinet advisers, upon much the same theory as a successful pirate chieftain would parcel out plunder among his followers; the Treasury Department fell to the portion of Mr. CHASE, who, in the secondary distribution of opportunities for pecuniary gain, selected HIRAM BARNEY to be collector of the great port of New York, in which is collected the chief part of all revenue of the United States derived from duties on imports. Mr. BARNEY was quite unknown to the country. He had never held Federal office of any kind, elective or executive, and had never received mark of distinction in the public affairs of New York. No large delegations of merchants requested his appointment. The controlling ground of his selection was the personal relation, of money and business, which had existed between himself and the Secretary of the Treasury.

When Mr. BARNEY entered upon his new duties, his first acts developed how little of patriotic devotion to an agonized Union, and how much of purpose to fill their own pockets, entered into the thoughts and purposes of those who were his superiors in office, and his associates in politics, and who were, among other things, looking forward to the time when ill-gotten gains could be used by office holders to perpetuate party power and cover up misdeeds.

It had happened that, under a previous Administration, certain persons had conceived the idea of proposing to do the labor required at the appraisers' stores, the Custom House, and elsewhere, by contract, the price to be estimated upon each case or package. This labor, made necessary by examination of merchandise by the goverment appraisers, to fix the dutiable value of importations, had always been done by laborers, cartmen, and drays, hired by the United States, by the month or year. The Treasury Department, being of opinion that the proposition of doing the work by contract, presented the same class of advantages to the United States that contracts do to private individuals, made an agreement with Messrs. MCINTIRE, BIXBY & Co., to do the work. The contract turned out to be an advantageous one, both to the Government and the contractors.

It was for a term of years, which was unexpired when Mr. BARNEY came into office, and yet could on certain conditions be annulled by the Treasury Department.

This contract was among the earliest of the things for which, while all New York beside was flinging away every thought of self, in one supreme emotion and desire to vindicate the honor of the flag struck down at Sumter, the Republican clique, headed by Messrs. CHASE and BARNEY, made desperate efforts. The rich prize was quickly in their possession, when it was decided to use the power and terror of the Government to deprive the inventors of the contract idea, of that property in their invention and subsequent agreement, which was as clearly their own, as is a man's house or land. It was authoritatively represented to Messrs. MCINTIRE, BIXBY & Co., that unless they sold their contract to certain persons, to be named by Mr. WILLIAM ALLEN BUTLER, or those, directly or indirectly, associated with him, the Administration would cause it to be annulled altogether. The result was that the contract was assigned over, and conveyed to LUTHER B. WYMAN (a book-keeper in the house of Charles H. Marshall & Co.) and SIMON STEVENS (a cousin of Thaddeus Stevens, of Pennsylvania, then a controlling Republican member of the House of Representatives). These were the assignees named in the writings. The original contractors having given bonds to the United States, for due performance of the contract, on their part, a bond of indemnity was given to them, as their sureties, which was signed by CHARLES H. MARSHALL (father-in-law of William Allen Butler, of the law firm of Barney, Butler, and Parsons); JOHN D. SCOTT and SIMON STEVENS, each justifying in the sum of thirty thousand dollars. In the management of the business, under the new contractors, Mr. BIXBY, one of the old contractors, was employed, or continued in charge, and he accounted to WILLIAM ALLEN BUTLER every week for all money receipts, and there is good reason to believe that the law firm of BARNEY, BUTLER & PARSONS, was the real assignee and owners of all but one fourth of the contract, which one fourth was the property of Messrs. STEVENS and BIXBY.

This subject of the labor contract, as it came to be known, was so full of badness, in its every aspect, that Congress could not, in consequence of Democratic clamor, resist making it a matter of legislative inquiry, and how completely the peculators managed to evade the scrutiny of a congressional committee, can best be seen by the following extract from the report of its chairman, Colonel VAN WYCK, a member of Congress from New York.

Let the witness LUTHER B. WYMAN, one of the assignees, speak first:

Q. Were you, or were you not, interested in what is called the labor contract at the public stores? A. I was. Q. From what time to what time? A. From the 11th of May, 1861, until about the 6th or 7th of September, 1862. Q. Who else was interested in the contract during that time? A. Mr. Luther B. Wyman. Q. Any other person? A. I KNOW OF NO OTHER PERSON DIRECTLY INTERESTED. Q. Any other person indirectly? A. I represented one half of the contract and Luther B. Wyman represented the other half. Q. Be kind enough to tell us whether anybody else had any direct or indirect interest in it? A. I represented one half of it, it was in my name; I bought it and paid for it. Q. Did anybody have any indirect interest in any portion of the contract except what you have represented? A. I have only my suppositions. Q. What do you know about that matter? A. That I was requested to pay one half of the profits, whatever they might be, over and above expenses, to William Allen Butler. Mr. Butler stated that he was the attorney of Mr. Wyman. Payments were so made and receipts therefor given by William Allen Butler, as attorney for the two first payments. Subsequently, receipts were given by him for money paid to him, signed by the initial "W. A. B." Then and from that day forward payments were made to him and receipts given by him, and so signed, with the exception of some few payments which were made to George W. Parsons, who sometimes receipted for them, simply, "G. W. P.," on some occasions, "W. A. B. per G. W. P.," and sometimes "G. W. P. for W. A. B." Q. Who is this William Allen Butler? A. He is of the law firm of Barney, Butler & Parsons. Q. Who is this Mr. Parsons? A. He is of the firm of Barney, Butler & Parsons. Q. Who is the Barney of that firm? A. Hiram Barney, collector of the port of New York. Q. Is the firm now in business here? A. Yes, sir. Q. Did you pay any of these proceeds to Mr. Wyman himself? A. No, sir. Q. Did Mr. Wyman himself direct you who to pay those proceeds? A. He did not. Q. Did you have any authority directly from Mr. Wyman to pay them as you did? A. Simply on the day of the execution of the papers, Mr. William Allen Butler said in the presence of Mr. Wyman, this in purport: "I am the attorney for Mr. Wyman, the net proceeds of this contract will be paid to me." Q. Did Mr. Wyman assent to that? A. Mr. Wyman nodded assent. Q. You took no paper to protect you for such payments? A. I did not, nor have any such papers. Q. Do you know, from Mr. Wyman or otherwise, whether Mr. Wyman had any interest in this contract beyond the use of his name? A. MR. WYMAN HAS, ON SEVERAL OCCASIONS, STATED TO ME THAT HE HAD NO INTEREST, DIRECT OR INDIRECT, IN THE CONTRACT, OTHERWISE THAN THE USE OF HIS NAME. Q. Did he tell you who had the interest represented by his name? A. He said he knew of nobody in this matter except William Allen Butler, who claimed to act as attorney for the parties actually in interest.

Mr. WILLIAM ALLEN BUTLER was subsequently sworn, and Col. VAN WYCK comments on his examination in this wise:

On the 3d day of January, Mr. Butler was sworn. I was not present at his examination; I say this in justice to myself, for it seems almost impossible that his examination should have been concluded, and I was not asked who were the real parties in interest which he represented when that was one of the subjects of investigation. Only three questions were put to Mr. Butler. The first, as to his residence and business; the second, "have you read the testimony taken before this committee, touching the transfer of the labor contract?" and the third, "have you any statement to make touching your connexion with that transfer of interest under the so-called labor contract?" Mark the gentleness of the interrogatories. Was it because he was the law partner of Mr. Barney? I know not. Among other things, to the last question he says: "I have whatever information I had on the subject was derived in the course of my professional employment, and not acquired no positive knowledge about it. Funds were placed in my hands by PARTIES IN INTEREST." He evidently did not mean Stevens or Wyman; he nowhere states who were the PARTIES in interest, and, most strange of all, he was not asked.

The connexion of the general orders with this contract shows irresistibly who were behind the scenes, because they were worked in happy unison.

These loyal patriots, not content with thus grasping the labor contract, before described, forthwith set lustful eyes upon the general order business of the Custom House.

When a vessel arrives in the port of New York the captain obtains an order to send all goods on which are unclaimed at the end of a certain which time is longer in case of sail than steam is, "under general order," as it is called. This s to send them to one of the stores designated he Collector for the reception of "general or- merchandise. The quantity of merchandise sent under "general order" from steamers, is nse, and the profit to the owner of the ware- es is great in proportion. By law and regula- the Collector is bound to send the "general " goods to the warehouses nearest the discharg- hip. The port of New York is divided into two al divisions; one on North River, and the other ast River. It is estimated that "general order" houses on North River are worth not less than undred thousand dollars a year.

hen the present Administration came into power, essful efforts were made to constrain the then rietors of "general order" stores to pay over rtain parties, one third of their receipts, on pain eing deprived of orders altogether. It was de- ped by Col. VAN WYCK'S committee, that fore- among those who thus levied black-mail by Re- ican authority, on the East River division, was firm of BOWEN & LAMBERT; and it is reported BOWEN is brother-in-law of Collector BARNEY. he North River, the "general order" business assed into the hands of BIXBY & Co., in which JAMES HUMPHREY and (so says witness Charles ire, jr.) young MARSHALL, son of Charles H. shall, before alluded to, as bondsman on the labor tract, were partners.

his Mr. JAMES HUMPHREY is a conspicuous Re- lican, was formerly Member of Congress from ooklyn, and partner of Collector BARNEY. And a further curious and suggestive fact, that the ARLES H. MARSHALL, whose book-keeper was ol pigeon of this elaborate contrivance of dis- orable peculation, whose son was partner in the eneral order" stores, and who was also bonds- n for the ring, is the same man who was so in- ant at the suggestion of illuminating his house the recent monster Democratic gathering in ion Square in behalf of the Union, and wrote a er expressing his excessive trouble about the icago platform.

So true is it, in the present canvass, that wherever found a man, bitter in denunciation of MCCLEL- N, or loud-mouthed in adulation of LINCOLN, it n be safely predicted of him, that he is either a ntractor, or office-holder, or a man, in some purely vate matter, benefited by Mr. Lincoln.

The conduct of the Republican politicians, headed Mr. BARNEY, in the matter of these "general or- r" stores, can not be better stated than in the ords of the congressional committee:

Whereas, the evidence fully shows that there not ly was favoritism, but the Collector did not make e selection, but gave the general orders to certain rties who had no stores, bonded or otherwise, and ffered them to go among those having general orders, d compelled them to give a bonus of thirty per cent. or the privilege of retaining it. This was certainly refinement of extortion or corruption upon the prac- ces of former Administrations. Such a thing was ever known before, and was reserved for the party ho had promised ourselves and the nation that official orruption was to cease, and retrenchment and reform ere to be once more inaugurated. Alas! "like Dead ea fruits, they turned to ashes on the lips."

It does not appear that Mr. Barney received any part f this thirty per cent., but it is clear that he was no- ified of the outrages, committed by the men on whom he had showered this bounty, and he did not condemn or check it.

It was generally believed, by those familiar with the facts, that the firm of BARNEY, BUTLER & PARSONS was a pool, into which, on the one hand, went all the earnings of the firm as lawyers, and Republican lobby agents, and on the other, all the money which MR. BARNEY received, directly or indirectly, legally or illegally, as Collector. It was believed that the Collector was thereby directly and pecuniarily interested in the labor contract, which the old contractors had been compelled, by threats, to sign over to Republicans. And nobody could well doubt that if al this was true, Secretary CHASE must be more or les cognizant of the facts. The public was confirmed in all this by what happened during the investigation of a subsequent committee of Congress, of which Mr. HULBURD, of New York, was chairman, and which made a report in June last.

This committee was, to be sure, by reason of the conduct of its chairman, HULBURD, one of the most partisan and dishonest that ever disgraced an American Congress. In his conduct of the examination in New York, he surrendered himself entirely to Mr. BARNEY and his clique. The earnest efforts of the only Democrat on the committee, Mr. LE BLOND, could not withstand the partisan dishonesty of HULBURD, who seemed to have no purpose but to shield and protect infamous frauds upon the public treasury; acts so bad as to even excite the denunciation of his Republican colleague, ROLLINS, of New Hampshire. The sacred cause of the Union, for which he professed to be a loyal devotee, the important interests of the tax-payers, among his constituents, whose rights he was bound to maintain, were all pushed aside to screen political associates who were caught with arms in the public crib, up to their shoulders. The report of HULBURD is one mass of deception. Important testimony is suppressed, in the interest of political thieves and plunderers. The evidence of more than twenty witnesses examined by him, is kept out of his printed report. Shame on such personal and public infamy on the part of a man pretending to be honest!

But, even with all this apparent purpose of HULBURD, acting under dictation of the Administration at Washington, to cover up the practices of BARNEY and his Republican confederates against the people's money, now more than ever needed to maintain the people's flag, the complicity of BARNEY, with his law partners, to prostitute the office of Collector to unlawfully get money to enrich themselves, and to reelect Mr. LINCOLN, was satisfactorily uncovered.

During the examination of BARNEY, as a witness, the only members of the committee present, were HULBURD, chairman, and LE BLOND, and the former insisted that the witness should have opportunity to consult with his confederates in order to revise and re-write his testimony. Mr. BLOND made effort to probe to the root of the matter of the labor contract in respect to which BARNEY evaded a previous committee, and with the following result:

Q. I will ask you whether you received a part of the income of your law firm? A. I will say that nominally I do, but I give as much as I receive; I keep my place. Q. I will ask you, farther, whether your law partners receive any part or parcel of your salary, or the perquisites of your office? A. They do not; but I give them a sum that answers their purposes to retain me in, and they not lose anything. They have nothing to do with my accounts. Q. An annual sum, do you wish to be understood, or a sum in the aggregate. A.

It depends somewhat upon my receipts. Q. I confess that the answer which you give me seems to require that I should ask you a still further question, and if it turns out to be a purely personal matter or arrangement in which the receipts of the Custom House do not constitute a part of the business, why it shall be stricken out. About what amount do you annually pay to your co-partners? A. I am unable to answer that question without reference to my books and memoranda. Q. How much money do you receive from the firm of Barney, Butler and Parsons annually, and how much do you pay said firm out of the emoluments of your office? (To this Mr. Barney demurred answering, claiming it to be foreign to the purposes of the committee's investigation, and a needless inquiry into his private affairs.) (Thereupon Mr. Le Blond stated that he was informed that the firm of Barney, Butler & Parsons had taken fees in cases against the Government growing out of seizures made by the Custom House authorities; and further, that said firm had an interest in what is known as the labor contract, connected with the Custom House, and declared if these things were so, his question was pertinent, and ought, as connected with public interest, to be answered.) (There being but two members of the committee present, and they differing as to priority of time in which the questions should be put, and answers required, the further examination of Mr. Barney was deferred, and the committee adjourned.)

It is obvious from this report that if HULBURD had sustained LE BLOND, and compelled the witness to make answer, the whole conspiracy of plunder, the illegal act of having a partner in the salary and perquisites of a revenue office, would have been exposed. Even the questions of LE BLOND permitted by HULBURD to be put, terrified the witness into prevarications which would be mortifying enough to an upright man, or a man not utterly given over to lust of pecuniary gain in the midst of the unspeakable calamities of a civil war, which makes poverty and want stare laboring men in the face. And all this while the legal perquisites of the Collectorship are not much less (see p. 23 of Report) than twenty-five thousand dollars a year. One would suppose that even a Black-Republican maw would be satisfied with a sum equal to the salary of the President of the United States! but not so, think loyal leaguers, who shout for the Union, and rob the treasury at the same moment!

If the record of Black-Republican faithlessness to important public trusts, stopped here, the country could, perhaps, endure thus much of disgrace. But there is yet a lower depth of national humiliation to be sounded.

The exigency of a war begun avowedly for the Union, but now carried on outside the Union, to secure abandonment of slavery, in obedience to that logic and rhetoric of sectionalism, and hatred of slaveholders, which has, for three years, blotted out or rolled up in blood one half of the map of the Union, compelled Congress, in 1862, to enact that certain restrictions be placed upon commerce, from our northern ports, with foreign ports around the Gulf of Mexico. The object was to prevent supplies of war going to aid rebels in arms, by way of ports in the West India Islands, or in Mexico. The provisions of the law explicitly decared:

That whenever a permit or clearance is granted for either a foreign or domestic port, it shall be lawful for the collector of customs granting the same, if he shall deem it necessary, under the circumstances of the case, to require a bond to be executed by the master or the owner of the vessel in a penalty equal to the value of the cargo, and with sureties to the satisfaction of such collector, that the said shall be delivered at the destination for which it is cleared or ... mitted, and that no part thereof shall be use ... affording aid or comfort to any person or parti ... insurrections against the authority of the Un ... The Treasury Department, therefore, issued ... structions to Collectors as follows:

In all cases where, in your judgment, there ... ground of apprehension that any goods, wares ... merchandise, shipped at your port, will be used ... any way for the aid of the insurgents or the insur ... tion, you will require substantial security to be gi ... that such goods, wares, or merchandise shall not ... transferred to any place under insurrectionary cont ... and shall not in any way be used to give aid or com ... to such insurgents.

It is easy to see that this law, and the instructio ... if executed by an honest Collector, and effici ... subordinates, would effectually stop all illicit tr ... between New York city and the rebels. Among the persons who have been conspicuous in ... the fraudulent practices growing out of Mr. LIN ... COLN'S election, is a man named ALBERT M. PALMER. ... Palmer's appointment, and in the hands of the lat- Mr. Barney threw almost unlimited power of rol in the Custom House. Mr. Derham, a most lligent witness, examined by the Committee, rs (p. 238) that "Mr. Palmer, everybody nd the Custom House supposed to be principal there, and he, in fact, was said to be the Col- or.'

nother witness, appointed in the Custom House, :

I had a situation in the Custom House, which given me without solicitation. I had been very ve in my party, and had spent between two and e thousand dollars, and was active in getting es for my friends. Mr. Palmer told me that I ht to have some place for myself. I told him I d take no place which required active duty. I appointed a debentured clerk. . . . I was there ar and a quarter. I think a dozen days will cover I was on duty."

he following extracts, from pages 146 and 147 he report, will present a pretty clear idea of the l of men Republicans, high in office, collect nd them :

y Mr. Le Blond: Q. What were Palmer's circum- ces? A. He was a clerk in the Custom House at 00. Q. Was his salary his only source of living, his only means of paying you back again? A. had commissions on the collections for the party. y collected so much every year from the Custom se, and I believe he used to receive a percentage the full amount that was collected. I thought n he was collecting last November or December he would pay me back what he owed me; he d me then $600 or $700, but he did not do it.

y Mr. Rollins: Q. You say that some 20 men in 17th ward were appointed to office on your re- mendation and the recommendation of other men he ward; did any one of these 20 men ever pay directly or indirectly, any money or other valu- consideration for your influence in securing their ointment? A. Most of them owed me money; e poor devils who had no money to pay rents; they e the best working politicians in my ward.

y Mr. Le Blond: Q. What business did Palmer ow before he went into the Custom House? A. ever knew him before he went to the Custom use. Q. Do you know whether he is a professional n? A. I have understood that he was; that he sed examination as a lawyer.

y Mr. Rollins: Where did Palmer live during term of office in the Custom House? A. He lived the 17th ward. Q. Did he board at a hotel? A. hen I first knew him he boarded at private houses, I was afterwards at a private hotel. Q. Was his de of living expensive? A. More expensive than ne. Q. Did he keep horses? A. No, Sir; he used drive mine; I generally kept three; sometimes he uld take his wife out with him, and get my team, d sometimes he would take a single horse; he left ward and lived at the Metropolitan hotel. Q. w long since? A. Probably in August or September t. Q. Upon what terms did he live there? A. He d me he paid $35 a week. Q. What was his salary, you say? A. $1,500 a year, and he used to have s commission, 2½ per cent.

The introduction by Opdyke; the ready promo- n by Barney to the power portrayed by the wit- sses cited; the small legal receipts by Palmer as lary, and the large expenditure, sufficiently explain hat was the function of the latter, in the scheme peculation and plunder concocted by prominent epublicans. And no one is surprised, when at last, xposure of what has been done lands Mr. Palmer Fort Lafayette, a prisoner of state. He was arrested by Marshal Murray, without a suspicion by Collector Barney that the practises of his young friend had been discovered, and the facts, touching Republican complicity with blockade runners, all laid bare.

Besides Palmer, there was, in the Custom House, another eminent Republican, a most controlling man in that organization which elected Mr. Lincoln on the basis of "moral ideas." He had outrun the swiftest in denunciation of Democrats who did not think it the sum and substance of all philanthropy and patriotism, to "avoid" and "abhor" the people of the slave-labor States, with whom we, of the North, had entered into the most sacred, and tender relations of country. He had addressed wide-awake processions innumerable, in advocacy of the honesty and statesmanship of Mr Lincoln, and he was not forgotten when the latter entered into the seats of power, and made up his jewels. Of such was Henry B. Stanton.

It was a part of the Republican plan to make him Deputy Collector, and it was done. Stanton says that Mr. Chase told him that the salary was small, but his income could be increased. He was put in charge of the bond bureau of the Custom House, through which shipments to the rebels were made. He prepared the bonds, as he says, by Mr. Barney's request, and with his approval of the form adopted. And here crops out the first step in the iniquity! The law requires the bond not to furnish the goods to rebels to be given by the master of the ship, and, will it be believed, it was drawn so as to shelter the master, and substitute the owner of the goods? All the bonds so taken were thus illegal, good for nothing, and so the shipper went free in his work of treason! More than that, it was proved that bonds were cancelled at the Custom House for direct pecuniary consideration. On this point, let a witness, Mr. Alfred T. Conklin, called before the Committee, tell his own story of his experience:

Alfred T. Conklin sworn and examined (commission merchant, No. 42 New street), by the Chairman. Q. How long have you been a commission merchant? A. About 12 years. Q. Are you engaged in importations and exportations? A. I receive flour from the West; ship goods to the West Indies and the British Provinces; also receive goods from England; not a great many, however. Q. You say that you have shipped to the West Indies somewhat. We understand that there have been some new treasury regulations since the Rebellion commenced, differing from what formerly prevailed, and especially requiring bonds that were not formerly given; has your business required you to give any such bonds? A. I have not shipped any such goods myself that required me to give any such bonds, but I have become bondsman for other parties who shipped. Q. Have you done very much business of that kind? A. I have only been bondsman for one firm, with the exception of one other instance, I was bondsman for Middleton & Co., and in one instance for Wm. M. Smith. I think the bonds in that case were for $600 and $1,500. I have been on the bonds of Middleton & Co. for $80,000 or $90,000 on different shipments from $900 probably up to $30,000 on different vessels, from a period commencing last June. Q. The committee have taken some testimony in reference to the nature of these bonds and the parties. I want to ask you whether the bonds that you have signed have all or any of them been cancelled or surrendered afterwards? A. Some six or seven have been surrendered. Q. The committee wish a full history of this transaction just as it took place. A. It occurred in this way: it was the general talk here that these bonds could be bought up. I was passing through the Custom House one day on business, and I asked one of the brokers, by mere chance, if such things could be done. He said he thought it could be. I asked him if he ever knew it to be done; he said he had. The broker's name was Henry Smith; I think he resides in Jersey City. He is a broker in the Custom House. I told him that I was on some bonds, and if that was the case I would like to buy them up, and I told him to see how it was. He reported what he had done, and the result of it was that we bought up six or seven bonds. Q. What was the price paid? A. The whole amount was about $1,600 that I paid for the bonds. Q. That is the amount you paid Mr. Smith? A. Yes, Sir. Q. How long a time intervened, in your opinion, betwixt Mr. Smith's saying to you that things were arranged, and your entering with Mr. Middleton, Stanton's office? A. Mr. Middleton, previously to the bond being given, asked me if I would have any objections to going on a bond with him. I told him no. He stated that they had got into difficulty with the Custom House, and that was the first occasion that a bond had been required of them. I told him that I had no objections to going on the bond at all. So the next day, or the day after, I think—I will not be certain which—I went up to the Custom House with him to give this bond, and as I said that I had negotiated with Smith in reference to it, I will state how it took place. I happened to be passing along through the Custom House within a few days of the time that this bond was given, and having heard about the getting up of bonds, I asked Smith about it. He said he thought it could be done, and wanted to know why. I told him I understood those things were done, and if other people are doing it, I didn't know why we should not do it. He afterwards told me that it could be done. When I agreed to go on this bond of Middleton, I did not know that the bond was for so large an amount, and that I would have to justify to the amount of $64,000. As soon as I went up there and found that this was the case, I turned to Smith, "You say you can buy up these bonds. What will it cost to get up this bond, the penal sum of which is $64,000? I cannot swear that I am worth $64,000." Says he, "I will see." He goes to Mr. Stanton's room and comes back. There was some little difference about the price, I think he asked $650. He went back and forth two or three times, and finally came down to $600; and when we got as far as that I said to Mr. Smith, "Now, if Mr. Stanton is going to sell this bond, what difference does it make whether I swear I am worth $64,000 or sixty-four cents? I cannot swear that I am worth $64,000. If he has a mind to take me and not swear me, I will go on the bond. It makes no odds to him if he sells his bond." Smith says, "I will go in and see him." He went to see; was gone some time; came back and said, "That will be all right, he will not ask you any questions at all." I said, "Are you sure of that?" and he said, "That is understood." "I want it distinctly understood," says I, "that I will not swear to any amount at all." He went away, came back, and said, "It is all right, you will not be asked any questions at all." When he went into Mr. Stanton's room, Mr. Middleton came up, and Mr. Stanton says, "Is this Mr. Middleton?" "Yes, sir." "Are you worth the amount of that shipment?" Mr. Middleton says, "Yes, sir." He then turns around to me. "Is this the bondsman?" Says I, "Yes, sir." "Will you swear?" (waving his hand) and that was all there was about it. Q. Now, I want to recall your attention to the point about which I was enquiring before this statement. What, in your opinion, was the intervening time between the last interview with Smith and your entering Stanton's room with Mr. Middleton? A. I do not think it was ten minutes, because about that time I stood there waiting for Mr. Middleton to get his papers through. He had sent for me to come up to the Custom House. I went to the Custom House, found Mr. Middleton, and he said, "I will be through in a few minutes." He was standing in a line, and I stood there talking to Mr. Smith while Mr. Middleton was getting his papers through. Q. In your former testimony you stated that for some reason you had occasion to open the door that led into Mr. Stanton's office, you found him leaning on the desk, and talking to Smith? A. That was not upon this occasion, but another time; Smith was then negotiating for some other bonds, and staid a long while. I was in a hurry as it was just before 'change, and I went to the door of the front office, but I could not see him in there, and opened the door, went in, and looked through the other door, and he was leaning on the desk talking with Mr. Stanton. Q. Was that in reference to an arrangement for the surrender of a bond? A. Yes, sir. Q. Do you recollect what one? A. I do not. Q. Was it previous to or after this arrangement about the $64,000 bond? A. It was after the first bond—the $64,000 bond—the course of two or three weeks or a month after that. Q. You do not remember either, I suppose, the specific bond or the amount of it, when you saw Smith leaning on the desk and talking to Stanton? A. No, sir, it was a small bond, I think he asked $150, and I told him that was an exorbitant price, and he went back and forth two or three times; Mr. Stanton would not yield at all. Smith said that Stanton said it was just as much risk to take a small bond as a large one. On another occasion, when he was negotiating for the surrender of a bond, $25 split them, and finally it was settled by his agreeing to pay $100 before three o'clock. Stanton saying that he wanted to use that amount. This was about two o'clock.

MARCH 22, 1864.

Alfred T. Conklin recalled.

By the Chairman:

Question. Do you recollect whether the bonds that came into your hands were surrendered or given without the word "cancelled" being upon them, without Mr. Stanton's name being upon them? Answer. The names were cut out. Q. Who cut them out? I cut them out after they came into my hands. Q. Do you recollect how long it was after the execution of the bonds before you obtained them through Mr. Smith? A. I obtained one of these bonds inside of an hour after it was executed. Q. Can you recollect who the principal of the bond was? A. It was Middleton & Co.; I was the security on it.

By Mr. Rollins:

Question. Did you go in with Middleton when he executed it? Answer. Yes, sir. Q. Did he charge you a surety fee upon it? A. I think a dollar and a half or two dollars; that was paid, and within an hour from that time I had the bond in my possession. Q. Do you know what that bond cost? A. Six hundred dollars. Q. When the bond came back the word "cancelled" was not written across it, it was simply handed to you as you left it? A. Yes, sir, that bond is destroyed; all the rest of the bonds are intact, with the exception of the signatures of Middleton & Co. Q. What was the cause of this bond being destroyed? A. That was the first bond that was ever got up. Q. For what amount was it given? A. About $64,000 was the penal sum. When this bond came up it was a bond of a larger amount than I was willing to swear. I was worth ($64,000). I told Mr. Smith, "These gentlemen want me to go on a bond for $64,000, and I do not feel as if I wanted to swear that I am worth that, and the consequence is that if I do not swear to that I cannot go upon that bond, but as Mr. Stanton is going to give us that bond back immediately, what odds does it make whether I swear I am worth $64,000 or sixty four cents? The bargain was made before the bond was given that the amount to be paid for it was $600. Q. How do you know the bargain was made? A. I made it. Q. With whom? A. Mr. Smith. Q. And he made it with whom? A. I suppose he made it with Mr. Stanton. Q. How was he spoken of generally? what designation was given him? A. Mr. Stanton; I did not know there was a younger Stanton there, I did not know Mr. Stanton nor the boy. I made this agreement, and I will tell you how it proves that it is Mr. Stanton who is concerned. When I told Mr. Smith

I would not swear that I was worth $64,000, says you will go to Mr. Stanton, and get him to agree o swear me, I will become bondsman on the bond. went from me into Mr. Stanton's room; I stood in rotunda; he went in there; was gone from three ve minutes; came back again, and he says it is all t. Within ten minutes afterwards the papers had gressed so far that they went in to Mr. Stanton to e clearance made and the bond taken. We went here before Mr. Stanton; Mr. Stanton turned to Middleton and says, "Is this Mr. Middleton?" es," "Do you swear that you are worth the unt of this shipment (raising his hand)?" "I "Is this the bondsman (turning to me)?" "Yes, "Do you swear (raising his hand)?" "Yes, So we carried out the programme.

When all this infamy was made known to Presi- t LINCOLN, was Mr. STANTON ignominiously ex- ed from office? Not at all! He was permitted onorably resign. Why was he not arrested and risoned in Fort Lafayette? Who shall say? her, who shall deny that neither Mr. LINCOLN, or CHASE, or Mr. BARNEY dared touch one hair of NTON'S head? He knew too much! He could who were his accomplices and abettors, in the tched business of furnishing supplies to rebels, ing the day, and making Republican stump eches, in the evening, denouncing GEORGE B. CLELLAN.

During all this time, if Mr. THURLOW WEED is to believed, and reference can be had to his letters blished in his Albany Journal, Collector BARNEY

"Fold up his tents like the Arabs,
And quietly steal away."

In the meantime, corruption grew apace. An ap- liser was convicted of stealing merchandise, and nothing was done. LINCOLN, for some reason ed not move. The Republican politicians were rloining millions. At last, however, public opin- could be appeased no longer, and Mr. BARNEY s, just as the political canvass was coming on, per- uded by his confederates to give up his office and oid exposure, and save LINCOLN.

But who succeeded him? Here is touched another apter of Republican honesty and patriotism!

The facts of the blockade of the ports of the se- ded States by the loyal States, the capture by our vy of many valuable ships and their cargoes, and eir final judicial condemnation and sale as prizes war, are well known. In the early part of the bellion most of the prizes were sent by our gallant val officers into the port of New York for adjudi- tion and sale. This was of great commercial bene- to the city and State. But, at last, when the vy came to get their allotted share of the prizes, was found that a large portion of the proceeds had een pocketed, under one pretence and another, by R. LINCOLN'S loyal (?) office holders in New York. onspicuous among these men, who thus in effect onspired to rob our brave sailors of the just reward f many a night of anxious watching, were DISTRICT TTORNEY SMITH, MARSHAL MURRAY, MR. SIMEON RAPER, and a ring of gentlemen who managed to et themselves appointed appraisers, in almost every ase. The result of all these official practices was hat naval officers sent no more prizes to New York, nd a committee was appointed to investigate the ubject. During this investigation, charges of the ost serious character were made, and proved gainst MR. DRAPER, who had been appointed to be uctioneer of the prize vessels and their cargoes. He was accused of extortionate fees, of wrongfully deducting these fees from the proceeds of sales, and of keeping back government funds. His fees were so exorbitant that they excited the astonishment of everybody but those denounced by MR. UPTON as coöperating with him to represent his exactions as proper. The charges against MR. DRAPER cannot be better stated than in the language of MR. UPTON, who was counsel for the naval officers. He says:

Mr. Draper kept no separate bank account of the proceeds of the prize property. It was all mixed in with his own, and might at any time have been seized by his creditors.

The deposit of a fund so large, in his own name, even using the puerile disguise of the words "in trust," was certainly not the act of a cautious business man, if it was that of an honest one. That he did not promptly pay the fund when demanded is fully proved by witnesses and written papers of demand, notwithstanding the statements to the contrary of himself and son and clerk. Day after day and week after week, he retained large amounts of these moneys upon frivolous excuses, in spite of incessant demands for its payment by the marshal; and this was not the act of a faithful man.

That it was his habit to make fictitious bids at auction sales, thereby running an eager purchaser up beyond the fair price of the article sold, and thus committing a fraud upon him, and bringing the government sales into disrepute, is proved by the young man's confessions, as well as by other testimony; and this was not the act of an honest man, or of one whose "skill tended to promote the interests of the government."

In one case, sworn to by O'Donohue, it appears that Mr. Draper allowed a reclamation without the assent or action of any government official whatsoever, solely on his own responsibility; and it appears that he favored and urged with persistent pertinacity the first reclamation which was made in favor of a purchaser of prize property, and this may be regarded as the "causa sine qua non" of all the irregularities and frauds in such proceedings which succeeded.

The learned counsel says that Mr. Draper charged for his services the usual and customary commission. This is correct, for this—that the commission paid to auctioneers for the sale of merchandise of ordinary amounts and in the ordinary way, in ordinary times, cannot lay the basis of a custom for a commission on prize sales of enormous amounts in time of war, and where the auctioneer has no care, no custody, no responsibility. It is neither proper nor just to speak of a customary commission for such a service.

There has been nothing like a precedent in our community to establish such a custom. The truth is, he charged and retained an enormous and wholly unwarrantable, unprecedented, and exorbitant commission; a commission so utterly disproportioned to the trifling service performed, that it was, in truth, nothing short of an imposition—a shameless imposition—upon the Navy Pension Fund and the naval captors, of more than three fourths of the large sums retained. And when we think that the continuance of that imposition operating upon the very large amount of prize property in the district yet unsold, would have increased the sum retained by this auctioneer for his service to an amount not much, if any, short of one hundred thousand dollars, we cease to wonder at the desperate efforts made by him and his friends to coerce all parties into tame submission to his exactions, and the unworthy means resorted to by him and them to wreak revenge upon all such as could not be induced at his or their bidding to disobey the instructions they had received from their superiors, to violate their official obligations and quietly assent to the perpetration of his extortions.

But this is not all. The learned counsel seems to think that the law has now stepped in and made provision for the employment of the auctioneer and his compensation, this investigation has nothing now to act upon in the matter of this wrong, so far as Mr. Draper is concerned. Not so. It has been truly said, that one great purpose of this investigation is to ascertain what has become of the proceeds of the prize property. The testimony shows that Mr. Draper now has in his hands a sum amounting to nearly $3,500 belonging to the Navy Pension Fund and the captors, that he has retained this amount as his claimed 2½ per cent. commission out of the proceeds of sales made by him after the consent for its allowance no longer existed; that its allowance at any time was based solely upon consent and the taxation of the court; that the consent ceasing, the court has refused the taxation; and this sum, although demanded from him by the marshal, he has refused, and now refuses to return. How, in the face of this, can counsel seriously assert that there is nothing disclosed by this investigation militating against Mr. Draper?

As the counsel representing the interests of the captors in these causes in which the money has been thus retained, the undersigned respectfully asks if it comes within the sphere of the official duty of the Solicitor of the Treasury, that instructions may be given forthwith to the district attorney to take such steps as may be requisite to enforce the return of this money.

The testimony has proved that until the opposition arose to a continued compliance to the exorbitant impositions of Mr. Draper, the auctioneer, no complaints were ever heard of the character of those set forth in the document signed by Moses H. Grinnell as chairman of this committee; that the information upon which these statements were made all came from Draper; that Grinnell procured the employment of Draper as auctioneer; that Grinnell urged the district attorney to take such action as should insure the prize sales toDraper, with a commission of two and one half per cent.: that Grinnell is the personal, intimate friend of Draper; that after Grinnell had been informed that the Secretary of the Navy objected to the allowance of this enormous commission to Draper, and after he had become apprised that the district attorney had been instructed by his official superior, the Solicitor of the Treasury, to oppose the continued allowance of this enormous commission, he went to the district attorney and urged him to violate his official duty, to disregard his instructions and consent to such allowance; that to induce him thus to violate his duty and disregard his instructions, he furnished him with a certificate, signed by himself and others, stating that two and one half per cent. was the customary commission paid to an auctioneer for the sale of merchandise in New York; that one of the gentlemen (Mr. Minturn) who signed this certificate (and probably others) was not aware to what it was designed to apply, nor apprised for what purpose it was obtained; that so far from the truth is the statement of that certificate, that a gentleman of large experience, called as a witness from the insurance office of Mr. Grinnell himself, swears that one half of one per cent. would be the extent of a fair, reasonable, and customary commission paid to an auctioneer for performing the precise service performed by Mr. Draper, as detailed to him by the Solicitor; and his evidence is fully corroborated by that of other witnesses; that when the efforts of Mr. Draper and Mr. Grinnell proved unavailing to coerce the further allowance of this extraordinary depletion of the proceeds of prize property, then, and not till then, was heard the outcry of frauds and corruption, of robberies and peculations, and fraudulent reclamations; then, and not till then, were the ears of the Secretary of the Navy assailed with the charges from Draper and Grinnell against the Governme officials connected with adjudications and sales prize property; then, and not till then, were the new papers resorted to to fill the public mind with poiso ous suspicions that the captured property in this di trict was being absorbed by the ravenous spoliatio of a set of hungry vultures and sharks, and robber and then, and not till then, did Mr. Grinnell, und the advice and with the assistance of his friend, M Draper, constitute his committee of merchants (wh never met, and never organized, and never saw t written statement of charges signed by him, as cha man of the committee, to originate, direct, and co trol this organization).

Some idea may be formed of the amount of mone Mr. DRAPER thus withheld as fees, by his statemen (p. 31) that his commissions as auctioneer, from Augus 1861, to December, 1862, were THIRTY THOUSAN EIGHT HUNDRED AND ONE DOLLARS AND THIRTY-FIV CENTS. A pretty little sum, and not a small induce ment for sustaining the extraordinary pretension and assumptions of President LINCOLN!

Mr. JOURDAN, the Solicitor of the Treasury, wh has, within the last three years, earned a most u enviable notoriety, as a willing and most unscru pulous tool of the Administration in covering up th improper practices and frauds of Mr. LINCOLN' friends, vainly attempted, in his report, to palliat the corruptions in prize business, as Mr. HULBUR had made effort in the revenue transactions of BAR NEY, BUTLER, STANTON, and PALMER, but the Navy Department was too weak already, in public estima tion, to bear such a load of obloquy, and Mr. DRA PER, as punishment for his improper conduct an pecuniary greed, was removed from office, and de prived of such further opportunity to withhold th hard earned money of the brave officers and sailor of our gallant Navy, who have so often, in this civi war, borne the naval thunders of the Union in honor and in triumph.

But Mr. DRAPER'S removal, for cause, from one relation to the Government, was only to be followed by promotion to a better position. Comment is unnecessary!

It is not to be argued from all this record of official infidelity, that all members of the Republican organization are rogues, who look upon their country's woes as so many opportunities for enriching themselves. Far from it. The facts, however, do show that ABRAHAM LINCOLN cannot, or will not, in his administration of public affairs, call around him the integrity and ability of his party. He travels only in the circle of shameless and polluted partisans, who can be bribed by chances of plunder to abstain from just and loyal rebuke of his untold acts of folly and crime. If a man is known by the company he keeps, Mr. LINCOLN'S real character ought to deter honorable men, of all political parties, from giving countenance and support to his impudent pretensions for a reëlection. If all sense of public honor has not fled from among us, and if a free ballot box be not a thing of the past, a verdict of condemnation of ABRAHAM LINCOLN will be uttered in November which will stand as significant warning to all future Presidents.

ATTENTION, VOTERS!

NATIONAL DEMOCRATIC COMMITTEE

TO THE

PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES.

FELLOW-CITIZENS: It no longer admits of a doubt that the unscrupulous supporters of the present incumbent of the presidential chair have determined to employ for his reëlection to that high office a system of violence and fraud unknown before in our history.

They thereby admit that his honest, legal reëlection is impossible. Thereby they already confess defeat.

The polling of every Democratic and conservative vote in the loyal States will make his reëlection, even by violence and fraud, impossible. We beseech and exhort you to let nothing whatever prevent your casting that vote.

In the State of Indiana administration majorities have been manufactured by the indecent exhibition of thousands of illegal votes.

In Maryland, military force has been used to silence the Democratic press, and the Federal Government has dictated the institutions of a State.

In Tennessee, the Republican candidate for the Vice-Presidency, holding, by the appointment and at the pleasure of the President, a pro-consular office unknown to any law, and repudiated by Congress, has assumed the armed control of polls commanded by him to be opened; and the President of the United States, appealed to by the free citizens of that State to right such wrongs, has treated that appeal with coarse contempt.

Last of all, the legal right of the soldiers of the Republic freely to join with their fellow-citizens in the choice of a national Chief Magistrate is menaced and made a mockery. Their camps, thrown open to the political agents of the Administration, are sought to be closed to the legal representatives of the Democracy, under pretexts which leading organs of the Republican party find themselves compelled to denounce as insulting to the common-sense of the nation. The mails are violated to seize the votes that have been cast against him, and to place his own ballots in their stead; and when it had been discovered that the votes of the armies, which our candidate first organized and led to victory, were cast in great majority for their old commander, a plot was contrived to seize their votes, arrest the agents who had collected them, under pretense of punishing frauds which can only be discovered by inspectors of election with their poll-lists before them, which could only be committed and completed there, and which can justly be punished only under the stringent laws and by the officers of the States themselves.

In the presence of this odious and unexampled spectacle, the Democratic National Committee call upon all, of whatever name or party creed, lovers of liberty and the Union, now more truly than ever before "one and inseparable," to put forth all their strength in one final and triumphant effort for the salvation of both.

Wielding the most gigantic system of official patronage and corruption which the world has ever seen, the Administration, in whatever direction it turns, finds itself confronted by impending defeat.

Its open complicitly in acts of fraud and violence is a full confession that Abraham Lincoln's reëlection can not be accomplished by an honest appeal to the unbought will of a nation of freemen.

By such an appeal the reëlection of Abraham Lincoln can yet be prevented, in spite of fraud and violence. Such an appeal the Democratic National Committee now make to their fellow-citizens in all the States, but more especially to the thousands of true and loyal men who, in Maryland, in Indiana, in Ohio, in Kentucky, and in Missouri, now suffering in their persons, their feelings, and their property, from the reckless usurpations of the Executive and the chartered tyranny of his commissioned agents, have almost despaired of the Republic.

The Democracy never despairs of the Republic!

The party whose successive triumphs have marked the stages of the nation's greatness, triumphant now, can rescue the nation from the ruin wrought by the conspiracy of rebels at the South and fanatics at the North; can restore to her liberty, and order, and law, and plant her feet securely in the paths of republican empire.

The day-star of victory rose with the elections of September, in Maine. The subsiding deluge of fanaticism will once more bare the granite peaks of New-Hampshire to the sunshine of liberty. The State of John Stark and Daniel Webster will give her vote in November to the Union and the Constitution, to McClellan and Pendleton.

Connecticut, the ancestral home of our noble candidate, led by the spirits of a Trumbull, a Sherman, and an Ellsworth, pledges herself, by a clean majority in November, to assist in the salvation of the Republic.

Beyond peradventure is the result in the Empire State, in Pennsylvania, and in New-Jersey. There will be no break in the front of this great triple column in the grand army of the Union. The Keystone State redeemed herself in October; in November she will lead the redemption of the nation. New-Jersey stands where she has ever stood, in war and peace alike, true to the Union, the Constitution, and the Law.

The decisive vote of New-York, at the Chicago Convention, gave to the cause of the Union its candidate. In November, the decisive vote of New-York will herald the proclamation of that candidate as President of the Union, which, "at all hazards," he has sworn to preserve.

Gallant little Delaware—Maryland, tried, tempted, but alike unterrified and unseduced, and Kentucky, are surely with us.

Spurning with an equal scorn the treason and the tyranny which have once more made her rich and rural plains "a dark and bloody ground," the State of Kentucky stamps her proud foot, and swears she will be free.

Missouri, four years ago the garden of the further West, an empire in her teeming future, to-day our Mexico, ravaged in all her length and breadth by invaders and oppressors—what hope has Missouri save in the triumph of a soldier who can guard her borders, and of a statesman who can respect her will? Missouri will give her vote to the Union and the Constitution, to McClellan and Pendleton.

Illinois will stand by her sister of the Mississippi. Her vote is secure for the cause in which so many thousands of her sons have bled on a hundred battle-fields. The "Soldier State" of the West will have no more of Abraham Lincoln.

The fact that Indiana suffers under the rule of a Governor just reëlected to office by the most stupendous combination of political fraud with military force, can not shake our confidence in that noble State, which has carried the banner of Democracy triumphantly through many hard-fought battles.

In the elections of October, nearly forty thousand fraudulent votes given to the Republican candidates turned our legal victory there into an illegal defeat. It is not probable that these frauds can be repeated upon so colossal a scale in November, and if they be not so repeated, Indiana will, beyond a question, go for McClellan and Pendleton.

It is impossible, too, that the States lying around the head-waters of the great river of the continent should not vote to open the needful markets for their crops and their necessary highway to the seas.

Even from the Peninsular State, Michigan, (so strongly runs the patriotic and national tide,) our friends send us words of cheer, and bid us hope that the home of Lewis Cass, misrepresented so long in the National Congress by a Senator who longed for a "little blood-letting," may set itself right with the Union by a sound majority for McClellan and Pendleton.

The tide will roll to the shores of the Pacific. California and Oregon, bound to all our hearts and hearthstones by "the mystic chords of memory," can have nothing in common with the party whose leaders would fain long since have severed them from the Union. All that we hear from those golden cradles of empire promises us their voice and vote in November for our candidates and our cause.

With such signs and omens of victory, with the glorious recollections of the past, and the promises not less glorious of the future, to cheer us, what true man can now dare to falter or to fail in this crisis of our national fate?

Fellow-citizens, the peaceful remedy of such wrongs as Americans throughout all time to come shall blush to remember could be done in the sacred name of liberty upon American soil, is now within your reach.

The glorious and honorable termination of a war whose victories are all unharvested, since they have not been garnered together with the victories of peace, is now within your reach.

An end to the accumulation of a limitless debt, already mortgaging half the resources and the industries of a great people, is now within your reach.

The triumphant restoration of that magnificent national temple which our fathers reared to freedom and to justice, is now within your reach.

The madness of the men in power is an argument for more than hope. It is the homage of desperate ambitions to the gathering power of the people's will. The dread handwriting which they read upon the wall bids you press forward with decisive energy to the certain triumph now within your reach and grasp.

It is not much that your country asks of you; but all that you hold dear, all that you have or can hope to have of liberty, of peace, of prosperity, depends upon your giving to your country what your country now asks—wisdom to see your duty, courage to do it.

With you, under a benignant Providence, it rests to determine, by your votes on the eighth of November, the death or the life of the noblest Republic ever established among men.

AUGUST BELMONT, Chairman

FREDERICK O. PRINCE, Secretary.

Campaign Document No. 13.

Address of the National Democratic Committee.

THE PERILS OF THE NATION.

Usurpations of the Administration in Maryland and Tennessee.

THE REMEDY TO BE USED.

To the People of the United States:

The Democratic National Committee of the United States hold it to be their duty to call the attention of their fellow-countrymen, without distinction of party, to certain grave acts of usurpation and wrong now practised upon the citizens of Maryland and of Tennessee, but involving the dearest rights of all the people, in all the States, and the very existence of those constitutional remedies against executive wrong-doing, which have heretofore saved this nation from the convulsions through which popular liberty in other lands has been forced to assert, to maintain, and to extend its guarantees.

In the State of Maryland, on the thirtieth day of September, the Evening Post, a journal printed in the city of Baltimore, which had that day for the first time published the electoral ticket of the Democratic party of that State, was suppressed by the following order of Major-General Wallace, commanding the United States troops in that city:

Eighth Army Corps, Baltimore, September 30.
Editors of Evening Post:
As the surest means of preventing your office being made the subject of violence, you will discontinue the publication of your paper, the Evening Post.

The sole pretext for this order was the assertion that several soldiers, subject to the command of Major-General Wallace, intended to create a riot in the streets of Baltimore and to destroy the property of the suppressed journal, on account of a statement upon its bulletin-board, announcing as an item of news: "A fearful riot in Cincinnati, during which a Lincoln club procession from Kentucky fired upon the citizens, men, women, and children, several being killed and wounded."

Such a pretext for such an order is so manifestly disgraceful to the military officer who, in issuing it, confessed his inability to restrain soldiers of the national service from acts at once of military insubordination and of civil outrage, that it is impossible to believe he could have been continued, as he since has been in his command, by the President of the United States, had not the suppression of the Evening Post, which was the only Democratic journal published in Baltimore, been designed by the Executive, for the express purpose of depriving the political opponents of the existing Administration in that city of their sole means of advocating their opinions, and even of disseminating the information necessary to guide the voters of their party to intelligent action at the polls.

Maryland is a loyal State. To her fidelity President Lincoln, in his message to Congress on the twenty-fifth of December, 1861, bears this emphatic witness: "Her bridges and railroads are repaired and open to the government; she already gives seven regiments to the cause of the Union and none to the enemy; and her people, at a regular election, have sustained the Union by a larger majority and a larger aggregate vote than they ever before gave to any candidate on any question."

No enemy now treads her soil. The victorious advance of Sheridan has cleared even her furthest borders of all rebels in arms. Her people are as fully entitled to absolute freedom at the polls and in the discussion of all political questions as the people of Massachusetts or New-York.

To sanction an act by which they are shamelessly deprived of this freedom is a deliberate assumption by the Executive of his intention to perpetuate his authority by any exercise of arbitrary power in contempt of the popular will, and in violation of all the laws by which liberty in America has been hitherto protected.

All doubt as to the meaning of this conduct of the Executive in Maryland is put at an end by the simultaneous occurrence in the State of Tennessee of an act equally lawless, and equally eloquent of a settled purpose to retain the control of the resources and destinies of the people by means foreign to our institutions and fatal to our liberties.

On the thirtieth day of September, Andrew Johnson, a Brigadier-General of volunteers, holding, by appointment of the President, the office, unknown to our laws, of military governor of Tennessee; and, by the nomination of the Republican party, a candidate for the Vice-Presidency of the Union, issued a military order, commanding an election for the Presidency and Vice-Presidency to be held in that State, and prescribing arbitrary qualifications for voters at the election. This order is based on the proceedings of a political meeting which the military governor treats as a free convention of the people, absolutely subjected by the will of Mr. Lincoln to his authority; and in it the following oath is prescribed to be taken at the polls:

"I solemnly swear that I will henceforth support the Constitution of the United States, and defend it against the assaults of its enemies; that I am an active friend of the Government of the United States, and an enemy of the so-called Confederate States; that I ardently desire the suppression of the rebellion against the Government of the United States; that I sincerely rejoice in the triumph of the armies and navies of the United States, and in the defeat and overthrow of the armies, navies, and of all armed combinations in the interest of the so-called Confederate States; that I will cordially oppose all armistices or negotiations for peace with rebels in arms, until the Constitution of the United States, and all laws and proclamations made in pursuance thereof, shall be established over all the people of every State and Territory embraced within the national Union, and that I will heartily aid and assist the loyal people in whatever measures may be adapted for the attainment of those ends."

This oath is directly intended to deprive all loyal citizens of Tennessee, who may be constitutionally entitled to vote at all, of their right to support at the polls any policy for the suppression of the existing rebellion, save that which is advocated by Mr. Lincoln, by Mr. Johnson, and by the party sustaining them. That policy repudiates any issue of the war now waging, save the subjugation of the States in rebellion, and the abolition by the Federal power of the institution of slavery, and utterly forbids all negotiation, not only with the so-called Republic of the Confederate States, but with any single State, while a soldier remains in arms against the Union. The oath prescribed by the Republican candidate for the Vice-Presidency to the loyal citizens of Tennessee requires of them an absolute adhesion to this policy of his own party as the condition of their exercise of the most sacred right of citizenship. In other words, this oath commands every loyal citizen of Tennessee to vote for the Republican candidate or to abstain from the polls. Under the operation of this oath, any citizen who hold such views of the policy proper to be pursued toward the States in rebellion, as those put forth, for example, by the Hon. Charles Francis Adams, actually minister of the United States in London, would be disfranchised by the bayonets of the Executive in Tennessee.

"For one," said Mr. Adams in the House of Representatives, January 31, 1861, "I am not yet ready to take the responsibility of absolutely closing the door of reconciliation. I cannot persuade myself to forget the warnings that have descended to us from many of the wisest and best statesmen of all time against this rigid and haughty mode of treating great discontents. I cannot overlook the fact that in the days of our fathers the imperious spirit of Chatham did not feel itself as sacrificing any of its proud dignity, by proposing to listen to their grievances, and even to concede every reasonable demand long after they had placed themselves in armed resistance to all the power of Great Britain. Had George III. listened to his words of wisdom, he might have saved the brightest jewel of his crown.

"He took the opposite course. He denied the existence of grievances. He rejected the olive-branch. History records its verdict in favor of Chatham, and against the King."

Hundreds of thousands of citizens of the Union, without distinction of party, animated by a similar spirit, and drawing a like instruction from the lessons of history, believe, with General McClellan, in his letter accepting the presidential nomination, that,

> "So soon as it is clear or even probable that our present adversaries are ready for peace upon the basis of the Union, we should exhaust all the resources of statesmanship practised by civilized nations and taught by the traditions of the American people, consistent with the honor and interests of the country, to secure such peace reëstablish the Union and guarantee for the future the constitutional rights of every State. The Union is the one condition of peace; we ask no more."

All such citizens are outlawed in Tennessee by the arbitrary will of the Republican candidate for the Vice-Presidency, nor will any man be suffered by him to do the highest duty of a freeman unless he is ready to accept a policy which substantially recognizes the republic of the Confederate States, by refusing to the several States, now unhappily leagued together under that name, the right of returning to, and of making peace with their sister States of the Union.

Such is the necessary effect of this unprecedented course of the "military governor" of Tennessee, a course of which, in the words applied by two distinguished members of the Republican party, Senator Wade, of Ohio, and Representative Davis, of Maryland, to the conduct of President Lincoln in unlawfully creating another "military governor" for the State of Louisiana, it may be said is "without authority of law, and therefore void," a "blow at the rights of humanity and at the principles of republican government." This course the President has sanctioned, as he has sanctioned the course of Major-General Wallace in Maryland, therein again forgetting, to use the words of the same distinguished Republicans, his obligation "to confine himself to his executive duties; to obey and execute, not make the laws; to suppress by arms armed rebellion, and leave political reörganization to Congress."

"If the supporters of the government," Senator Wade and Representative Davis go on to say, "fail to insist on this, they become responsible for the usurpations which they fail to rebuke, and are justly liable to the indignation of the people whose rights and security committed to their keeping they sacrifice."

To this plain speaking of men eminent in the Republican party, we might well content ourselves with pointing the citizens of the United States, in the presence of these new and atrocious attempts upon the freedom of discussion and the sovereignty of the people. But we cannot forget that the very men who have so earnestly denounced executive usurpation in the past have now become its passive instruments and its silent apologists. This conquest of the last voices of constitutional liberty in the bosom of the Republican party by the seductions of power and of place, makes it imperative upon us to warn the people of America that the perils prefigured by such men as Senator Wade and Representative Davis are upon us to-day, and that they can only be conjured from the future of our country by the united and resolute action, not of the partisan supporters of a partisan government, but of a patriotic people combined for the defence of the Constitution and the laws.

The conduct of President Lincoln in Maryland and in Tennessee distinctly reveals a revolutionary purpose. The electoral votes of those States, eighteen in number, cast at the dictation of arbitrary power, may neutralize the same number of electoral votes freely and lawfully cast in other States of the Union. Upon those votes, therefore, the whole future of America may turn. To control those votes in the way attempted by Mr. Johnson, in Tennessee, and by General Wallace, in Maryland, is to plan a crime against liberty and the republic. We are fully aware of the gravity of this charge; but the rights, the interests, the issues here at stake are not less grave.

Again and again, for the past four years, Mr. Lincoln and his ministers, under one or another plea of military or political "necessity," have transcended the limits of executive authority, have trampled upon the sanctity of communal and individual right. It may well be doubted whether any government in the old world, claiming to hold its authority by Divine right, would have been permitted by any people of modern Europe to pursue its infractions of law and its contempt of liberty, so far as the American people, in their devotion to the Union, have suffered the administration of Mr. Lincoln to go.

But the patience of the American people has been the fruit of their traditional reliance upon the remedies provided by the Constitution—the right freely to speak their thoughts, freely to print their thoughts, and, above all, the inalienable right freely to choose and to change the agents of the public will.

Once before in our history, under the pressure of an imminent national danger, executive recklessness ventured upon infractions of popular right, tame and insignificant enough to-day beside these usurpations in Maryland and in Tennessee.

Then, however, though in the infancy of our constitutional experience, the wise devotion of the people to the principles of our national liberty triumphed over the assumption of power, and the "peaceful revolution" of 1801, under Thomas Jefferson, secured to us sixty years of freedom and of progress.

The ambition of Mr. Lincoln and his supporters now threatens the very remedies through which the "peaceful revolution" of 1801 was accomplished.

This revolutionary ambition has already been met by Senator Wade and Representative Davis in a temper as revolutionary, with a formal summons of the people to extreme and ulterior measures.

"If those voters turn the balance in his favor," they exclaim, "is it to be supposed that his competitor, defeated by such means, will acquiesce? . . . Let the people consider the remedy for these usurpations, and, having found it, fearlessly execute it."

The National Democratic Committee do not so far despair of the future of the Republic. They believe that the American people, armed with the majestic authority of the Constitution and the laws, will meet these beginnings of usurpation in the spirit and with the determination of their fathers; nor suffer executive ambition so far to corrupt the constitutional remedies of executive wrong-doing as to condemn this great and free people, in the immediate future, to the condition, and with the condition to the remedies, of the subject populations of the older world. AUGUST BELMONT, Chairman.

F. O. PRINCE, Secretary.

SPEECH OF A. OAKEY HALL, Esq.,

NEW-HAVEN, CONN.,

October 20th, 1864.

After a few playful introductory remarks pertinent to the locality, Mr. Hall continued in substance as follows:

LINCOLN ARRAIGNED.

I come to arraign for high political crimes and low partisan misdemeanors, the village politician who is Commander-in-Chief of the armies and navy of the United States. At this grave crisis of public affairs, we might lose sight of individuals were it not that in the instance before us it is the individual who originates measures. We might indeed forget the accumulation of his individual treacheries toward the Constitution were he about to retire of his own accord to private life. But being a candidate for reëlection, the country being in danger of yet newer and more astounding treacheries at his hands, it would be the part of mawkish sensibility to refrain from discussing the candidate as he deserves to be discussed. It is, therefore, more the candidate whom I arraign than the President.

HOW LINCOLN ARRAIGNED POLK.

I have high and appropriate precedent for so doing. In 1848, (see Congressional Globe, 1848,) Abraham Lincoln, representative from Illinois, in a speech against the Mexican war, used his proper privilege in arraigning President Polk, but in language severer than any I shall this night employ; although General Cass, and not Mr. Polk, was candidate at the time.

JEFF AND OLD ABE JOINT CRIMINALS.

I arraign candidate Lincoln upon a presentment substantially filed in the high electoral court by the grand-juries of the Democratic party, against two political criminals. It is a joint indictment—against Jefferson Davis and Abraham Lincoln. The law of bullets under Grant and Sherman are trying Davis; of them and him we have nothing to say to-night. We are content to let those tribunals alone. But the law of ballots under the Constitution is to try the other criminal on the eighth of November. That is the law for us and for our discussion.

VERDICT ASKED FOR AGAINST LINCOLN.

If the jury is not tampered with, I have no fears but the setting sun of that day will record in letters of fire this verdict: "Abraham Lincoln has been guilty of such high political felonies and low partisan misdemeanors, that he shall be forthwith condemned to be for ever after disqualified from holding any place of public trust or emolument under the Constitution which he has trampled upon and defied!"

LINCOLN'S CRIMES, FROM TREASON TO THIMBLE-RIGGING.

I shall take the offences of my arraignment by degrees, from the gravest to the meanest. There are, as you will find, sixteen in all, from treason to thimble-rigging.

HIS TREASON.

And first I arraign him for treason. This offence may be defined to be either (1) levying war against one's country, or (2) adhering to the enemies of one's country—giving them aid and comfort. Jeff Davis has committed treason by levying war. His treason is on trial before Grant and Sherman. Abraham Lincoln has adhered, since September, 1862, to the abolitionists, who are the Northern enemies of the United States, and he has daily, since, given them aid and comfort. Shall I be asked for witnesses? Shall I be reminded that overt acts are necessary to be specified? I might answer that as Lincoln has arrested men for paper treason, and condemned them without witnesses, he should not complain of like treatment! But he shall have both witnesses and specification. Let us select two overt acts—the Emancipation Proclamation and the "To-whom-it-may-concern" decree. From witnesses, let me select the only statesman left to the Republican party—Thurlow Weed. He thus testified in his celebrated letter taking leave of the Albany Journal:

THURLOW WEED TESTIFIES.

"We have been involved for nearly three years in an abolition war. The influence that drove North-Carolina and Tennessee from the Union extorted an emancipation proclamation; practical and effective only in giving union, strength, and determination to rebellion—a proclamation to which the first slave has not owed his freedom, for it is only operative where our armies go, and without it the armies would have gone faster and further. And let it be remembered that all the while these abolition demagogues and fanatics were aiding both rebellion and slavery. The North, united, (and free of incubus of abolitionism,) would have crushed rebellion, and with it the cursed institution which struck at and sought to divide the Union. If the South avert the punishment due to the great national crime of rebellion, they will owe their escape to the insanity of abolitionists. It is thus that antagonisms work together."

I did not three years ago mistake or magnify the evil of abolition influences; nor, though fiercely denounced, did I shrink from the duty of warning the people. What then was only prophetic is now history. Abolition influences in Congress and in the Cabinet have doubled the millions of dollars, and deepened the rivers of blood, spent and shed in a war which, so long as such influences and counsels sway the government, promises nothing but an interminable conflict or an inglorious termination.

SAD EFFECT OF LINCOLN'S TREASON.

When the first overt act of treason was committed, there was destroyed an era of good feeling. From April, 1861, to September, 1862, the Democratic party, subscribing to the Crittenden resolution of a war to defend the integrity of the Union, had laid upon the altar of patriotism ancient traditions and prejudices, and were supporting the government. The great thirty-five thousand Democratic majority city of New-York had poured out, through its Democratic Mayor, and councils, and bankers, treasure and soldiers. The North was united. The South was divided. The fell overt act reversed the position. It divided the North. It united the South. In the abstract, the proclamation was a piece of folly. Of course, slave property, like horse property, changed hands wherever military force captured it. We were all content with that. But the Democracy rightfully said, this is an entering wedge—this proclamation. It is the first act of giving aid and comfort to abolition enemies. It will be followed by others. It was so followed. Davis was exclaiming: "No peace without secession." Lincoln was vociferating: "No peace without abolition." Democracy said: "We are for peace with Union. Let secession and abolition perish together." And so went on the contest, until Lincoln sums up his treason in the "To-whom-it-may-concern," and McClellan summed up his fidelity to his country in his watchword of "Union at all hazards." Time will not permit me to argue this count of the arraignments. You must argue it for yourselves on an hundred other facts.

LINCOLN'S HOMICIDES.

I arraign candidate Lincoln for homicide; the homicide by culpable negligence, as defined by old lawyers—a form of manslaughter, indeed. Every soldier slain in the campaign to vindicate "my plan" of an overland march from the Rapidan to the James; every soldier killed in the Florida campaign to win a State government and a representative to the Baltimore Convention; each soldier who lies buried on the margins of the Red River, where General Banks led his cotton-gathering veterans; all soldiers sacrificed to the blunders of a civilian general who ——"never set a squadron in the field,

Nor the division of a battle knows
More than a spinster;"

and, alas! every brave Union volunteer who has lately been famished or fevered into a grave beside a Southern prison—each and all should have written upon the rude head-stone above him: "Slain by the culpable negligence of Abraham Lincoln." Because what profit even of subjugation, to say nothing of a profit toward restoring the Union, did the "my-plan" march, or the other campaigns, evolve? There was the most profitless slaughter in each. Victories! Ay! the bulletins said so. Accept them! There have, then, been bulletin victories enough; but how worthless is glory without results! The war, as one of desolation, of geographical occupation, of subjugation, of approximate annihilation, has been a dreadful success. But (in the spirit of the Chicago platform, so shamefully perverted by press and pulpit) as a war to restore the Union, it has been an experiment in the hands of Abraham Lincoln, and a diplomatic failure upon the valor of the slain.

"But, what good came of it at last?"
Quoth little Peterkin;
"Why, that I cannot tell," said he;
"But 'twas a famous victory!"

Yes, we have had victories enough; but where has been, and where save under McClellan will be, the statesmanship to turn them to account?

COLORED FAITH IMMURES AND SLAYS OUR PRISONERS.

Let me dwell for a moment on the homicide of our prisoners by the culpable negligence of Lincoln. Their fathers, sons, and brothers who are voters, will never sustain the homicide if they know the facts. Reduced to a single statement they read thus: "We have enough white confederate prisoners to exchange for all the white Union prisoners at the South, and yet leave an overplus in our hands for negotiation as to the balance." But the rebels have captured many thousand negroes, nearly all former slaves; and Mr. Lincoln refuses to negotiate unless the question of negro equality is first settled. This is the official evidence. I read from the record. [Mr. Hall then read the following extract from the official correspondence between Commissioner Ould, of Richmond, and General Butler and Solicitor Whiting:]

PECKSNIFF BUTLER SHEDS TEARS.

. . The wrongs, indignities, and privations suffered by our white soldiers would move me to consent to any thing to procure their exchange, except to barter away the honor and faith of the Government of the United States, which has been solemnly pledged to the colored soldiers (!) in her ranks.

(Signed) BENJAMIN F. BUTLER,
Major-General and Agent of Exchange.

. . All other questions between us may be postponed for future settlement, but the fair exchange of colored soldiers and of their white officers will be insisted on by the government before another rebel soldier or officer will be exchanged.

WILLIAM WHITING,
Solicitor of the War Department.

HOW LINCOLN PETS NEGRO SOLDIERS.

The spirit which accompanies this culpable homicide of white prisoners to sustain faith pledged to colored soldiers (!) may be further illustrated by an extract from an order of Adjutant General Thomas:

The incorporation into the army of the United States of colored troops renders it necessary that they should be brought as speedily as possible to the highest state of discipline. Accordingly, the practice which has hitherto prevailed, no doubt from necessity, of requiring these troops to perform most of the labor on fortifications, and the labor and fatigue duties of permanent stations and camps, will cease; and they will only be required to take their fair share of fatigue duty with the white troops. By order of the Secretary of War,

L. THOMAS, Adjutant-General.

HOW LINCOLN BURNS SHIPS—ARSON.

I arraign candidate Lincoln for the offence of arison on the high seas. It is a leading principle in law: "Who does by another does that thing himself." Who has kept the ex-Hartford postmaster in office as Secretary of the Navy, while more than two hundred ships, with cargoes, have been burned on the high seas? True, neither Lincoln nor Welles fired them. But they particularly offered a premium for the arson by neglecting to avail themselves of the fast ships, brave men, and enterprise that abounded. Let every Connecticut voter redeem his State from the disgrace of Gideon Welles!

LINCOLN'S BURGLARIES.

I arraign Lincoln for burglary! When, in the dead of night, armed men broke into and entered the house of Vallandigham — a civilian, resident in a district over which martial law had not been declared—and, without any warrant but an order primarily proceeding from Lincoln, not only kidnapped the householder, but rifled his drawers of papers, then and there burglary was in every sense committed. When the office of Congressman Voorhees was broken into, entered, and rifled of correspondence by primary order of Lincoln, then the crime was repeated. Worse than all, when the mansion of George F. Thompson, a former writer for the Daily News, was entered, in my own city, at night, and his papers seized, and he himself carried off secretly to the Old Capitol Prison by the express orders of Lincoln, not only burglary transpired, but the crime of kidnapping.

LINCOLN'S KIDNAPPING.

Kidnapping! Why, in arraigning Mr. Lincoln for that crime, I need scarcely specify times, places, persons, incidents; they are so numerous. Our children require no longer to read the chronicles of the Bastile in search of thrilling annals of this crime. The deeds of French kings and Austrian despots sink into commonplace before the kidnapping successes of Lincoln. Lettres de cachet lose all dramatic effect beside the telegrams of the President in the case of Colonel Wolford—that brave Kentucky soldier who put himself into the breach of a war for the Union against even family and friends, to be rewarded by imprisonment of the most arbitrary character for the offence of making a political speech distasteful to Lincoln. In old French and English times, orders of commitment to Bastile and Tower, were at least in writing, and sealed and countersigned and put on record. In Lincoln's day, men have been discovered in forts who knew not their accusers, and who, when released without charge or trial, could discover no scrap of paper in existence touching their apprehension or confinement!

LINCOLN'S FALSE IMPRISONMENTS.

And then, how many offences of trespass to persons and property these kidnappings include! How many assaults! That most accomplished journalist and man of unblemished character, William C. Prime, of the Journal of Commerce, has furnished me with a resume of editorial outrages that classify under these offences. He has compiled them with great care, and I myself have verified them with dates and places.

FEARFUL STATISTICS OF PRESS OUTRAGES.

One hundred and fifty-five newspaper offices and editors have been interfered with by Abraham Lincoln! He who rode into power under the hypocritical cries of free press, free speech, free ballot, and resistance to executive usurpations! Cries that were comparative abstractions in 1860; cries now belonging to Democracy, because become dread realities; and not those, as it has turned out they were in Lincoln's mouth, of mere agitation! Of these one hundred and fifty-five, fifty-two offices were mobbed by Lincoln rioters; forty-three papers were suppressed by express orders of Lincoln; to fifteen mail privileges were refused; twenty-two editors were arrested, but graciously released without imprisonment; twenty more were actually confined in military prisons; three editors were banished from the United States, one, the editor of the Ohio Watchman, became a maniac through his confinement. No wonder, then, that Owen Lovejoy died about the time the outrages on The World and Journal culminated. He could observe how was thus desecrated and foresworn the principle of free press for which his brother was slain in 1837 at Alton, Illinois, for which he had earnestly pleaded. Was not Lovejoy an honest and consistent fanatic, and one of moral courage? Did he not move and carry a vote of thanks to McClellan for "accomplishing great results at little expense of human life"?

THREE HISTORICAL PAINTINGS ABOUT LINCOLN.

In the Capitol at Washington are many vacant spaces for historical paintings. Some years hence, when the abolition madness of the hour shall have passed away, and Abraham Lincoln stands revealed in all his political deformity, let some painter fill one of them with a warm and glowing canvas depicting the Baltimore editor vainly waiting in the White House entry-way, with a letter of a United States Senator in his hand as a credential to see the President, and to know why that President had arrested and imprisoned him! Let that artist next also hang by its side another canvas displaying the President's lackey insulting Mrs. Surgeon-General Hammond, by returning, at his master's order, her card, as she vainly endeavored to seek that presence which has been so free to Frederick Douglas and colored clergymen! By all means let the artist add yet a third canvas, depicting Abraham Lincoln—treasoner, homicide, arsoner, burglar, and kidnapper, that we have shown him to be—in the act of saying to the representative of the loyal men of Tennessee, who protested against Andy Johnson's test-oath, "May I inquire how long it took you and the New-York politicians to concoct that paper?" or "I expect to let the friends of George B. McClellan manage their side of this contest in their own way, and I will manage my side of it in my own way." Thus portrayed upon canvas, no man could accuse me of harshness when I style Abraham Lincoln the vulgar village politician disgracing the dignified rôle of chief magistrate!

LINCOLN ROBS HAWLEY D. CLAPP.

What is the next offence for arraignment? Robbery in the second degree. The obtaining of value through fear of injury to person, reputation, or family. How many men immured in military prisons without warrant, written charges, or process of commitment, have, when demoralized in mind by their confinement, signed in favor of Lincoln's administration receipts or orders for transfers of property! I mention out of many one case. From that learn the whole: Hawley D. Clapp, late host of the Everett House, New-York, was arrested, charged with obtaining large sums of money from recruits by undue means. Every formality of arrest omitted in his case, except that he was transferred from the custody of the United States Marshal to Fort Lafayette on the order of an aid-de-camp! He may have been guilty. I do not argue the question. I only know that the law presumes innocence until guilt is proved. In this case there was no trial, nor attempt at it. For several months Clapp languishes in the prison that, so oddly under its recent uses, bears the honored name of him who overthrew bastiles—Lafayette—he who gave the key of the Paris prison of horrors to Washington as a memento sacred to a victory of freedom! Then, as a means of release, he pays over a large sum of money to Lincoln's agents. Why? Under what means? Through the duress of his imprisonment. What became of the money? It did not belong to the Government. Was it taken from recruits? Was it ever repaid to them? Was it possible to know whom it belonged to? Shall it be said the payment was a confession of guilt? What of the rack-confessions, of thumb-screw acknowledgments, of admissions under torture? Can you gauge the effect of imprisonment? Is it alike to every man? The hair of him of Chillon did not turn white of a single night, and yet to him,

> "At last men came to set me free,
> I asked not why and recked not where."

Gentlemen, Hawley D. Clapp, untried, is, in the eye of the law, innocent. And the money extorted from him was as plain a case of robbery by the common law as if it had been taken by a Fra Diavolo instead of by the leader of a lawless political party!

LINCOLN'S PERJURY ON INAUGURAL OATH.

How the offences intensify as we proceed with the arraignment! Perjury! When Abraham Lincoln placed military necessity, in districts where courts were open, above the Constitution, did he or not break his official oath? His oath to preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution instead of violating it! How was it with the hand which wrote divers decrees and framed laws—the hand of him who is an executive, and not a legislator? Did that hand in so doing register a perjury? That hand which had on the fourth of March, 1861, touched the sacred volume presented by the lamented Taney in the presence (as it were) of two parties, standing angrily face to face inviting civil war! Perjury! 'Tis a hard word. But what have said Wade and Davis? Are the witnesses under Democratic subpœna? Although they have not written nor spoken that dread word against Lincoln, cannot he who runs read it in their manifesto? What are Lincoln's orders for test-oaths but perjuries against his constitutional obligations affirmed to on inauguration-day? And are there voters confidingly numerous enough to put him next March to the same farce of an oath in front of the Capitol after all these things? And yet you have only selections.

LINCOLN'S BLASPHEMY, PROFANITY, AND OBSCENITY.

He who can commit perjury is capable of blasphemy and profanity. Indeed, these are but steps to that more deliberate crime. I arraign him for those common law offences. I call Horace Greeley's paper as a witness.

GREELEY ON THE WITNESS-STAND.

It is not many weeks since its columns editorially admitted that the President had said of McClellan: "He is hell on a parade." Blasphemies! Whose order tore the aged Roman Catholic Bishop of Natchez from the very altar of God? Abraham Lincoln's.

LINCOLN'S BAYONET RELIGION.

Who made martial law the law of the Episcopal rubric, and exiled clergymen who refused to pray for Lincoln? Was there ever before a king or potentate who forced a form of religious prayer at the point of the bayonet? Or enforced ecclesiastical discipline with a file of swearing soldiers? What answers the field of Antietam, which listened to the singing, amid the fresh solemnities of the battle-field, of a negro song at the express request of President Lincoln when riding over it?

LINCOLN'S RIBALDRY AT ANTIETAM.

One who heard him ask for the song, who shuddered as he heard the request; one who listened to the singing and sorrowed within him as he did so, narrated to me the circumstance. If President Lincoln or Mr. Marshal Lamon will deny it, I pledge myself to produce that eye-and-ear witness. Men of the State of Dwight and Edwards, this is the chosen leader of a party who claims a patent for piety and patriotism! Who demands a special property in the flag! Who claims exclusive proprietary interest in every victory! Who answers alike ugly facts and convincing logic with the parrot-cry of, "Stand off, Copperhead, for we are holier than thou art!" Obscenity is a lower order of the crime under observation.

LINCOLN'S OBSCENITY.

Is Lincoln guilty of that? Join any mess-room of congressmen and ask them. Buy the jest-book "fresh from Abraham's bosom," and ask that. If any responsible man denies it in print, witnesses will rise up in the salons of Washington, thickly as armed men sprang from the dragon's teeth sowed of old by Cadmus! What else could be expected of one inexperienced in society, and whose daily associates vulgarized natural filthiness of thought; of one whose antecedents were thus portrayed — prophetically so—by a contemporary, the Hon. J. N. Morris, of Illinois, in a speech delivered June 19, 1860, during the first canvass for Lincoln? (See page 462 of part four of Congressional Globe of that year.)

A CONGRESSMAN PREDICTED IT ALL.

"Elect Lincoln, and let the fact be announced that a hostile enemy has landed upon our shores, or that States have rebelled against the authority of the general government, and in all probability he would go on telling some anecdote or finishing a game of sport on the public grounds in front of the White House! Upon the death of a monarch, who ever thought of putting the KING'S JESTER on the throne?"

A MAC AND OLD ABE CONTRAST.

And yet some of the American people are hesitating whether to prefer to keep this jester on the throne to placing in the Democratic chair of Washington, of Jefferson, and of Jackson, the reticent gentleman and courageous Christian soldier and statesman of foresight, George B. McClellan! And yet such is the man who was forced as a candidate, it is said by many of my old Republican friends, on their party; whom they despise and yet must vote for, because he —this man of blasphemy and obscenity—represents a "principle!"

BRIBERY AND THE BLAIRS.

I arraign him in this connection for bribery. He sent—said the younger Blair—a proposition to Grant to give McClellan a command. I came —said the elder Blair—to see McClellan to offer him a command if he would refuse the presidency. What was this but bribery, the offence of persuading to, or dissuading from duty, by a gift? Lincoln, it is true, has here filed a special plea in bar, as lawyers say. But putting the confessions of the younger (whose "time had come") with the admissions of the elder, (whose time is yet to come,) what sane juror will refuse to say that Lincoln knew of the bribe? And what a dilemma it puts Lincoln in!

LINCOLN'S PARTISAN DILEMMA.

General McClellan is fit to be in the field, or he is not. If he is fit, then shame on Lincoln, who, for two years has kept him out. If he is not fit, then the Blair confessions make Lincoln jeopardize the country by giving command to an unfit soldier in order to promote his own political interests! In other words, that Lincoln stands convicted of preferring party to country. Lincoln always compromises party interests, and can negotiate to procure partisan peace for a bleeding army of office-holders! But he cannot compromise for the good of a bleeding nation!

LINCOLN COMMITTED TO COMPROMISE.

And yet he is the only man who has compromised with the South. Did he not try confederate sailors as pirates? (I refer to the Savannah case.) And after a failure to convict, under the leadership for the prisoners of James T. Brady, (who is never so really Brady unless he is against oppression and wrong,) did he not exchange them as prisoners of war under threat of retaliation? The probable Chief-Justice of the United States, William M. Evarts, thought they were pirates. Very humbly, I thought not. Perhaps, however, they were; nevertheless, many who believed them pirates deemed it a wise compromise on the part of the War Department to give them up in exchange. Ah! Lincoln will soon enough compromise, when the Democratic party have fought his placemen and myrmidons out of power and plunder, by its ballots!

LINCOLN'S ADMINISTRATION EMBEZZLEMENTS.

This word plunder brings me to count the eleventh of the indictment. It is for embezzlements and peculations. Shall I stop to cite cases or call witnesses before an intelligent audience who read newspapers and treasury reports? No! So I pass to the next crime of Lincoln's; the obtaining of money by false pretences.

HOW LINCOLN OBTAINS MONEY BY FALSE PRETENCES.

In 1861 he wanted money and sent Chase to the New-York banks. The loans thus obtained saved Washington and the national credit. The money was given on the faith of a war for the Union. Lincoln not only broke faith in the matter with the moneyed interests, by changing the war into one for abolition, desolation, extermination, and subjugation, but he inaugurated treacherous attacks on these very banks by establishing national pet institutions and annoying the State banks by vexatious taxations. Lincoln, in 1863, levied a tax of three per cent on incomes of that year ending December. Six months after the year had passed, (and the tax had been collected and incomes adjusted, or perhaps surplus spent upon the faith of prior representations,) a retroactive tax of five per cent additional is added for the same time. Was not the three per cent collected under false pretences? Have you ever compared the backs of the two issues of postage currency? Upon the first you find, "Receivable for all dues less than five dollars;" upon the last issue is added the words, "except customs." Well, by true construction of language, the additional words created an exception which did not previously exist. Yet, although the currency first obtained popularity because receivable for fractional custom-house dues, and at first so taken, it was shortly disallowed, and faith broken. I call all these things the obtaining of money and credit by false pretences and tokens!

LINCOLN'S RECORD FORGERIES.

I arraign Lincoln for forgery. One class of forgery is the alteration of figures, accounts, and statistics of a pecuniary nature in order to deceive creditors. Who so great a debtor in the world as these United States? Who has so shamefully taxed upon the credulity of creditors by falsifying, from time to time, the figures of the national debt account, as Abraham Lincoln? Nor will I stop to argue this, because the newspapers and money-articles of the press have anticipated me fully.

HE IS GUILTY OF MAYHEM.

I arraign him for a species of mayhem. This is to be defined, for popular purposes, malicious mutilation of the person. Let me read you this order from a deputy of Commander-in-Chief Lincoln:

PROCESS OF BRANDING SOLDIERS.

PROVOST-MARSHAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, D. C., Aug. 19, 1864.

Circular.

DOCTOR: In addition to my suggestion to mark all rejected recruits and substitutes, I would suggest that all accepted recruits and substitutes be marked thus, "I," in the small of the back. This will, I think, prevent, to a great extent, the practice of bounty-jumping.

Yours, etc., J. H. BAXTER, Surgeon.
U. S. V., Chief Medical Officer Provost-Marshal General's Bureau.

How was this marking done? By the use of lunar caustic. Suits are now pending in New-York and New-Jersey for assaults of this kind. There are doubtless others. What an indignity! And from the leader of the party who has waxed eloquent over scars upon the negro's back! I am against all scarring, whether of bond or free. But, above all, of the citizen, and voter, and soldier. Just heaven! has citizenship come to this—that we hold not only personal liberty and property, but the very sacredness of person—God's image—at the will of Lincoln and his surgeons? Paul cried, "I am a Roman citizen," and the fasces of the lictor were staid. Time was, when the call, "I am an American citizen," was heard from the deck of an Austrian frigate, and when Ingraham dared, and Marcy approved, to make the cry of Koszta not in vain. Shall that cry ever be again potent? Then elect McClellan, and to an ignominious electoral outlawry with this brander who occupies the presidential chair!

THE MISDEMEANOR OF OBSTRUCTING JUSTICE.

Abraham Lincoln has committed that heinous common law crime of "obstructing the course of government and justice." He suspended habeas corpus before Congress gave him power —conceding, for the brevity of argument, that they possessed it. He has declared martial law over civil districts. He has ordered the process of courts to be contemned. He has interfered with elections. Lincoln meditates, as the signs of the times clearly indicate, yet fresher obstructions of government and justice. Have you ever read Kinglake's exposition of Napoleon's coup d'état? If so, you will remember how thrillingly he precedes the main event by an account of Napoleon's defeating, for the presidency, General Cavaignac, the former idol of the soldiery.

LINCOLN AND NAPOLEON III. CONTRASTED.

You will recall the after-process by which, under aid of bayonets, Napoleon strangled the French nation in the night by a proclamation, and became Emperor. He had his Morny and Maupas; Lincoln has his Stanton and Holt. Napoleon had generals, prefets, and sub-prefets to do his bidding. Lincoln has more than these, and as despotic officers. Napoleon placed thirty-two departments under martial law during his election. Lincoln has thirty-two territorial divisions "called" States. O men of Connecticut! do you wish to see how a parallel might be made hereafter (I will not say this year) should Lincoln be reëlected — he, this obstructor of government and justice—then take that volume of Kinglake, and at page 197 read it, and prepare against such usurpations.

THIMBLE-RIGGING.

Time fails me, I perceive, to classify the misdemeanors which I intended to arrange under the word thimble-rigging. But examples will occur to you: those connected with a Chicago Committee and the Pope's bull against the comet; the letters to Fremont and Hunter; the letter to Greeley; the peninsular performances, also, at the expense not only of "Little Mac," but of the country. Alas for the land under the thimble-rigging of this little joker against "Little Mac!" was not that a sorry perfection of thimble-rigging which was done with Blenker's division and with McDowell's corps? How many, many thimbles Lincoln has used in his cunning art! Cameron, Chase, and Blair, Hunter, Fremont, Burnside, Hooker, Meade, Halleck, Hitchcock, Sigel, Butler, Banks—but let your memories complete the list; I do not wish to be too personal. What was the peace negotiation, through the Canadian back-door of the Union, but a game of thimble-rigging. Or that through the cellar-door of the Confederacy at Richmond —Sanders, Jewett, Hay, and Greeley, as the Canadian players with the thimbles—Davis, Benjamin, Jaquess, and Gillmore as the performers beyond the intrenchments of James River. Two historical groups—with Lincoln in each background as the thimble-rigger!

But enough. My aim has been rather to outline these crimes and misdemeanors of candidate Lincoln to the jury of voters, and leave them to the greater filling out with facts and dates, so readily attainable in this newspaper day.

LINCOLN'S CONGRESSIONAL ABSOLUTION.

No wonder that when wary politicians, like Colfax and Forney, came to survey these crimes, they caused Congress to pass an act which should attempt in advance to nole pros. this indictment—almost as bad for its Lincolnian duplicity, repugnancy, and multifariousness. Let me read it. It should have been entitled: "An Act to License Presidential Wrongs:"

SEC. 4, March 3, 1863, Chapter 81, Laws of 37th Congress—"And be it, etc., that any order of the President, or under his authority, made at any time during the existence of the present rebellion, shall be a defence in all courts to any action or prosecution, civil or criminal, pending or to be commenced, for any search, seizure, arrest, or imprisonment made, done, or committed, or acts omitted to be done under and by virtue of such order, or under color [?] of any law of Congress; and such defence may be made by special plea, or under the general issue."

LINCOLN PERSONALLY DISSECTED.

Were the policies of Mr. Lincoln's party ever so pure and certain, ever so sure of beneficial results, and I approved of them, I would not trust them four years longer in his hands after the experience of the past three years. There has been no such cunning trickster since the days of Burr; and Burr was at least a gentleman and a scholar! Not even Tyler was so inordinately vain of power. He exercises it as recklessly as Bomba did! He is surrounded by more dangerous men than ever haunted the ante-rooms of the imbecile Louis XIII.! I profoundly pity the rebels under the despotism of Davis. Yet that is at least an educated, intelligent, and respectable despotism. It acts within the forms of law and constitutions. The despotism of centralized power which Lincoln is establishing is a vulgar and debasing despotism — one which appeals to the fears of the pocket for its supremacy; and relies upon purse and sword at a usurpation over free ballot and Constitution.

GOOD MEN MAKE GOOD GOVERNMENTS.—McCLELLAN.

Apart, therefore, from any discussion of platforms or principles, I am, on the question of persons, for McClellan and against Lincoln. The author of the Harrison's Bar letter, the man who asked "if he could not lead his army, to be at least allowed to share their fate on the field of battle;" the general who begged his malicious foe to "say a good word for the army, but nothing about himself;" the hero who forgot his grief, to save Washington at South-Mountain and Antietam; the writer of the letter of presidential acceptance—he is to Lincoln as Hyperion to Satyr; he can be safely trusted with the reins of power; he has never yet abused a trust or a confidence; he will not now.

All history informs us that—talk as we may about policies, expediencies, platforms, or principles of administration—they made the best rulers who were the bravest and noblest of men. These constitute the State! "Men, high-minded men, who their duties know; who know their rights, and, knowing, dare maintain, prevent the long-aimed blow, and crush the tyrants while they rend the chain."

Campaign Document No. 13.

Address of the National Democratic Committee.

THE PERILS OF THE NATION.

Usurpations of the Administration in Maryland and Tennessee.

THE REMEDY TO BE USED.

To the People of the United States:

The Democratic National Committee of the United States hold it to be their duty to call the attention of their fellow-countrymen, without distinction of party, to certain grave acts of usurpation and wrong now practised upon the citizens of Maryland and of Tennessee, but involving the dearest rights of all the people, in all the States, and the very existence of those constitutional remedies against executive wrong-doing, which have heretofore saved this nation from the convulsions through which popular liberty in other lands has been forced to assert, to maintain, and to extend its guarantees.

In the State of Maryland, on the thirtieth day of September, the Evening Post, a journal printed in the city of Baltimore, which had that day for the first time published the electoral ticket of the Democratic party of that State, was suppressed by the following order of Major-General Wallace, commanding the United States troops in that city:

Eighth Army Corps, Baltimore, September 30.
Editors of Evening Post:

As the surest means of preventing your office being made the subject of violence, you will discontinue the publication of your paper, the Evening Post.

The sole pretext for this order was the assertion that several soldiers, subject to the command of Major-General Wallace, intended to create a riot in the streets of Baltimore and to destroy the property of the suppressed journal, on account of a statement upon its bulletin-board, announcing as an item of news: "A fearful riot in Cincinnati, during which a Lincoln club procession from Kentucky fired upon the citizens, men, women, and children, several being killed and wounded."

Such a pretext for such an order is so manifestly disgraceful to the military officer who, in issuing it, confessed his inability to restrain soldiers of the national service from acts at once of military insubordination and of civil outrage, that it is impossible to believe he could have been continued, as he since has been in his command, by the President of the United States, had not the suppression of the Evening Post, which was the only Democratic journal published in Baltimore, been designed by the Executive, for the express purpose of depriving the political opponents of the existing Administration in that city of their sole means of advocating their opinions, and even of disseminating the information necessary to guide the voters of their party to intelligent action at the polls.

Maryland is a loyal State. To her fidelity President Lincoln, in his message to Congress on the twenty-fifth of December, 1861, bears this emphatic witness: "Her bridges and railroads are repaired and open to the government; she already gives seven regiments to the cause people, at a regular election, have sustained the Union by a larger majority and a larger aggregate vote than they ever before gave to any candidate on any question."

No enemy now treads her soil. The victorious advance of Sheridan has cleared even her furthest borders of all rebels in arms. Her people are as fully entitled to absolute freedom at the polls and in the discussion of all political questions as the people of Massachusetts or New-York.

To sanction an act by which they are shamelessly deprived of this freedom is a deliberate assumption by the Executive of his intention to perpetuate his authority by any exercise of arbitrary power in contempt of the popular will, and in violation of all the laws by which liberty in America has been hitherto protected.

All doubt as to the meaning of this conduct of the Executive in Maryland is put at an end by the simultaneous occurrence in the State of Tennessee of an act equally lawless, and equally eloquent of a settled purpose to retain the control of the resources and destinies of the people by means foreign to our institutions and fatal to our liberties.

On the thirtieth day of September, Andrew Johnson, a Brigadier-General of volunteers, holding, by appointment of the President, the office, unknown to our laws, of military governor of Tennessee; and, by the nomination of the Republican party, a candidate for the Vice-Presidency of the Union, issued a military order, commanding an election for the Presidency and Vice-Presidency to be held in that State, and prescribing arbitrary qualifications for voters at the election. This order is based on the proceedings of a political meeting which the military governor treats as a free convention of the people, absolutely subjected by the will of Mr. Lincoln to his authority; and in it the following oath is prescribed to be taken at the polls:

"I solemnly swear that I will henceforth support the Constitution of the United States, and defend it against the assaults of its enemies; that I am an active friend of the Government of the United States, and an enemy of the so-called Confederate States; that I ardently desire the suppression of the rebellion against the Government of the United States; that I sincerely rejoice in the triumph of the armies and navies of the United States, and in the defeat and overthrow of the armies, navies, and of all armed combinations in the interest of the so-called Confederate States; that I will cordially oppose all armistices or negotiations for peace with rebels in arms, until the Constitution of the United States, and all laws and proclamations made in pursuance thereof, shall be established over all the people of every State and Territory embraced within the national Union, and that I will heartily aid and assist the loyal people in whatever measures may be adapted for the attainment of those ends."

This oath is directly intended to deprive all loyal citizens of Tennessee, who may be constitutionally entitled to vote at all, of their right to

sion of the existing rebellion, save that which is advocated by Mr. Lincoln, by Mr. Johnson, and by the party sustaining them. That policy repudiates any issue of the war now waging, save the subjugation of the States in rebellion, and the abolition by the Federal power of the institution of slavery, and utterly forbids all negotiation, not only with the so-called Republic of the Confederate States, but with any single State, while a soldier remains in arms against the Union. The oath prescribed by the Republican candidate for the Vice-Presidency to the loyal citizens of Tennessee requires of them an absolute adhesion to this policy of his own party as the condition of their exercise of, the most sacred right of citizenship. In other words, this oath commands every loyal citizen of Tennessee to vote for the Republican candidate or to abstain from the polls. Under the operation of this oath, any citizen who hold such views of the policy proper to be pursued toward the States in rebellion, as those put forth, for example, by the Hon. Charles Francis Adams, actually minister of the United States in London, would be disfranchised by the bayonets of the Executive in Tennessee.

"For one," said Mr. Adams in the House of Representatives, January 31, 1861, "I am not yet ready to take the responsibility of absolutely closing the door of reconciliation. I cannot persuade myself to forget the warnings that have descended to us from many of the wisest and best statesmen of all time against this rigid and haughty mode of treating great discontents. I cannot overlook the fact that in the days of our fathers the imperious spirit of Chatham did not feel itself as sacrificing any of its proud dignity, by proposing to listen to their grievances, and even to concede every reasonable demand long after they had placed themselves in armed resistance to all the power of Great Britain. Had George III. listened to his words of wisdom, he might have saved the brightest jewel of his crown.

"He took the opposite course. He denied the existence of grievances. He rejected the olive-branch. History records its verdict in favor of Chatham, and against the King."

Hundreds of thousands of citizens of the Union, without distinction of party, animated by a similar spirit, and drawing a like instruction from the lessons of history, believe, with General McClellan, in his letter accepting the presidential nomination, that,

> "So soon as it is clear or even probable that our present adversaries are ready for peace upon the basis of the Union, we should exhaust all the resources of statesmanship practised by civilized nations and taught by the traditions of the American people, consistent with the honor and interests of the country, to secure such peace reestablish the Union and gufarantee for the future the constitutional rights of every State. The Union is the one condition of peace; we ask no more."

All such citizens are outlawed in Tennessee by the arbitrary will of the Republican candidate for the Vice-Presidency, nor will any man be suffered by him to do the highest duty of a freeman unless he is ready to accept a policy which substantially recognizes the republic of the Confederate States, by refusing to the several States, now unhappily leagued together under that name, the right of returning to, and of making peace with their sister States of the Union.

Such is the necessary effect of this unprecedented course of the "military governor" Tennessee, a course of which, in the words a plied by two distinguished members of the R publican party, Senator Wade, of Ohio, an Representative Davis, of Maryland, to the co duct of President Lincoln in unlawfully creatin another "military governor" for the State Louisiana, it may be said is "without authorit of law, and therefore void," a "blow at th rights of humanity and at the principles of re publican government." This course the Presi dent has sanctioned, as he has sanctioned the course of Major-General Wallace in Maryland therein again forgetting, to use the words of the same distinguished Republicans, his obligation "to confine himself to his executive duties; to obey and execute, not make the laws; to suppress by arms armed rebellion, and leave political reorganization to Congress."

"If the supporters of the government," Senator Wade and Representative Davis go on to say, "fail to insist on this, they become responsible for the usurpations which they fail to rebuke, and are justly liable to the indignation of the people whose rights and security committed to their keeping they sacrifice."

To this plain speaking of men eminent in the Republican party, we might well content ourselves with pointing the citizens of the United States, in the presence of these new and atrocious attempts upon the freedom of discussion and the sovereignty of the people. But we cannot forget that the very men who have so earnestly denounced executive usurpation in the past have now become its passive instruments and its silent apologists. This conquest of the last voices of constitutional liberty in the bosom of the Republican party by the seductions of power and of place, makes it imperative upon us to warn the people of America that the perils prefigured by such men as Senator Wade and Representative Davis are upon us to-day, and that they can only be conjured from the future of our country by the united and resolute action, not of the partisan supporters of a partisan government, but of a patriotic people combined for the defence of the Constitution and the laws.

The conduct of President Lincoln in Maryland and in Tennessee distinctly reveals a revolutionary purpose. The electoral votes of those States, eighteen in number, cast at the dictation of arbitrary power, may neutralize the same number of electoral votes freely and lawfully cast in other States of the Union. Upon those votes, therefore, the whole future of America may turn. To control those votes in the way attempted by Mr. Johnson, in Tennessee, and by General Wallace, in Maryland, is to plan a crime against liberty and the republic. We are fully aware of the gravity of this charge; but the rights, the interests, the issues here at stake are not less grave.

Again and again, for the past four years, Mr. Lincoln and his ministers, under one or another plea of military or political "necessity," have transcended the limits of executive authority, have trampled upon the sanctity of communal and individual right. It may well be doubted whether any government in the old world, claiming to hold its authority by Divine right, would have been permitted by any people of modern Europe to pursue its infractions of law and its contempt of liberty, so far as the American people, in their devotion to the Union, have suffered the administration of Mr. Lincoln to go.

But the patience of the American people has been the fruit of their traditional reliance upon the remedies provided by the Constitution—the right freely to speak their thoughts, freely to print their thoughts, and, above all, the inalienable right freely to choose and to change the agents of the public will.

Once before in our history, under the pressure of an imminent national danger, executive recklessness ventured upon infractions of popular right, tame and insignificant enough to-day beside these usurpations in Maryland and in Tennessee.

Then, however, though in the infancy of our constitutional experience, the wise devotion of the people to the principles of our national liberty triumphed over the assumption of power, and the "peaceful revolution" of 1801, under Thomas Jefferson, secured to us sixty years of freedom and of progress.

The ambition of Mr. Lincoln and his supporters now threatens the very remedies through which the "peaceful revolution" of 1801 was accomplished.

This revolutionary ambition has already been met by Senator Wade and Representative Davis in a temper as revolutionary, with a formal summons of the people to extreme and ulterior measures.

"If those voters turn the balance in his favor," they exclaim, "is it to be supposed that his competitor, defeated by such means, will acquiesce? . . . Let the people consider the remedy for these usurpations, and, having found it, fearlessly execute it."

The National Democratic Committee do not so far despair of the future of the Republic. They believe that the American people, armed with the majestic authority of the Constitution and the laws, will meet these beginnings of usurpation in the spirit and with the determination of their fathers; nor suffer executive ambition so far to corrupt the constitutional remedies of executive wrong-doing as to condemn this great and free people, in the immediate future, to the condition, and with the condition to the remedies, of the subject populations of the older world. AUGUST BELMONT, Chairman.

F. O. PRINCE, Secretary.

SPEECH OF A. OAKEY HALL, Esq.,

NEW-HAVEN, CONN.,

October 20th, 1864.

After a few playful introductory remarks pertinent to the locality, Mr. Hall continued in substance as follows:

LINCOLN ARRAIGNED.

I come to arraign for high political crimes and low partisan misdemeanors, the village politician who is Commander-in-Chief of the armies and navy of the United States. At this grave crisis of public affairs, we might lose sight of individuals were it not that in the instance before us it is the individual who originates measures. We might indeed forget the accumulation of his individual treacheries toward the Constitution were he about to retire of his own accord to private life. But being a candidate for reëlection, the country being in danger of yet newer and more astounding treacheries at his hands, it would be the part of mawkish sensibility to refrain from discussing the candidate as he deserves to be discussed. It is, therefore, more the candidate whom I arraign than the President.

HOW LINCOLN ARRAIGNED POLK.

I have high and appropriate precedent for so doing. In 1848, (see Congressional Globe, 1848,) Abraham Lincoln, representative from Illinois, in a speech against the Mexican war, used his proper privilege in arraigning President Polk, but in language severer than any I shall this night employ; although General Cass, and not Mr. Polk, was candidate at the time.

JEFF AND OLD ABE JOINT CRIMINALS.

I arraign candidate Lincoln upon a presentment substantially filed in the high electoral court by the grand-juries of the Democratic party, against two political criminals. It is a joint indictment—against Jefferson Davis and Abraham Lincoln. The law of bullets under Grant and Sherman are trying Davis; of them and him we have nothing to say to-night. We are content to let those tribunals alone. But the law of ballots under the Constitution is to try the other criminal on the eighth of November. That is the law for us and for our discussion.

VERDICT ASKED FOR AGAINST LINCOLN.

If the jury is not tampered with, I have no fears but the setting sun of that day will record in letters of fire this verdict: "Abraham Lincoln has been guilty of such high political felonies and low partisan misdemeanors, that he shall be forthwith condemned to be for ever after disqualified from holding any place of public trust or emolument under the Constitution which he has trampled upon and defied!"

LINCOLN'S CRIMES, FROM TREASON TO THIMBLE-RIGGING.

I shall take the offences of my arraignment by degrees, from the gravest to the meanest. There are, as you will find, sixteen in all, from treason to thimble-rigging.

HIS TREASON.

And first I arraign him for treason. This offence may be defined to be either (1) levying war against one's country, or (2) adhering to the enemies of one's country—giving them aid and comfort. Jeff Davis has committed treason by levying war. His treason is on trial before Grant and Sherman. Abraham Lincoln has adhered, since September, 1862, to the abolitionists, who are the Northern enemies of the United States, and he has daily, since, given them aid and comfort. Shall I be asked for witnesses? Shall I be reminded that overt acts are necessary to be specified? I might answer that as Lincoln has arrested men for paper treason, and condemned them without witnesses, he should not complain of like treatment! But he shall have both witnesses and specification. Let us select two overt acts—the Emancipation Proclamation and the "To-whom-it-may-concern" decree. From witnesses, let me select the only statesman left to the Republican party—Thurlow Weed. He thus testified in his celebrated letter taking leave of the Albany Journal:

THURLOW WEED TESTIFIES.

"We have been involved for nearly three years in an abolition war. The influence that drove North-Carolina and Tennessee from the Union extorted an emancipation proclamation; practical and effective only in giving union.

strength, and determination to rebellion—a proclamation to which the first slave has not owed his freedom, for it is only operative where our armies go, and without it the armies would have gone faster and further. And let it be remembered that all the while these abolition demagogues and fanatics were aiding both rebellion and slavery. The North, united, (and free of incubus of abolitionism,) would have crushed rebellion, and with it the cursed institution which struck at and sought to divide the Union. If the South avert the punishment due to the great national crime of rebellion, they will owe their escape to the insanity of abolitionists. It is thus that antagonisms work together."

I did not three years ago mistake or magnify the evil of abolition influences; nor, though fiercely denounced, did I shrink from the duty of warning the people. What then was only prophetic is now history. Abolition influences in Congress and in the Cabinet have doubled the millions of dollars, and deepened the rivers of blood, spent and shed in a war which, so long as such influences and counsels sway the government, promises nothing but an interminable conflict or an inglorious termination.

SAD EFFECT OF LINCOLN'S TREASON.

When the first overt act of treason was committed, there was destroyed an era of good feeling. From April, 1861, to September, 1862, the Democratic party, subscribing to the Crittenden resolution of a war to defend the integrity of the Union, had laid upon the altar of patriotism ancient traditions and prejudices, and were supporting the government. The great thirty-five thousand Democratic majority city of New-York had poured out, through its Democratic Mayor, and councils, and bankers, treasure and soldiers. The North was united. The South was divided. The fell overt act reversed the position. It divided the North. It united the South. In the abstract, the proclamation was a piece of folly. Of course, slave property, like horse property, changed hands wherever military force captured it. We were all content with that. But the Democracy rightfully said, this is an entering wedge—this proclamation. It is the first act of giving aid and comfort to abolition enemies. It will be followed by others. It was so followed. Davis was exclaiming: "No peace without secession." Lincoln was vociferating: "No peace without abolition." Democracy said: "We are for peace with Union. Let secession and abolition perish together." And so went on the contest, until Lincoln sums up his treason in the "To-whom-it-may-concern," and McClellan summed up his fidelity to his country in his watchword of "Union at all hazards." Time will not permit me to argue this count of the arraignments. You must argue it for yourselves on an hundred other facts.

LINCOLN'S HOMICIDES.

I arraign candidate Lincoln for homicide; the homicide by culpable negligence, as defined by old lawyers—a form of manslaughter, indeed. Every soldier slain in the campaign to vindicate "my plan" of an overland march from the Rapidan to the James; every soldier killed in the Florida campaign to win a State government and a representative to the Baltimore Convention; each soldier who lies buried on the margins of the Red River, where General Banks led his cotton-gathering veterans; all soldiers sacrificed to the blunders of a civilian general who

> ——"never set a squadron in the field,
> Nor the division of a battle knows
> More than a spinster;"

and, alas! every brave Union volunteer who has lately been famished or fevered into a grave beside a Southern prison—each and all should have written upon the rude head-stone above him: "Slain by the culpable negligence of Abraham Lincoln." Because what profit even of subjugation, to say nothing of a profit toward restoring the Union, did the "my-plan" march, or the other campaigns, evolve? There was the most profitless slaughter in each. Victories! Ay! the bulletins said so. Accept them! There have, then, been bulletin victories enough; but how worthless is glory without results! The war, as one of desolation, of geographical occupation, of subjugation, of approximate annihilation, has been a dreadful success. But (in the spirit of the Chicago platform, so shamefully perverted by press and pulpit) as a war to restore the Union, it has been an experiment in the hands of Abraham Lincoln, and a diplomatic failure upon the valor of the slain.

> "But, what good came of it at last?"
> Quoth little Peterkin;
> "Why, that I cannot tell," said he;
> "But 'twas a famous victory!"

Yes, we have had victories enough; but where has been, and where save under McClellan will be, the statesmanship to turn them to account?

COLORED FAITH IMMURES AND SLAYS OUR PRISONERS.

Let me dwell for a moment on the homicide of our prisoners by the culpable negligence of Lincoln. Their fathers, sons, and brothers who are voters, will never sustain the homicide if they know the facts. Reduced to a single statement they read thus: "We have enough white confederate prisoners to exchange for all the white Union prisoners at the South, and yet leave an overplus in our hands for negotiation as to the balance." But the rebels have captured many thousand negroes, nearly all former slaves; and Mr. Lincoln refuses to negotiate unless the question of negro equality is first settled. This is the official evidence. I read from the record. [Mr. Hall then read the following extract from the official correspondence between Commissioner Ould, of Richmond, and General Butler and Solicitor Whiting:]

PECKSNIFF BUTLER SHEDS TEARS.

. . The wrongs, indignities, and privations suffered by our white soldiers would move me to consent to any thing to procure their exchange, except to barter away the honor and faith of the Government of the United States, which has been solemnly pledged to the colored soldiers (!) in her ranks.

(Signed) BENJAMIN F. BUTLER,
Major-General and Agent of Exchange.

. . All other questions between us may be postponed for future settlement, but the fair exchange of colored soldiers and of their white officers will be insisted on by the government before another rebel soldier or officer will be exchanged.

WILLIAM WHITING,
Solicitor of the War Department.

HOW LINCOLN PETS NEGRO SOLDIERS.

The spirit which accompanies this culpable homicide of white prisoners to sustain faith pledged to colored soldiers (!) may be further illustrated by an extract from an order of Adjutant General Thomas:

The incorporation into the army of the United States of colored troops renders it necessary that they should be brought as speedily as possible to the highest state of discipline. Accordingly, the practice which has hitherto prevailed, no doubt from necessity, of requiring these troops to perform most of the labor on fortifications, and the labor and fatigue duties of permanent stations and camps, will cease; and they will only be required to take their fair share of fatigue duty with the white troops. By order of the Secretary of War.

L. THOMAS, Adjutant-General.

HOW LINCOLN BURNS SHIPS—ARSON.

I arraign candidate Lincoln for the offence of arison on the high seas. It is a leading principle in law: "Who does by another does that thing himself." Who has kept the ex-Hartford postmaster in office as Secretary of the Navy, while more than two hundred ships, with cargoes, have been burned on the high seas? True, neither Lincoln nor Welles fired them. But they particularly offered a premium for the arson by neglecting to avail themselves of the fast ships, brave men, and enterprise that abounded. Let every Connecticut voter redeem his State from the disgrace of Gideon Welles!

LINCOLN'S BURGLARIES.

I arraign Lincoln for burglary! When, in the dead of night, armed men broke into and entered the house of Vallandigham — a civilian, resident in a district over which martial law had not been declared—and, without any warrant but an order primarily proceeding from Lincoln, not only kidnapped the householder, but rifled his drawers of papers, then and there burglary was in every sense committed. When the office of Congressman Voorhees was broken into, entered, and rifled of correspondence by primary order of Lincoln, then the crime was repeated. Worse than all, when the mansion of George F. Thompson, a former writer for the Daily News, was entered, in my own city, at night, and his papers seized, and he himself carried off secretly to the Old Capitol Prison by the express orders of Lincoln, not only burglary transpired, but the crime of kidnapping.

LINCOLN'S KIDNAPPING.

Kidnapping! Why, in arraigning Mr. Lincoln for that crime, I need scarcely specify times, places, persons, incidents; they are so numerous. Our children require no longer to read the chronicles of the Bastile in search of thrilling annals of this crime. The deeds of French kings and Austrian despots sink into commonplace before the kidnapping successes of Lincoln. Lettres de cachet lose all dramatic effect beside the telegrams of the President in the case of Colonel Wolford—that brave Kentucky soldier who put himself into the breach of a war for the Union against even family and friends, to be rewarded by imprisonment of the most arbitrary character for the offence of making a political speech distasteful to Lincoln. In old French and English times, orders of commitment to Bastile and Tower, were at least in writing, and sealed and countersigned and put on record. In Lincoln's day, men have been discovered in forts who knew not their accusers, and who, when released without charge or trial, could discover no scrap of paper in existence touching their apprehension or confinement!

LINCOLN'S FALSE IMPRISONMENTS.

And then, how many offences of trespass to persons and property these kidnappings include! How many assaults! That most accomplished journalist and man of unblemished character, William C. Prime, of the Journal of Commerce, has furnished me with a resume of editorial outrages that classify under these offences. He has compiled them with great care, and I myself have verified them with dates and places.

FEARFUL STATISTICS OF PRESS OUTRAGES.

One hundred and fifty-five newspaper offices and editors have been interfered with by Abraham Lincoln! He who rode into power under the hypocritical cries of free press, free speech, free ballot, and resistance to executive usurpations! Cries that were comparative abstractions in 1860; cries now belonging to Democracy, because become dread realities; and not those, as it has turned out they were in Lincoln's mouth, of mere agitation! Of these one hundred and fifty-five, fifty-two offices were mobbed by Lincoln rioters; forty-three papers were suppressed by express orders of Lincoln; to fifteen mail privileges were refused; twenty-two editors were arrested, but graciously released without imprisonment; twenty more were actually confined in military prisons; three editors were banished from the United States, one, the editor of the Ohio Watchman, became a maniac through his confinement. No wonder, then, that Owen Lovejoy died about the time the outrages on The World and Journal culminated. He could observe how was thus desecrated and foresworn the principle of free press for which his brother was slain in 1837 at Alton, Illinois, for which he had earnestly pleaded. Was not Lovejoy an honest and consistent fanatic, and one of moral courage? Did he not move and carry a vote of thanks to McClellan for "accomplishing great results at little expense of human life"?

THREE HISTORICAL PAINTINGS ABOUT LINCOLN.

In the Capitol at Washington are many vacant spaces for historical paintings. Some years hence, when the abolition madness of the hour shall have passed away, and Abraham Lincoln stands revealed in all his political deformity, let some painter fill one of them with a warm and glowing canvas depicting the Baltimore editor vainly waiting in the White House entry-way, with a letter of a United States Senator in his hand as a credential to see the President, and to know why that President had arrested and imprisoned him! Let that artist next also hang by its side another canvas displaying the President's lackey insulting Mrs. Surgeon-General Hammond, by returning, at his master's order, her card, as she vainly endeavored to seek that presence which has been so free to Frederick Douglas and colored clergymen! By all means let the artist add yet a third canvas, depicting Abraham Lincoln—treasoner, homicide, arsoner, burglar, and kidnapper, that we have shown him to be—in the act of saying to the representative of the loyal men of Tennessee, who protested against Andy Johnson's test-oath, "May I inquire how long it took you and the New-York politicians to concoct that paper?" or "I expect to let the friends of George B. McClellan manage their side of this contest in their own way, and I will manage my side of it in my own way." Thus portrayed upon canvas, no man could accuse me of harshness when I style Abraham Lincoln the vulgar village politician disgracing the dignified rôle of chief magistrate!

LINCOLN ROBS HAWLEY D. CLAPP.

What is the next offence for arraignment? Robbery in the second degree. The obtaining of value through fear of injury to person, reputation, or family. How many men immured in military prisons without warrant, written charges, or process of commitment, have, when demoralized in mind by their confinement, signed in favor of Lincoln's administration receipts or orders for transfers of property! I mention out of many one case. From that learn the whole: Hawley D. Clapp, late host of the Everett House, New-York, was arrested, charged with obtaining large sums of money from recruits by undue means. Every formality of arrest omitted in his case, except that he was transferred from the custody of the United States Marshal to Fort Lafayette on the order of an aid-de-camp! He may have been guilty. I do not argue the question. I only know that the law presumes innocence until guilt is proved. In this case there was no trial, nor attempt at it. For several months Clapp languishes in the prison that, so oddly under its recent uses, bears the honored name of him who overthrew bastiles—Lafayette—he who gave the key of the Paris prison of horrors to Washington as a memento sacred to a victory of freedom! Then, as a means of release, he pays over a large sum of money to Lincoln's agents. Why? Under what means? Through the duress of his imprisonment. What became of the money? It did not belong to the Government. Was it taken from recruits? Was it ever repaid to them? Was it possible to know whom it belonged to? Shall it be said the payment was a confession of guilt? What of the rack-confessions, of thumb-screw acknowledgments, of admissions under torture? Can you gauge the effect of imprisonment? Is it alike to every man? The hair of him of Chillon did not turn white of a single night, and yet to him,

"At last men came to set me free,
I asked not why and recked not where."

Gentlemen, Hawley D. Clapp, untried, is, in the eye of the law, innocent. And the money extorted from him was as plain a case of robbery by the common law as if it had been taken by a Fra Djavolo instead of by the leader of a lawless political party!

LINCOLN'S PERJURY ON INAUGURAL OATH.

How the offences intensify as we proceed with the arraignment! Perjury! When Abraham Lincoln placed military necessity, in districts where courts were open, above the Constitution, did he or not break his official oath? His oath to preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution instead of violating it! How was it with the hand which wrote divers decrees and framed laws—the hand of him who is an executive, and not a legislator? Did that hand in so doing register a perjury? That hand which had on the fourth of March, 1861, touched the sacred volume presented by the lamented Taney in the presence (as it were) of two parties, standing angrily face to face inviting civil war! Perjury! 'Tis a hard word. But what have said Wade and Davis? Are the witnesses under Democratic subpœna? Although they have not written nor spoken that dread word against Lincoln, cannot he who runs read it in their manifesto? What are Lincoln's orders for test-oaths but perjuries against his constitutional obligations affirmed to on inauguration-day? And are there voters confidingly numerous enough to put him next March to the same farce of an oath in front of the Capitol after all these things? And yet you have only selections.

LINCOLN'S BLASPHEMY, PROFANITY, AND OBSCENITY.

He who can commit perjury is capable of blasphemy and profanity. Indeed, these are but steps to that more deliberate crime. I arraign him for those common law offences. I call Horace Greeley's paper as a witness.

GREELEY ON THE WITNESS-STAND.

It is not many weeks since its columns editorially admitted that the President had said of McClellan: "He is hell on a parade." Blasphemies! Whose order tore the aged Roman Catholic Bishop of Natchez from the very altar of God? Abraham Lincoln's.

LINCOLN'S BAYONET RELIGION.

Who made martial law the law of the Episcopal rubric, and exiled clergymen who refused to pray for Lincoln? Was there ever before a king or potentate who forced a form of religious prayer at the point of the bayonet? Or enforced ecclesiastical discipline with a file of swearing soldiers? What answers the field of Antietam, which listened to the singing, amid the fresh solemnities of the battle-field, of a negro song at the express request of President Lincoln when riding over it?

LINCOLN'S RIBALDRY AT ANTIETAM.

One who heard him ask for the song, who shuddered as he heard the request; one who listened to the singing and sorrowed within him as he did so, narrated to me the circumstance. If President Lincoln or Mr. Marshal Lamon will deny it, I pledge myself to produce that eye-and-ear witness. Men of the State of Dwight and Edwards, this is the chosen leader of a party who claims a patent for piety and patriotism! Who demands a special property in the flag! Who claims exclusive proprietary interest in every victory! Who answers alike ugly facts and convincing logic with the parrot-cry of, "Stand off, Copperhead, for we are holier than thou art!" Obscenity is a lower order of the crime under observation.

LINCOLN'S OBSCENITY.

Is Lincoln guilty of that? Join any mess-room of congressmen and ask them. Buy the jest-book "fresh from Abraham's bosom," and ask that. If any responsible man denies it in print, witnesses will rise up in the salons of Washington, thickly as armed men sprang from the dragon's teeth sowed of old by Cadmus! What else could be expected of one inexperienced in society, and whose daily associates vulgarized natural filthiness of thought; of one whose antecedents were thus portrayed—prophetically so—by a contemporary, the Hon. J. N. Morris, of Illinois, in a speech delivered June 19, 1860, during the first canvass for Lincoln? (See page 462 of part four of Congressional Globe of that year.)

A CONGRESSMAN PREDICTED IT ALL.

"Elect Lincoln, and let the fact be announced that a hostile enemy has landed upon our shores, or that States have rebelled against the authority of the general government, and in all probability he would go on telling some anecdote or finishing a game of sport on the public grounds in front of the White House! Upon the death of a monarch, who ever thought of putting the KING'S JESTER on the throne?"

A MAC AND OLD ABE CONTRAST.

And yet some of the American people are hesitating whether to prefer to keep this jester

on the throne to placing in the Democratic chair of Washington, of Jefferson, and of Jackson, the reticent gentleman and courageous Christian soldier and statesman of foresight, George B. McClellan! And yet such is the man who was forced as a candidate, it is said by many of my old Republican friends, on their party; whom they despise and yet must vote for, because he —this man of blasphemy and obscenity—represents a "principle!"

BRIBERY AND THE BLAIRS.

I arraign him in this connection for bribery. He sent—said the younger Blair—a proposition to Grant to give McClellan a command. I came —said the elder Blair—to see McClellan to offer him a command if he would refuse the presidency. What was this but bribery, the offence of persuading to, or dissuading from duty, by a gift? Lincoln, it is true, has here filed a special plea in bar, as lawyers say. But putting the confessions of the younger (whose "time had come") with the admissions of the elder, (whose time is yet to come,) what sane juror will refuse to say that Lincoln knew of the bribe? And what a dilemma it puts Lincoln in!

LINCOLN'S PARTISAN DILEMMA.

General McClellan is fit to be in the field, or he is not. If he is fit, then shame on Lincoln, who, for two years has kept him out. If he is not fit, then the Blair confessions make Lincoln jeopardize the country by giving command to an unfit soldier in order to promote his own political interests! In other words, that Lincoln stands convicted of preferring party to country. Lincoln always compromises party interests, and can negotiate to procure partisan peace for a bleeding army of office-holders! But he cannot compromise for the good of a bleeding nation!

LINCOLN COMMITTED TO COMPROMISE.

And yet he is the only man who has compromised with the South. Did he not try confederate sailors as pirates? (I refer to the Savannah case.) And after a failure to convict, under the leadership for the prisoners of James T. Brady, (who is never so really Brady unless he is against oppression and wrong,) did he not exchange them as prisoners of war under threat of retaliation? The probable Chief-Justice of the United States, William M. Evarts, thought they were pirates. Very humbly, I thought not. Perhaps, however, they were; nevertheless, many who believed them pirates deemed it a wise compromise on the part of the War Department to give them up in exchange. Ah! Lincoln will soon enough compromise, when the Democratic party have fought his placemen and myrmidons out of power and plunder, by its ballots!

LINCOLN'S ADMINISTRATION EMBEZZLEMENTS.

This word plunder brings me to count the eleventh of the indictment. It is for embezzlements and peculations. Shall I stop to cite cases or call witnesses before an intelligent audience who read newspapers and treasury reports? No! So I pass to the next crime of Lincoln's; the obtaining of money by false pretences.

HOW LINCOLN OBTAINS MONEY BY FALSE PRETENCES.

In 1861 he wanted money and sent Chase to the New-York banks. The loans thus obtained saved Washington and the national credit. The money was given on the faith of a war for the Union. Lincoln not only broke faith in the matter with the moneyed interests, by changing the war into one for abolition, desolation, extermination, and subjugation, but he inaugurated treacherous attacks on these very banks by establishing national pet institutions and annoying the State banks by vexatious taxations. Lincoln, in 1863, levied a tax of three per cent on incomes of that year ending December. Six months after the year had passed, (and the tax had been collected and incomes adjusted, or perhaps surplus spent upon the faith of prior representations,) a retroactive tax of five per cent additional is added for the same time. Was not the three per cent collected under false pretences? Have you ever compared the backs of the two issues of postage currency? Upon the first you find, "Receivable for all dues less than five dollars;" upon the last issue is added the words, "except customs." Well, by true construction of language, the additional words created an exception which did not previously exist. Yet, although the currency first obtained popularity because receivable for fractional custom-house dues, and at first so taken, it was shortly disallowed, and faith broken. I call all these things the obtaining of money and credit by false pretences and tokens!

LINCOLN'S RECORD FORGERIES.

I arraign Lincoln for forgery. One class of forgery is the alteration of figures, accounts, and statistics of a pecuniary nature in order to deceive creditors. Who so great a debtor in the world as these United States? Who has so shamefully taxed upon the credulity of creditors by falsifying, from time to time, the figures of the national debt account, as Abraham Lincoln? Nor will I stop to argue this, because the newspapers and money-articles of the press have anticipated me fully.

HE IS GUILTY OF MAYHEM.

I arraign him for a species of mayhem. This is to be defined, for popular purposes, malicious mutilation of the person. Let me read you this order from a deputy of Commander-in-Chief Lincoln:

PROCESS OF BRANDING SOLDIERS.

PROVOST-MARSHAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, D. C., Aug. 19, 1864.

Circular.

DOCTOR: In addition to my suggestion to mark all rejected recruits and substitutes, I would suggest that all accepted recruits and substitutes be marked thus, "I," in the small of the back. This will, I think, prevent, to a great extent, the practice of bounty-jumping.

Yours, etc., J. H. BAXTER, Surgeon.
U. S. V., Chief Medical Officer Provost-Marshal General's Bureau.

How was this marking done? By the use of lunar caustic. Suits are now pending in New-York and New-Jersey for assaults of this kind. There are doubtless others. What an indignity! And from the leader of the party who has waxed eloquent over scars upon the negro's back! I am against all scarring, whether of bond or free. But, above all, of the citizen, and voter, and soldier. Just heaven! has citizenship come to this—that we hold not only personal liberty and property, but the very sacredness of person—God's image—at the will of Lincoln and his surgeons? Paul cried, "I am a Roman citizen," and the fasces of the lictor were staid. Time was, when the call, "I am an American citizen," was heard from the deck of an Austrian frigate, and when Ingraham dared, and Marcy approved, to make the cry of Koszta not in vain. Shall that cry ever be again potent? Then elect McClellan, and to an ignominious electoral outlawry with this brander who occupies the presidential chair!

THE MISDEMEANOR OF OBSTRUCTING JUSTICE.

Abraham Lincoln has committed that heinous common law crime of "obstructing the course of government and justice." He suspended habeas corpus before Congress gave him power—conceding, for the brevity of argument, that they possessed it. He has declared martial law over civil districts. He has ordered the process of courts to be contemned. He has interfered with elections. Lincoln meditates, as the signs of the times clearly indicate, yet fresher obstructions of government and justice. Have you ever read Kinglake's exposition of Napoleon's coup d'état? If so, you will remember how thrillingly he precedes the main event by an account of Napoleon's defeating, for the presidency, General Cavaignac, the former idol of the soldiery.

LINCOLN AND NAPOLEON III. CONTRASTED.

You will recall the after-process by which, under aid of bayonets, Napoleon strangled the French nation in the night by a proclamation, and became Emperor. He had his Morny and Maupas; Lincoln has his Stanton and Holt. Napoleon had generals, prefets, and sub-prefets to do his bidding. Lincoln has more than these, and as despotic officers. Napoleon placed thirty-two departments under martial law during his election. Lincoln has thirty-two territorial divisions "called" States. O men of Connecticut! do you wish to see how a parallel might be made hereafter (I will not say this year) should Lincoln be reëlected—he, this obstructor of government and justice—then take that volume of Kinglake, and at page 197 read it, and prepare against such usurpations.

THIMBLE-RIGGING.

Time fails me, I perceive, to classify the misdemeanors which I intended to arrange under the word thimble-rigging. But examples will occur to you: those connected with a Chicago Committee and the Pope's bull against the comet; the letters to Fremont and Hunter; the letter to Greeley; the peninsular performances, also, at the expense not only of "Little Mac," but of the country. Alas for the land under the thimble-rigging of this little joker against "Little Mac!" was not that a sorry perfection of thimble-rigging which was done with Blenker's division and with McDowell's corps? How many, many thimbles Lincoln has used in his cunning art! Cameron, Chase, and Blair, Hunter, Fremont, Burnside, Hooker, Meade, Halleck, Hitchcock, Sigel, Butler, Banks—but let your memories complete the list; I do not wish to be too personal. What was the peace negotiation, through the Canadian back-door of the Union, but a game of thimble-rigging. Or that through the cellar-door of the Confederacy at Richmond—Sanders, Jewett, Hay, and Greeley, as the Canadian players with the thimbles—Davis, Benjamin, Jaquess, and Gillmore as the performers beyond the intrenchments of James River. Two historical groups—with Lincoln in each background as the thimble-rigger!

But enough. My aim has been rather to outline these crimes and misdemeanors of candidate Lincoln to the jury of voters, and leave them to the greater filling out with facts and dates, so readily attainable in this newspaper day.

LINCOLN'S CONGRESSIONAL ABSOLUTION.

No wonder that when wary politicians, like Colfax and Forney, came to survey these crimes, they caused Congress to pass an act which should attempt in advance to nole pros. this indictment—almost as bad for its Lincolnian duplicity, repugnancy, and multifariousness. Let me read it. It should have been entitled: "An Act to License Presidential Wrongs:"

SEC. 4, March 3, 1863, Chapter 81, Laws of 37th Congress—"And be it, etc., that any order of the President, or under his authority, made at any time during the existence of the present rebellion, shall be a defence in all courts to any action or prosecution, civil or criminal, pending or to be commenced, for any search, seizure, arrest, or imprisonment made, done, or committed, or acts omitted to be done under and by virtue of such order, or under color [?] of any law of Congress; and such defence may be made by special plea, or under the general issue."

LINCOLN PERSONALLY DISSECTED.

Were the policies of Mr. Lincoln's party ever so pure and certain, ever so sure of beneficial results, and I approved of them, I would not trust them four years longer in his hands after the experience of the past three years. There has been no such cunning trickster since the days of Burr; and Burr was at least a gentleman and a scholar! Not even Tyler was so inordinately vain of power. He exercises it as recklessly as Bomba did! He is surrounded by more dangerous men than ever haunted the ante-rooms of the imbecile Louis XIII.! I profoundly pity the rebels under the despotism of Davis. Yet that is at least an educated, intelligent, and respectable despotism. It acts within the forms of law and constitutions. The despotism of centralized power which Lincoln is establishing is a vulgar and debasing despotism—one which appeals to the fears of the pocket for its supremacy; and relies upon purse and sword at a usurpation over free ballot and Constitution.

GOOD MEN MAKE GOOD GOVERNMENTS.—McCLELLAN.

Apart, therefore, from any discussion of platforms or principles, I am, on the question of persons, for McClellan and against Lincoln. The author of the Harrison's Bar letter, the man who asked "if he could not lead his army, to be at least allowed to share their fate on the field of battle;" the general who begged his malicious foe to "say a good word for the army, but nothing about himself;" the hero who forgot his grief, to save Washington at South-Mountain and Antietam; the writer of the letter of presidential acceptance—he is to Lincoln as Hyperion to Satyr; he can be safely trusted with the reins of power; he has never yet abused a trust or a confidence; he will not now.

All history informs us that—talk as we may about policies, expediencies, platforms, or principles of administration—they made the best rulers who were the bravest and noblest of men. These constitute the State! "Men, high-minded men, who their duties know; who know their rights, and, knowing, dare maintain, prevent the long-aimed blow, and crush the tyrants while they rend the chain."

JOHN VAN BUREN AT HOME.

[S GREAT SPEECH AT HUDSON, OCT. 27, 1864.

Chairman, Ladies and Gentlemen: It gives eat pleasure to meet this afternoon so large a ientation of the intelligence, the patriotism, and, add, the beauty and the grace of Old Columbia. e, as you are well aware, associations in this y which make it always a subject of pleasure me to visit Hudson and Columbia. A native, of the county, and almost every blood-relation have residing here, I naturally take a pride in tory, in the names of its distinguished citizens, political action, and in the prosperity of the y and of all its citizens. It was, therefore, to source of unfeigned pleasure—and I looked it as a personal compliment—when I received vitation from some of the gentlemen of this y to visit you, to consult together in reference to itical position of public affairs.

PROPER TIME ARRIVED TO CRITICISE THE ADMINISTRATION.

ake the liberty of referring for a few moments e action of myself in regard to the condition of s that has existed for the last three or four years. ninds are absorbed, all hearts are engaged in ontemplation of the great crisis that is now upon ountry. A rebellion broke out some years since veral of the States of this Union against what I d as the rightful authority of the United States. as in my judgment wholly without a justifiable se, and feeling as I did with regard to it, I could esitate to contribute what little influence I might ss, and every exertion I could make toward ssistance of the government in suppressing this lion. I believed that this was the only thing to nd I felt that we could rely with entire confidence the declarations of the President of the United s in reference to his intended course and on the utions of Congress as to the legitimate objects of ar, and the mode in which it should be prosecuted. l call your attention to the declaration made by President of the United States, in taking his oath, and to the resolution to which I refer. The ident said, when he was inaugurated:

I declare that I have no purpose, directly or indiy, to interfere with the institution of slavery in States where it exists. I believe I have no lawful to do so, and have no inclination to do so."

e goes on to say:

The right of each State to order and control its domestic institutions, according to its own judgt exclusively, is essential to the balance of power hich the perfection and endurance of our politiabric depend."

ongress, on the suggestion of Mr. Crittenden, the war commenced, passed a resolution declarthe object and origin of the war as follows:

That the present deplorable civil war has been ed upon the country by the disunionists of the thern States, now in arms against the constitutionovernment, and in arms around the Capitol; that his national emergency Congress, banishing all ng of mere passion and resentment, will recollect its duty to the whole country; that this war is waged on their part in any spirit of oppression or iny purpose of conquest or subjugation, or purof overthrowing or interfering with the rights or blished institutions of these States, but to defend maintain the supremacy of the Constitution, and reserve the Union, with all the dignity, equality, rights of the several States unimpaired; and that soon as these objects are accomplished the war ht to cease."

Relying upon these assurances, it seemed to me wise to suspend all differences of opinion until such time as the close of Mr. Lincoln's official term would give us an opportunity to review his conduct; and in the mean time to uphold the government in all its efforts to suppress a rebellion so unjustifiable as I have declared it in my judgment to be. I did so. I declined to criticise the conduct of the President, and I thought it wise on the part of the citizens of the loyal States to give him unhesitating and cordial support. But the time has now arrived when it becomes indispensable to look into his action. (Applause.) He has presented himself as a candidate for reëlection, and it is for the people of the States, that are to take part in the election, to determine whether he shall be continued in office or give place to a successor who is willing to prosecute the war for its original purposes, and willing to receive propositions of peace when they shall be offered by competent authority. (Applause.) In my humble judgment, and I desire to speak with great respect for the feelings of those who differ with that opinion, the President has committed great errors, either operated upon by more powerful and designing men who surround him, or by his own mistaken views has committed errors which have prolonged this war indefinitely, and which have resulted in disaster and defeat to our armies, enormous increase of taxation, and a fearful destruction of human life. (Applause.)

MR. LINCOLN'S POLICY TO PROSTRATE HIS RIVAL FOR THE PRESIDENCY.

I think that in doing so he has been guided by strong political partisanship, and that he has been operated upon in a great degree—either he or those who surround him—by a desire to prostrate one particular man; to give a partisan character to the contest, and to convert the war, legitimate in its objects, into an abolition crusade, which he, in taking his official oath, declared that he had no desire or right to commence, and which Congress had all but unanimously declared was not the purpose of the government. (Applause.) The man whom it has been sought to prostrate in this war was George B. McClellan, (tremendous applause,) and I insist upon it that the most cursory review of the action of the government in regard to him will satisfy every disinterested man that I am correct in this assertion. General McClellan needs no testimony of mine. When he was put in the place he occupied for six months, at the head of the armies of the United States, the President had occasion to communicate with Congress upon the subject, and in doing so stated the truth in regard to General McClellan, and the manner in which he was appointed. In his message to Congress, December 3, 1861, Mr. Lincoln said:

"With the retirement of General Scott came the executive duty of appointing in his stead a general-in-chief. It is a fortunate circumstance that neither in council nor country was there, so far as I know, any difference of opinion as to the proper person to be selected. The retiring chief repeatedly expressed his judgment in favor of General McClellan for the position, and in this the nation seemed to give a unanimous concurrence. (Loud cheers.) The designation of General McClellan is, therefore, in a considerable degree, the selection of the country, as well as of the executive, and hence there is better reason to hope there will be given him the confidence and cordial support thus far, by fair implication, promised, and without which he cannot with so full efficiency serve the country."

Now, was that confidence given to him; and if not, why not? No sooner had he started, in command of the army, upon the expedition to the Peninsula, than the force of General Wool and the force of General Blenker—two important divisions of his command—were withdrawn from him. Subsequently, when he was in the act of reaching Richmond—when he had approached nearer to it than Grant is to-day, unless there are later telegrams than I have read—when he was even nearer Richmond than the rebels have been to Washington since that time (laughter)—he was deprived of the assistance of General McDowell's corps, thus uncovering his right wing, and leaving him exposed to those fearful assaults which resulted in the seven days' battles of July, in which he covered his name with imperishable fame, and saved the army under circumstances which, in the opinion of the highest foreign and domestic critics, reflect upon him eternal honor. (Great applause.) As to his conduct in that respect, we are not left without competent testimony. The President telegraphed to him July 5th, after some of the earlier battles:

"A thousand thanks for the relief your two dispatches of twelve and one P.M. yesterday gave me. Be assured the heroism of yourself, officers, and men is, and for ever will be, appreciated. A. Lincoln."

Three days before he telegraphed to him:

"I am satisfied that yourself, officers, and men have done the best you could. All accounts say better fighting was never done. Ten thousand thanks for it. A. Lincoln."

He retired to Harrison's Landing. He wrote to the President that memorable letter which I have no doubt you have read, in which he declared what was the true statesmanship in regard to this war, and by which, in my opinion, he sealed his doom with the abolitionists who control the President. In the latter part of August General Pope was appointed to the command of the Army of the Potomac, General McClellan was stripped of his command, stripped of all his men, left at Alexandria with no duty, and refused even the request which he made to take part in any capacity, even as a private soldier, in the battles going on almost within earshot. The bloody second battle of Bull Run followed in the latter part of August. McClellan did not go fast enough in the judgment of the President; Pope did go fast enough, but the wrong way. (Great laughter.) He took the road to Washington, and came back pell mell with a defeated and routed army, with a terrified President and cabinet, with a strong probability that our Capitol would fall into the hands of the enemy, and an absolute certainty that if they had advanced at that time they might have taken possession of Washington and of Lincoln himself, if they wanted him. (Laughter.) But, in my humble judgment, if Mr. Lincoln has any apprehension that he will be taken prisoner by the rebels, he greatly deceives himself. He is entirely too useful to them where he is now to have them ever take him prisoner. (Continued laughter.) In that dismal day for the country the President came to General McClellan and besought him to assume command of the army. What was his answer? Brave, heroic, disinterested, he never stopped to complain of the treatment he had received or to anticipate the same treatment if he was successful afterward, or to say, You have deprived me of my influence in the army—how can you expect me now to do any good to the country? He took command of this routed and disordered corps; he reorganized that army as if by magic, in the testimony of all disinterested men who are acquainted with the facts; he marched these men before they were fully equipped to Antietam. I have heard Mr. Francis P. Blair, who lives on the road to Antietam, at Silver Spring, say that those men, under the command of McClellan them—and that he never saw a set of men mo to go into battle under an ordinary command they were at that time, many barefooted, hatle hardly enough of clothing to cover their nak But there was no time to be lost; it was indisp to move rapidly; McClellan marched them to tam, he fought the great battle of the war, h threw Lee himself, he saved the Capitol of the and covered the armies of the loyalists of the States with imperishable honor. (Loud che But I must not leave this to rest upon my test I refer to the telegrams he received from Mr. H commander-in-chief of the armies, and from Al Lincoln himself. General Halleck wrote to hir tember 30th:

"General: Your report of yesterday, givi results of the battles of South-Mountain and An has been received and submitted to the Pre They were not only hard-fought battles, but earned and decided victories.

"The valor and endurance of your army several conflicts, which terminated in the expul the enemy from the loyal State of Marylan creditable alike to the troops and the officer commanded them.

"A grateful country, while mourning the lan dead, will not be unmindful of the honor due living. H. W. Halleck,

"General-in-Chi

A grateful country will not, in my humble ment. (Great applause.)

Lincoln telegraphed to him Sept. 15th, 1862:

"Your dispatch of to-day received. God bles and all with you."

And then, as Lincoln is never easy without gi plan of campaign, he adds:

"Destroy the rebel army if possible.

"A. Lincol

Such was the conduct of General McClellan at the head of the army of the United States, made himself popular with the country, he made self prominent among its great men, and fron time he was feared to stand in the way of the pr incumbent for a succession of the presidential He had already announced that he could not be a party to any abolition programme of the war his fate was sealed. The politicians set to work through their influence or through Mr. Lincoln's mistaken judgment, in November following, immed ly after the election had taken place in this S resulting in the success of Horatio Seymour for G nor—(great applause)—he was suspended from mand, and was ordered to report himself at Trer and from that day to this, though a thousand doll piece bounty is paid for private soldiers, no duty be found for General McClellan to discharge. court has been ordered upon him, and no explan been made by the President of the reason why he suspended. Things remained in this way until Au when the disasters that had befallen our arms ca a general cry throughout the country for the r ration of McClellan to command. Then, Mr. M gomery Blair, the ex-Postmaster-General, tells u New-York, measures were concerted between the sident and General Grant to restore McClellan to command of the army as an adjunct of Grant. upon what terms? Why, that he should refuse nomination of the Chicago Convention; that he sh turn his back upon the Chicago Convention; an think it might be added further, if Mr. Blair, who since made a publication on the subject, was dispo to communicate all the facts, that it was not only posed to restore him to command, but they very tinctly intimated to him that he should be the President of the United States after Lincoln. He received that proposition, as he re- l many others, in silence, with the simple re- that he is at the call of the country, subject, as -General, to orders issued by the competent au- ies. And Mr. Lincoln having failed in this nego- n, McClellan stands now to be put at the head of rmies by the people of the United States. (Loud use. "They will do it.") I believe they will do Cheers) Such has been the treatment of the who, from the commencement of his career to lay, has never been heard to utter one word of laint, who submits himself to the orders of the ry, and submits his fate to the people, with en- confidence in their wisdom and in their justice. ers.) I have said that a prominent feature in the uct of the war by this Administration has been to oy those men who stood in the way of the Presi- for the succession and to abolitionize the war.

SE AND EXASPERATING ACTS OF THE ADMINIS-TRATION.

e proclamation of the President of the United s, declaring slaves free in certain States in rebel- was, in my judgment, unwise, as well as without onstitutional authority, so far as it had any prac- effect. He made nobody free by any such pro- ation. Those who were free by the overthrow of rebel authority, were free without such a procla- on, and those that were held in slavery under the f the Southern States, remained in slavery after roclamation. But in that way he united and exas- ted the Southern people unnecessarily, and divid- he North.

he same is true to a great extent of many of the sts made by the authority of the President, at asonable times, and unwisely. Every man here vs that the mass of our people in the adhering es are perfectly loyal, and that if a man is fool gh or base enough to entertain disloyal views, safe course is to hold him up to the reprobation scorn of his associates, and trust to the patriot- of the great mass of the country to sustain the ernment. They were made under circumstances ing unnecessary exasperation. So, too, the sup- sion of certain newspapers by the authority of President was most unwise and illegal, and in ost every instance, except in the recent suppres- of the Post in Baltimore, the only Democratic er in the State of Maryland, was reversed by the sident, so soon as he ascertained what the public timent was as to the injustice and outrage that had n committed. Nobody, I believe, ever heard of a ublican newspaper being suppressed, no matter how ent it might be against the President. Nobody r heard, I think, of a Republican being arrested political reasons, no matter how violent he might ; but if you can catch a Democrat, and jug him, catch a Democratic newspaper, and stop it even twenty-four hours, it is considered a fair prize war, and the President never neglects to avail iself of the opportunity. So, too, the various pro- ts of confiscation. General and indiscriminating they were, they were calculated to produce the ne unfortunate results to our cause to which I ve referred. I will speak of only one other subject reference to the President's action, and that is the ning of black troops. General Sherman, who has vered himself with honor at Atlanta, (applause,) and er whose victories I most heartily rejoice, has told e President, with that sterling good sense which troops — that, as a general rule, they can most wisely be employed in various departments of labor about the camps and fortifications, and in garrisons, but are not peculiarly suited, as you and I know they are not, for service in the field. They created, to a certain extent, a prejudice in the white troops, and when called into action at critical conjunctures, like the recent springing of the mine in front of Petersburgh, they almost invariably fail. When taken prisoners, the rebels refuse to exchange them for white troops, and the consequence is, that some fifty thousand white prisoners are now lying in the jails and prisons and guard-houses of the South, simply because the President refuses to exchange them until the black troops can be exchanged. Such are some of the measures of this Administration, to which I object.

THE RESULT OF THESE MEASURES.

What has been their consequence? This war has been prosecuted now for some four years. If you will look over the map that has recently been made, showing the parts occupied by us and parts occupied by the rebels, you will see that in the States of Virginia, North-Carolina, South-Carolina, Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia, and Tennessee, the position of those States now held by us is exceedingly small, that it is such part as is actually occupied by our troops, and beyond that not only we have no possession, but it is entirely unsafe, if not fatal, for one of our troops to show himself. The State of Texas is entirely given over, as far as I have been able to observe, to the rebels. I don't think there is a United States soldier in the whole State of Texas, and in Missouri and Kentucky we are worse off to-day than we were two years ago. They are more unsettled, the rebels are more defiant and more powerful than they were two years ago. Now, this necessarily grows out of exasperating the community with which you have to deal, instead of singling out the enemy whom you seek to conquer and fighting him. It is not our business, as I have said on another occasion, to subjugate the South; our business is to subjugate Jeff Davis and the rebel army. (Loud applause.) How do we stand financially? For, whatever any person may think, there is coming a pay-day, and it is extremely important that those who have to pay the taxes of the war, which is the fact in regard to almost all our citizens, for in various ways these taxes reach the poor as well as the rich — those who have to pay the taxes should know something of the extent of the engagements into which they have entered. The debt of the United States is reported by the Secretary of the Treasury to be two thousand millions of dollars, within a fraction; it was sixty-five millions at the time of the breaking out of the war. If the damages that have been committed, and for which the United States are liable, the claims which they are bound to satisfy, and the arrearages for which they are indebted, were taken into account, I entertain no doubt that our debt would be found to be four thousand millions of dollars. But this little county has a county debt now, as I understand, of four hundred thousand dollars in round numbers. It has paid, and is to pay, by the first of November, in assessments, over three hundred and fifty thousand dollars; and, between the first of November and the first of May, some two hundred and odd thousand dollars more. The debt of the towns for bounties, separate from all this, is upward of three hundred thousand dollars; and thus you have a county and town debt of one million two hundred thousand dollars, at least, up to the present time, when the war is about fairly commenced, in the judgment of some of our abolition friends who propose to see it out until slavery is abolished. (Applause.) It is very easy to make an estimate of the taxable property of each town, and see how much you are to pay, ously entertained by any body. These debts have to be paid, and you and your children have to foot the bill. We have lost something like half a million of men by disease, death, and disability, since the commencement of this war. The war is being prosecuted at the present time at an expense of over three millions or three and a half millions of dollars per day. Well, if the question were to sustain the Government and put down the rebellion, I should say, as I would do, contribute the last penny to uphold the honor and preserve the union of the country. (Applause.) But if I am asked to feed a parcel of bloated contractors, if I am asked to keep in commission some bold brigadiers, who may have no other employment when the war comes to an end, if I am asked to lay out three and a half millions a day, and to extend this debt indefinitely to free the Southern negroes, I ask leave to refuse altogether to participate in such an object.

Fellow-citizens, such are the circumstances of the country. But I may speak with prejudice, though I know no reason why I should. Every man here present has the same interest in the result of this controversy that I have. Those rewards, as they are commonly called, of political contests in the shape of office, never had any charm for me. I believe I never had my name in a nominating convention or before a Governor or President for any office, great or small, since I became qualified. I have been old enough, I am sorry to say, to hold office ever since General Jackson's first term, and I really believe if I had desired it — I dislike exceedingly to say that I have refused office — but if I had desired it, either General Jackson, or his successor, or Mr. Polk, or Mr. Pierce, or Mr. Buchanan, or some other ingenious man, would have found something that I was qualified to do, and appointed me to do it. I say I have, therefore, my property, the liberty and protection of myself and family, like yourselves, involved in this contest, and that is all.

UNPREJUDICED TESTIMONY.

But I might be prejudiced, and therefore I will take the liberty to read the testimony of one who is going to support the President, notwithstanding all he has done, and who has favored us with his views. I allude to John C. Fremont, who was the Republican candidate for President in 1856. In describing the condition of the country, in a lettter written the fourth of June, he says:

"This is not an ordinary election. It is a contest for the right even to have candidates, and not merely, as usual, for the choice among them. Now, for the first time since '76, the question of constitutional liberty has been brought directly before the people for their serious consideration and vote. The ordinary rights secured, under the Constitution, and the laws of the country have been violated, and extraordinary powers have been usurped by the executive. It is directly before the people now to say whether or not the principles established by the Revolution are worth maintaining. . . .

"To-day, we have in the country the abuses of a military dictation, without its unity of action and vigor of execution. An administration marked at home by disregard of constitutional rights, by its violations of personal liberty and the liberty of the press, and, as a crowning shame, by its abandonment of the right of asylum, a right especially dear to all free nations abroad. Its course has been characterized by a feebleness and want of principle which has misled European powers, and driven them to a belief that only commercial interests and personal aims are concerned, and that no great principles are involved in the issue. The admirable conduct of the people, their readiness to make every sacrifice demanded of them, their forbearance and silence under the suspension of every thing and sacrifices were all rendered fruitless by the i city, or, to speak more exactly, by the persona for which the war was managed.

"If Mr. Lincoln should be renominated, as I b it would be fatal to the country to indorse a polic renew a power which has cost us the lives of thou of men, and needlessly put the country on the r bankruptcy, there will remain no alternative l organize against him every element of conscie opposition, with the view to prevent the misfortu his reëlection."

Subsequently, in the communication withdra his name, September 21, he says;

"In respect to Mr. Lincoln I continue to hol actly the sentiments contained in my letter of ac ance. I consider that his administration has politically, militarily, and financially a failure, that its necessary continuance is a cause of regr the country."

It is not necessary, as he will see, when the close in November. (Applause.)

Now, this administration thus described by him for a renewal of its lease of office.

NO ANTI-DEMOCRATIC ADMINISTRATION EVER RE-ELEC

It is a curious fact in the history of our poli contests that no anti-Democratic administration was renewed. John Adams came in in '96, and out in 1800, by pretty general consent. In 1828 son came in, as Mr. Randolph wittily said, to serv the last four years of his father's administration, he went out to give place to Jackson in 1832. heard then nothing of the opposition to the De cratic party until 1840, when General Harrison elected. That party gave rise to Mr. Polk in 1 By division in the Democratic party General Ta was elected, and in 1860, again by division in Democratic party, Mr. Lincoln was elected b minority of votes, to the great calamity of this peo

DEMOCRATS PAY OFF THE DEBTS OF THEIR OPPONE

Now it is another curious fact that though the ponents of the Democrats only remain in power term, they always run up a great debt, which it is duty and pleasure of the Democratic administrati succeeding to discharge. General Jackson paid off national debt. When that illustrious statesman the presidential office we did not owe one dol General Pierce paid or provided for the national d incurred by the preceding administration, and wher left office every dollar of the national debt was eit paid or funds raised sufficient to satisfy it. The publican party is going out of office now, leavin debt that we shall be obliged to hold power a li eternity to pay. (Laughter.) It has got to be pa and to be paid by a system of economy and taxat that may perhaps render odious the party that con into power, but it is still inevitable WE CAN'T CHEATED MUCH IN SWAPPING OFF LINCOLN. Now I one go for a change. (Great applause.) My privi opinion is, that we cannot be any worse off. (Lau ter.) I have always understood and observed that man in pain feels a relief in turning over, even if has to turn back again. (Loud laughter.) Whatev the President may think about swapping horses, don't think we can get cheated much if we swap th one off. (Applause.) He has a very curious id about exchanges. He sees no objection to swappi generals, to exchange McClellan for Pope, Pope f McClellan, McClellan for Burnside, Burnside f Hooker, Hooker for Meade. He sees no objection change in the members of his administration, i trading Mr. Chase for Mr. Fessenden, in trading o Mr. Denison for Mr. Blair; but when it comes t him, he seems to think that a change would be mos disastrous. The President reminds me of a story ago there was a man who had, or thought he title to some land in this county, and in the portion of it. He went around through the to ascertain who the occupants were of the ory he sought to recover. He found a man to him information as to who lived in certain places, e took minute notes as to boundaries, and so and passed on to the next. At last he saw a ine house on a hill, surrounded by an admirable and inquired who owned that. "Oh!" said the "our Will lives there. You must let him alone." hter.) I think we shall turn Lincoln out this We propose to put in the places of Lincoln Hamlin, George B. McClellan and George H. eton. (Loud and continued cheering.)

VAN BUREN'S PERSONAL OPINION OF MCCLELLAN.

I have read to you what the President about him in his message, in telegraphic des- es, and when he sends Mr. Blair to recall him to ommand of the army in conjunction with General But it may perhaps be a satisfaction to you to the testimony of one who knows him personally. (Loud applause.) People ou they like him, but they don't like the men ontrol him. Who controls him? Lincoln could t the head of the armies and navies of the United s. When he was General-in-Chief, he freely ob- t to measures that were recommended by the dent, telling him, these lives are intrusted to my tion. I am on the ground, have personal oppor- y to observe. If you know better than I do what army should do, appoint another person to the hand, or take the lead yourself, and show the y your own proper person, (which would, of e, disperse them at a moment's notice.) MCCLELLAN'S PLATFORM.

ow a great many gentlemen, who agree to that, me they object to his platform. I will tell you his platform is. It is contained in his letter from ison's Landing. He says, in writing to the Presi- :

Our cause must never be abandoned; it is the e of free institutions and self-government. The stitution and the Union must be preserved, what- may be the cost in time, treasure, or blood. eers.) If secession is successful, other dissolutions clearly to be seen in the future. Let neither mili- disaster, political faction, or foreign war, shake r settled purpose to enforce the equal operation of laws of the United States upon the people of every e." (Loud cheers.)

lis platform is contained in his letter of acceptance, which he states distinctly what his views are in re-

"The effect of long and varied service in the army during war and peace, has been to strengthen and make indelible in my mind and heart the love and reverence for the Union, Constitution, laws, and flag of our country, impressed upon me in early youth. These feelings have thus far guided the course of my life, and must continue to do so to its end. The existence of more than one government over the region which once owned our flag is incompatible with the peace, the power, and the happiness of the people.

"The reëstablishment of the Union in all its integrity is, and must continue to be, the indispensable condition in any settlement. So soon as it is clear, or even probable, that our present adversaries are ready for peace, upon the basis of the Union, we should exhaust all the resources of statesmanship practised by civilized nations, and taught by the traditions of the American people, consistent with the honor and interests of the country, to secure such peace, reëstablish the Union, and guarantee for the future the constitutional rights of every State. The Union is the one condition of peace—we ask no more.

"If a frank, earnest and persistent effort to obtain those objects should fail, the responsibility for ulterior consequences will fall upon those who remain in arms against the Union. But the Union must be preserved at all hazards.

"I could not look in the face of my gallant comrades of the army and navy, who have survived so many bloody battles, and tell them that their labors and the sacrifice of so many of our slain and wounded brethren had been in vain; that we had abandoned that Union for which we have so often perilled our lives."

He goes for the Union, for the integrity of the United States, for asserting the rightful government of the country over every foot of territory that has ever owned its flag; and I trust him to-day to do that in preference to the unfortunate man that now controls the destinies of the country. (Great applause.)

PENDLETON'S PLATFORM.

But I am told a great many persons like McClellan but don't like Mr. Pendleton, and they say General McClellan might die and Pendleton become President of the United States. Such a fatality as the death of General McClellan I trust will not occur. (Applause.) It is another peculiarity of the Democrats not to elect a President to die. (Great applause.) They elect him to live. Our history does not record an instance of a single Democratic President who died in office, although we have had the misfortune to lose two elected by the anti-Democratic party. But Mr. Pendleton in my humble judgment is as devoted to the Union as any man in it, as the letter which he has recently written upon this subject to a friend in New-York shows, dated October 17th. He has of course a natural sense of delicacy in making declarations now while a candidate, and says:

"I make no profession of a new faith, only repeat my reiterated professions of an old one, when I say that there is no one who cherishes a greater regard for the Union, who has a higher sense of its inestimable benefits, who would more earnestly labor for its restoration by all means which will effect that end, than myself. The Union is the guarantee of the peace, the power, the prosperity of this people; and no man would deprecate more heartily, or oppose more persistently, the establishment of another government over any portion of the territory ever within its limits.

"I am in favor of exacting no conditions, insisting upon no terms, not prescribed in the Constitution, and I am opposed to any course of policy which will defeat the reëstablishment of the government upon its old foundations, and in its territorial integrity."

ally, and a young man of higher honor does not live in the United States—utterly incapable of entering into any pledge he would not literally fulfil.

THE CHICAGO PLATFORM.

But some gentlemen say to me, they passed some resolutions at Chicago with which I am not satisfied—they passed resolutions on the subject of the war which were not satisfactory. Well, now, I don't attach much importance to the resolutions of the Convention; do you? ("No, no.") I have looked into my ballot a great many times when I put it in the box, and I never saw a resolution in it. I have noticed the name of a candidate for some particular office, and put great faith in the men; but I never noticed a resolution on a ballot, nor did I suppose I supported any when I supported a candidate acceptable to me. There is but a single resolution passed at Chicago that has any earthly significance, in my judgment, and that is the first. I will read it:

"Resolved, That in the future, as in the past, we will adhere with unanswering fidelity to the Union under the Constitution as the only solid foundation of our strength, security, and happiness as a people, and as a framework of government equally conducive to the welfare and prosperity of all the States, both Northern and Southern."

I never read a resolution more strongly committing those who passed it to the support of the Union. But, there is another resolution which seems to have been cooked up by a great variety of hands—though I infer from a recent letter of Mr. Vallandigham that he had the most to do with it—which undertakes to declare, not what the candidates ought to do—not even what the Convention thinks; nor does it declare, as has been stated, that the war has been a failure; but it undertakes to declare what it chooses to term as the sense of the American people, that four years of war have not restored the Union. Well, is that not true? Are we more or less likely to-day now than we were when this war broke out, to have the Union restored, especially under this administration? I think I shall show to you that this administration does not desire it restored, and does not intend that it shall be restored. It further declares that it is the sense of the American people that efforts should be made for a cessation of hostilities and a convention of the States. Well, if that is the sense of the American people, including the South, I should be extremely glad to know if there is any man in the United States, or at least any man in the Northern States, who is not prepared for such a result. In my humble judgment there is nothing in the resolutions of this Convention that embarrasses any body who pays any attention to resolutions of party conventions, as to his action in this contest. But I don't care one straw about the resolutions of a Convention. If they nominate two good men in whom I have entire confidence, that is perfectly satisfactory to me, and they may resolve for their own satisfaction whatever seems agreeable to them. (Laughter.) But, gentlemen, it is a great deal more convenient, of course, for the supporters of Lincoln to be assailing the resolution than to be defending their man. (Laughter.) They have spent a great deal more time even than we have, in showing, as they now admit, when you speak to them, that a more incapable, and more blundering, and more unsuitable man in every conceivable particular, for the office of President than their own Abraham don't exist; but they are afraid to change him. (Cheers.) Now, I, as I have said, am not afraid to try a trade this time. (Applause.)

THE INDIANA FRAUDS.

I have met a great many gentlemen who say to me that they think Lincoln is going to be elected. Says some heavy cheating in Indiana, as I presume yo observed. You have had a representative of tha here, Governor Morton, and I only regret that h not time to tell you how, in Indianapolis, the p tion should have been so wonderfully increase that city alone gives several thousand more vo this election than the whole county did in the (Laughter.) I would like to have him explain h Massachusetts soldiers are allowed to vote in Indi regiment at a time, and if that is the law of that I would recommend those soldiers to stay ther not come to New-York, where, in my humble op they would not be permitted to vote. (Great laug

THE DANGER OF CHEATING SOLDIERS WITH MUSKE THEIR HANDS OUT OF THEIR VOTES.

But what other circumstances do we see to ind what is going to be done? Why, efforts are mad only to withhold ballots of the soldiers, but whe are allowed to send agents there, Lincoln's agent at large, and the agents of McClellan are locked Well, that is considered reasonably fair, I believe the supporters of this administration. Let me tell one fact in regard to the soldiers. In my humble j ment—and I cannot imagine that the case can be erwise, though I admit that it is to some extent jecture—the soldiers of the United States will sup their fellow-soldier, General McClellan—(loud che —and if they are cheated out of their ballots, it turn out that it is a hazardous thing to cheat a with a musket in his hands. A man with a mu cannot safely be cheated, because if his ballot d reach Washington, his musket may! (Laughter.) have very strong confidence that in one way or ot their votes will tell at the Presidential election.

ANDREW JOHNSON'S TENNESSEE OUTRAGE.

There has an occurrence recently taken place which I wish to call your attention for a moment, t then pass to other subjects. Andrew Johnson, who the candidate for Vice-President with Mr. Lincoln, prescribed to the people of Tennessee a test-oath which he makes them swear, not exactly to vote Lincoln, but as follows:

"I will cordially oppose all armistices or negot tions for peace with rebels in arms, until the Consti tion of the United States, and all laws and proclan tions made in pursuance thereof, shall be establish over all the people of every State and territory e braced within the National Union, and that I w heartily aid and assist the loyal people in whatev measures may be adopted for the attainment of tho ends; and further, that I take this oath freely a voluntarily, and without mental reservation. So he me God."

Andrew Johnson is Military Governor of Tennesse and this test-oath is proposed by him, and substantiall excludes every man opposed to the administration fro taking a vote.

WADE AND DAVIS'S OPINIONS OF IT.

Recently Congress passed a law organizing Stat governments in the rebel States. You will recolle that that law was neither signed nor vetoed by Mr Lincoln, but that he pocketed it, upon which Mr. Wade an Ohio Senator, and Mr. Davis, a Member of Con gress, the Chairmen respectively of the Committee o the Senate and House of Representatives, to which th subject belonged, came out with a manifesto, charging usurpation of authority and tyrannical conduct upo the President of the United States; and they not only did this, but they undertake to state what would be the effect of allowing the President to assume the govern ment of the territories. They say of these military governors:

"The President's purpose to instruct his military governors to proceed according to the bill" a make-d—is not merely a grave usurpation, out a transit delusion. He cannot 'proceed according to the after preventing it from becoming a law.

Whatever is done will be at his will and pleasure rsons responsible to no law, and more interested cure the interests and execute the will of the dent than of the people." . . . .
at is to say, the President persists in recognizing shadows of governments in Arkansas and Louisiwhich Congress formally declared should not be nized—whose Representatives and Senators were led by formal votes of both Houses of Congress—h it was declared formally should have no electoral for President and Vice-President.

ND IS NOT THAT CIVIL WAR FOR THE PRESIDENCY, GURATED BY THE VOTES OF REBEL STATES?

ow, precisely, this is what Mr. Lincoln has atpted to do in the State of Tennessee, and when a ectable delegation from Tennessee called upon him represented to him the action of his military gov-r, what does he say? He said: "Let the friends eorge B. McClellan manage their side of this con-to suit themselves, and I will manage my side in own way." What's to become of the Presidency he United States, if we are to be considered on one , and the President with the control of civil and tary authority is to be left to manage what he calls side in his own way? This was rather strong even the supporters of Lincoln, and it was followed by a er in which he says he has no authority over elec-s, or over the action of this military governor, se appointment depends on his mere caprice, se whole power is in the breath of his nostrils, who ives appointment by his sign manual. But, he says, ou are not satisfied with this, stay away from the s; there is no coërcion on you to vote. Now, sup-e, for instance, there were half a dozen soldiers at polls, and when you went up to vote they should on you. Mr. Lincoln's argument would be: "I e no power over these soldiers; if you don't choose rote, stay away." That is precisely the explanation le by him in the matter of Tennessee. It is a plain bold usurpation of the authority over elections by agent, associated with him on the ticket, which no publican has yet been bold enough to justify, and ch has been calculated to shock the moral sense the love of constitutional liberty of every freeman he United States. Talk to me of a Democrat sus-ning all these usurpations, these violations of the nstitution, and of the elementary principles of civil erty. I submit that no man who has a Democratic rt in his bosom, and a Democratic intellect in his power the administration that has been signalized by acts like these! (Loud cheers.)

THE PROSPECT IF LINCOLN IS ELECTED.

Fellow-citizens, I have already detained you longer than I intended. I submit to you that there is but one remedy for the evils to which I adverted, and that is, to turn out the present incumbent of the presidential chair, and to put in a competent man. (Applause.) Put at the head of the government of the United States a soldier and statesman who knows how to receive propositions of peace. Why, what does the President say when a proposition is made to him for peace? He says in his letter "To whom it may concern," that he will not entertain any proposition unless it is coupled with a consent to abolish slavery. Does he mean, then, that the different States are to meet in convention, because it is only by convention that slavery can be abolished? He is in the hands of a set of men who are willing to drive this country to ruin for the quixotic object of interfering with the institutions of other States over which we have no control, as he said in his inaugural. My word for it, if he is allowed to proceed, you will find this government plunged into irretrievable bankruptcy. Long before you can see the end of this war, you will see the debt immeasurably increased, you will see another draft come along here about November, for which I trust you are prepared—a draft, if I am correctly informed, in which no substitutes will be allowed, if Congress can be made to repeal the law allowing them, and in which no fifty days' notice will be given. If another draft were necessary to uphold the government, to put down the rebellion, to prosecute the war for legitimate objects, I should have not one word to say. But if it is another draft of the white men of this country for the purpose of carrying on this abolition crusade, I, and I think you, would like to be heard upon the subject before the order is issued.

INDICATIONS IN THE SOUTH.

Now, before I leave you, I wish to say a word or two in regard to some letters that have recently been published in the South, which, I think, indicate a change of tone on the part of prominent men through the South. A letter has been recently published from Mr. Stephens, one from Mr. Boyce, and another from Mr. Herschel V. Johnson, three prominent men in the Southern Confederacy, who desire hostilities to cease. You are to bear in mind who Mr. Stephens is. He is the Vice-President of the so-called Southern Confederacy; he was one of the warmest friends of the Union up to the moment of the secession of Georgia, of which he is a citizen, that ever lived in the United States, and has presented the advantages of the Union to the South with more eloquence and more ability than any man North or South. He is the ablest man beyond all question, in my judgment, in the Southern country, he was one of the very few men in the Georgia Convention who voted steadily to the end against secession, and he is one who recently was on his way to the President of the United States with some proposition of negotiation, which Mr. Lincoln would not hear and would not let him come through the lines to deliver. Since that time Mr. Stephens has not opened his mouth. When these persons come out for a cessation of hostilities and a convention of the States, it is a call to which attention should be paid. I don't presume to say that it is one in which we should acquiesce, but it is one of the indications that Southern men are prepared to settle this controversy. He says that the questions of Union and the questions of boundaries could furnish no difficulty in the settlement. Now, I submit to you, that his letter and the letter of Mr. Boyce, addressed to Jefferson Davis, and the letter of Herschel V. Johnson, who was the candidate for Vice-President on the ticket with Mr. Douglas, in the last presidential election, men are prepared to return to the Union and submit to the Constitution and laws, I should be glad to see the blood-thirsty man, or the bloated contractor, or the unemployed general, who would refuse the people of this country the opportunity to enter into negotiation by which the Union might be restored, the war ended, and peace secured. (Great applause.)

Davis has told us that they never will unite; prominent men in the South have insisted that they won't unite, won't consult, won't confer, but the men to whom I refer hold more moderate and rational language, though they may entertain Quixotic ideas in reference to the rights of the States which Mr. Calhoun entertained for thirty or forty years of his life, and until his death, without doing any damage to the United States, because the great mass of the people believed such notions to be utterly irreconcilable with the true theory of the Constitution.

THE REPUBLICANS DO NOT WANT THE UNION RESTORED.

Now, these Republican gentlemen who are supporting Mr. Lincoln do not mean to have the Union restored; they don't want to have it restored, and any man of them who is honest will tell you so. If they intend to go on and abolish slavery in the States, of course they don't intend to restore the old Union. The politicians among them know that if the Southern States return to the Confederacy, they will not return with any very exalted opinions of the fidelity of the Republicans to the Union, or their regard for the rights of those who were formerly their brethren in the Southern States. They know that the return of the Southern States to the Union is their perpetual expulsion from public life, and they don't mean to have it. Those that are honest among them say, as Thad Stevens does, that the Union is played out, that we must subjugate these people, that we must drive them from the territory and populate the Southern country with a new race. That is not a short job. (Laughter.) It is not a cheap job. It was not included in the Crittenden resolutions, or in the objects of the war, as stated by Mr. Lincoln in the beginning. I think it is possible to overthrow the organized armies of the South. I never had a doubt that we were competent to do that; but it is proposed when they overthrow the armies to convert this into a guerrilla warfare, which will be attended by murder, by rapine, by incendiarism. Every mile of Southern territory that we conquer under this policy will require to be held by garrisons larger than the armies now occupied in subjugating it, and will entail upon us an expense fearful to contemplate, and utterly impossible to discharge. If I were a contractor who had government securities, my private impression is, that I would say: "Let us close the account now. You have been sweated about as much as I think you will bear." When this debt comes to be doubled and trebled, a man may consider himself fortunate who is able to give up all that he is possessed of and quit the country to begin again in some other land where he is not overwhelmed with debt. ("That's so.")

AUSPICIOUS SIGNS OF LINCOLN'S DEFEAT.

I see throughout the country great hope of the defeat of Mr. Lincoln. (Applause.) I see it not only in the intelligence and observation of the gentlemen that I meet in different parts of the United States, not only in what I know to be the intrinsic justice of our cause and the propriety of our action, but I see it in the popular elections that have taken place recently where the slightest opportunity has been given for a fair vote. The elections in the towns of Connecticut indicate that beyond a reasonable doubt that State will go for McClellan. (Loud cheers.) So, too, the elec-

recent glorious contest from which the friends Clellan have emerged in Pennsylvania. (Lou know what is their duty, and to do it at this presid day. There is a great difference between the con in a State like Indiana, and one in which the gove ment is in the hands of men who will protect purity of the ballot-boxes, and see that no frauds

New-York, from what I see in regard to the feeling that city, I cannot imagine a Republican major in the interior of the State which will overcom the overwhelming vote of the county of Ne

Letter to Hon. JOHN B. HASKIN.

CINCINNATI, October 17.

MY DEAR SIR: I have received your friendly letter. Malignant misrepresentations and falsehoods are so frequent in our political struggles, that I have rarely undertaken to correct or refute them.

I make no professions of a new faith, only repeat my reiterated professions of an old one, when I say that there is no one who cherishes a greater regard for the Union, who has a higher sense of its inestimable benefits, who would more earnestly labor for its restoration by all means which will effect that end, than myself. The Union is the guarantee of the peace, the power, the prosperity of this people; and no man would deprecate more heartily, or oppose more persistently, the establishment of another government over any portion of the territory ever within its limits.

I am in favor of exacting no conditions, insisting upon no terms, not prescribed in the Constitution, and I am opposed to any course of policy which will defeat the reëstablishment of the Government upon its old foundations, and in its territorial integrity. I am, very truly yours, etc.,

GEORGE H. PENDLETON.

Letter to Hon. C. L. WARD.

CINCINNATI, October 18.

MY DEAR SIR: I have received your letter. In the very beginning of this war—in the first days of the extra session of 1861—I said in my place in Congress, that I would vote for all measures necessary to enable the Government to maintain its honor and dignity and prevent disaster to its flag. I have done so.

I thought, by the adoption of such measures, the faith of the Government was pledged to the troops in the field, and must not be forfeited by inadequate supplies. I never gave a vote which was incompatible with this sentiment.

All appropriations, pure and simple, for the support and efficiency of the army and navy, had my cordial concurrence. It was only when they were connected with other, and improper, appropriations; when by reason of their popularity they were loaded down with fraudulent items for the benefit of contractors and speculators, and every attempt to separate them failed; when they were made a stalking-horse for some abolition scheme, that I was constrained reluctantly to vote against the whole bill.

But I repeat that I voted against no bill which was confined simply to the object of supplies for the army and the navy.

I am, very truly yours,

SPEECH AT NEW-YORK HOTEL,

OCTOBER 24th, 1864.

I THANK you for this manifestation of your kind feeling toward myself. I am the more grateful for it as it comes from men who have stood in the fore-front of danger, and periled their lives for their country. (Loud cheers.) I accept it as an evidence of your confidence in and of your sympathy with my devotion to the Union and the Constitution. (Three cheers for Geo. H. Pendleton.)

I have rarely found it necessary to reply to any personal attack. A friend has just handed me a pamphlet, which he tells me has extensive circulation both here and in the army. It professes to be a record of my speeches and votes in Congress, and to prove from them my hostility to the Republic. It professes to be published by the "Union Congressional Committee," and to be compiled from the Congressional Globe, to which it appeals for its entire accuracy. On the seventh page of that pamphlet, I am charged with having voted against certain resolutions on the seventh of July, 1864. Now, if any of you gentlemen will examine the Globe, or the file of any daily newspaper of your city, or will even tax his recollection, he will find that Congress adjourned on the fourth day of July, 1864. (Great laughter.) From this specimen of fraud and forgery, I leave you to judge of the credibility of the whole fabrication. (Laughter and applause.)

I was born in Ohio. I have lived all my life in the North-West. I know the sentiment of the people. I sympathize entirely with it. They are attached by every tie of affection and interest to this Union. (Loud cheering.)

Unlike New-York, they have never known another Government; they never existed as a political community before this Government was formed, and their hearts cling to this Government with indescribable tenacity. (Great applause.) Unlike you, they are an inland people chiefly devoted to agriculture. As an integral and controlling portion of the Union, they have prestige and power; they fear from disunion, isolation from the world, and the loss of that prestige and power. (Cheers.) Their interest requires that they should have speedy and easy communication with the ocean, and this they intend to have, both by the Gulf of Mexico and the city of New-York, by conciliation and peace if they can, by all the force and power which a teeming population and a fruitful soil give them if they must. (Loud cheers.) They believe that the first step toward maintaining the Union is the election of General McClellan. (Great cheering.) They believe that the restoration of the Democratic party to power will produce Union. (Cheers.) They believe the policy of this Administration toward both the Southern and Northern States is fatal to the Union. ("That's so.") General McClellan, in his Harrison Landing letter, said: "Neither confiscation of property, nor political executions of persons, nor territorial organization of States, nor forcible abolition of slavery, should be for one moment thought of."

In his letter of acceptance he said: "The Union was originally formed by the exercise of a spirit of conciliation and compromise. To restore and preserve it, a like spirit must prevail in the councils of the country and in the hearts of the people." (Cheers.)

The Democratic party is pledged to an unswerving fidelity to the Union under the Constitution. (Cheers.) It is pledged to "the restoration of peace on the basis of the Federal Union of the States." (Loud applause.)

We believe, nay, we know, that if this party shall be restored to power, if this policy shall prevail, the Union shall be restored; State after State will return to us, and the echoes of our rejoicing will come down to us from the vaults of heaven itself, in token that Deity approves that statesmanship which tempers all its policy with moderation, and justice, and conciliation. (Cheers.)

When next I meet you, I hope we may have already entered on that work. Again, gentlemen, I thank you for your attention, and wish you good-night. (Loud and long cheers followed the speech.)

LINCOLN the REBEL CANDIDATE.

From the Richmond Enquirer, Sept. 5.

THE Democratic nominees in the United States are McClellan for President and Pendleton for Vice-President. What concern have the people of the confederate States in the fate of these candidates at the approaching election? In our opinion, the interest and hope of peace is not greatly advanced by these nominations. From General McClellan our people can have but little hope of peace, other than a reconstruction peace. . . . What hope do his antecedents hold out that should encourage our people to believe that he would yield our nationality any sooner than Mr. Lincoln? He is by far the more dangerous man for us; had his policy been persistently followed, and the war conducted on the principles of civilized warfare, he might have divided our people and perhaps conquered our liberties. With consummate abilities, he clearly foresaw that emancipation might possibly free the negroes, but could not unite the sections; that confiscation might enrich his soldiers, but could not reconcile our people; hence, with an earnest and honest love for the Union, he avoided these fatal acts, and conducted the war for the restoration of the Union, rather than the destruction of the South. His policy was the olive-branch in one hand and the sword in the other, to conquer by power and conciliate by kindness. It was a most dangerous policy for us; for if the ameliorating hand of Federal kindness had softened the rigors of war, our people would not have been subjected to those terrible fires of suffering by which Mr. Lincoln has hardened every heart and steeled every sentiment against our merciless foes. As a sincere secessionist, preferring war and nationality to peace and the Union, we looked upon the fact of a difference between Mr. Lincoln and General McClellan as to the proper policy of conducting the war, as peculiarly fortunate for our cause. We hailed the proclamations of emancipation and confiscation, and the policy of plunder and devastation, as sure pledges of our ultimate triumph; they were terrible ordeals, but they most effectually eradicated every sentiment of Union, and arousing the pride as well as the interest of our people, inflamed the patriotism of the whole, until they would have accepted death as preferable to ultimate defeat.

Now, between McClellan and Lincoln there are many points of difference; the former is a man of talent, of information, of firmness, and great military experience and ability; the latter is a supple, pliant, easy fool, a good but vulgar joker. While McClellan has the interest of the Union only at heart, Mr. Lincoln has the fanatical object of freeing negroes for his inspiration. Between "my plan," as General Grant has conducted it, and one by General McClellan, there could not have been the same success that has already attended our arms; for we lost more men fighting the science of McClellan on the Peninsula, than we have in repelling the furious but ill-conducted assaults of General Grant. Thus, whether we look at this nomination in the light of peace or of war, we prefer Lincoln to McClellan. We can make better terms of peace with anti slavery fanatics than with an earnest Unionist. We can gain more military success in a war conducted on "my plan" than one of a real soldier like McClellan, and sooner destroy the resources and strength of our enemy where they are managed and manipulated by the light-fingered gentry of Messrs. Chase and Fessenden, than when husbanded and skilfully controlled by such a man as Guthrie. Our best hope is from the honest fanatics of the United States, men who believe in their hearts that slavery is the "sum of all villainies," and who really and sincerely believe it to be their duty to separate their country from this "relic of barbarism." Such men, when they find that their people are tired of the war, will end it by a peace that sacrifices territory to freedom, and will let the South "go," provided she carries slavery with her. These men believe no less that the just powers of government are derived from the consent of the governed, than "that all men are created free and equal." The two postulates are of like importance to an abolitionist.

Both the abolitionist and the Democrat is our enemy—the one, because we have slaves, the other, because we are disunionists. Nor does their enmity differ in degree; they both hate us most intensely. The Chicago platform is, that "peace may be restored on the basis of the Federal Union of the States"—that is, reconstruction of the Union as it was, with slavery protected by the nominal laws, but warred upon by a real sentiment, aggravated and embittered by the war. The reconstructed Union of the Chicago platform would be the certain destruction—first, of slavery, and next of slaveholders. With Lincoln and the Baltimore platform, we of the confederate States know where we are—outside of the pale of mercy, devoted to ruin and destruction, with no hope save in the justice and protection of God, and the courage and manliness of our soldiers. With swords and muskets and cannon we fight Lincoln, and the past affords no reason of apprehension of the future. But in the reconstructed Union of the Chicago platform we would be deprived of our weapons without being reconciled to our foes.

The disruption of old political associations is always a hazardous experiment. The great majority of minds in a wealthy and prosperous community are averse to change and revolution, preferring to endure great evils rather than resort to sanguinary measures for redress. No men ever felt the weight of this truth more forcibly than those who inaugurated the movement for secession. The whole danger and risk of the experiment consisted in that conservative aversion to change and convulsion which possesses the popular masses. On this rock the secession cause might have split, if it had not been safely piloted past it by the pains of Abraham Lincoln. The cause was saved in 1862 by the conscription; and Lincoln—not the Examiner newspaper—may be said to have been the author of the conscription; because, except for the ferocious policy which he pursued, it could never have been enforced. He has rendered resistance an absolute duty and necessity, and brought that duty and necessity home to every man's door, insomuch, that no man in the South having any self-respect or regard for the opinions of his neighbors, dares to disobey the call of his country to arms.

But for the incentives supplied by Mr. Lincoln, the South, by want of union and energy, might have failed to deserve the respect of mankind; might have been unable to levy great armies; and the forces in the field might have fought with little energy or resolution. The popular majority might have been disposed, at the first soft words from the enemy, to renounce the Southern cause, and return to the enjoyment of repose, prosperity, and dishonor. Mr. Lincoln has prevented such a contingency, and relieved the South of all these dangers by a course of policy which rendered reconciliation impossible. By driving us to extremity, he has combined every element of our strength, and insured our success. If the South could be conquered at all, there is but one mode by which it could be done. If the armies of the North were entirely withdrawn, and an invitation proposed for a convention of all the States, for the purpose of devising terms of conciliation, then our independence might be seriously endangered. Such would have been the policy of Pierce or Vallandigham; such, possibly, though not probably, might become the policy of McClellan. But Mr. Lincoln relieves us of this only possible danger by a policy which drives every man to arms, and renders reconstruction an opprobrium throughout the land.

While the South has much for which to thank Mr. Lincoln, the North has still more for which to curse him. His administration has cost the United States half a million of men, eleven States with ten millions of population, embracing many thousands of millions of wealth, and has entailed three thousand millions of public debt. He is the very genius of ruin and destruction to his country, and seems to have endeared himself in its affections by the very loss and woe he has inflicted upon it.

If the people of the United States choose to reëlect him, they thereby pronounce a decree establishing the independence of the South. We can bring larger armies into the field to fight Lincoln than any other Northern President, and his continuation in office will inspire every Southern breast with the resolve to win independence as the only alternative to extermination.

There is no question that between the two men General McClellan enjoys far more of the respect of the people of these States than Lincoln, and the Democratic party far more of our confidence than the Republican, and that if reconstruction were possible, it would be more probable under General McClellan and the Democracy than under Lincoln and the Republicans. The North-West inspires one, and New-England the other; but as long as

New-England imposes the dogmas of her civilization and the tenets of her fanaticism upon the mind and people of the North-West, there may be peace and separation, but there can never be Union and harmony. If the North-West desires the restoration of the Union, let its people shake off the bondage of New-England, and show to the world that a new era of toleration and fraternal kindness has risen in the place of fanatical Puritanism and selfish ostracism.

From the Richmond Examiner, October 17.

Some doubt remains as to the political complexion of Pennsylvania. The press of the United States has become so radically mendacious, that it is impossible to put trust in the first accounts even of an event so public and plain as the result of an election. Some days may yet elapse before certitude is attained. But we entertain strong hopes that the Republicans have done what they seemed at first to have done, and confess a deep desire that the present result may foreshadow the reëlection of Abraham Lincoln. For Abraham Lincoln is the South's best ally. This Confederacy had a million and a quarter men capable of bearing arms at the outset of the contest: a force sufficient to meet any invading power and defy the possibility of subjugation. The only danger lay in the difficulty of bringing this force into the field. Abraham Lincoln removed that difficulty by the character which he imparted to the war. He made Goths and Vandals of his troops, and proclaimed devastation, confiscation, and extermination as his purpose. It was thus that he invoked into the field those powerful Southern armies which have so successfully resisted his assaults. It is scarcely possible to conceive how a conflict could have been rendered more envenomed than the present one has become through that truculent policy of Mr. Lincoln. Yet this man found a means of intensifying its ferocity. He proclaimed insurrection to the slaves, and armed all the blacks which he could seduce into his service, against the whites who had been their masters. By this policy he effectually succeeded in calling out and combining every element of resistance in the South — a strong element of that resistance is yet to come, as will appear soon after the meeting of the confederate Congress. The enemy talk of the despotism which drags conscripts into the Southern armies, and forces old men and children into the ditches, but the despotism which coërces the South is seated at Washington, and not at Richmond. The Confederacy has proved that it had nerve and resolution to achieve an independent destiny; but it is indebted to Lincoln for forcing these qualities into action.

From General McClellan our people can have but little hope of peace, other than a reconstruction peace. . . . What hope do his antecedents hold out that should encourage our people to believe that he would yield our nationality any sooner than Mr. Lincoln? He is by far the more dangerous man for us; had his policy been persistently followed, and the war conducted on the principles of civilized warfare, he might have divided our people and perhaps conquered our liberties. With consummate abilities, he clearly foresaw that emancipation might possibly free the negroes, but could not unite the sections; that confiscation might enrich his soldiers, but could not reconcile our people; hence, with an earnest and honest love for the Union, he avoided these fatal acts, and conducted the war for the restoration of the Union, rather than the destruction of the South. His policy was the olive-branch in one hand and the sword in the other, to conquer by power and conciliate by kindness. It was a most dangerous policy for us; for if the ameliorating hand of Federal kindness had softened the rigors of war, our people would not have been subjected to those terrible fires of suffering by which Mr. Lincoln has hardened every heart and steeled every sentiment against our merciless foes. As a sincere secessionist, preferring war and nationality to peace and the Union, we looked upon the fact of a difference between Mr. Lincoln and General McClellan as to the proper policy of conducting the war, as peculiarly fortunate for our cause. We hailed the proclamations of emancipation and confiscation, and the policy of plunder and devastation, as sure pledges of our ultimate triumph: they were terrible ordeals, but they most effectually eradicated every sentiment of Union, and arousing the pride as well as the interest of our people, inflamed the patriotism of the whole, until they would have accepted death as preferable to ultimate defeat.

Now, between McClellan and Lincoln there are many points of difference; the former is a man of talent, of information, of firmness, and great military experience and ability; the latter is a supple, pliant, easy fool, a good but vulgar joker. While McClellan has the interest of the Union only at heart, Mr. Lincoln has the fanatical object of freeing negroes for his inspiration. Between "my plan," as General Grant has conducted it, and one by General McClellan, there could not have been the same success that has already attended our arms; for we lost more men fighting the science of McClellan on the Peninsula, than we have in repelling the furious but ill-conducted assaults of General Grant. Thus, whether we look at this nomination in the light of peace or of war, we prefer Lincoln to McClellan. We can make better terms of peace with anti slavery fanatics than with an earnest Unionist. We can gain more military success in a war conducted on "my plan" than one of a real soldier like McClellan, and sooner destroy the resources and strength of our enemy where they are managed and manipulated by the light-fingered gentry of Messrs. Chase and Fessenden, than when husbanded and skilfully controlled by such a man as Guthrie. Our best hope is from the honest fanatics of the United States, men who believe in their hearts that slavery is the "sum of all villainies," and who really and sincerely believe it to be their duty to separate their country from this "relic of barbarism." Such men, when they find that their people are tired of the war, will end it by a peace that sacrifices territory to freedom, and will let the South "go," provided she carries slavery with her. These men believe no less that the just powers of government are derived from the consent of the governed, than "that all men are created free and equal." The two postulates are of like importance to an abolitionist.

Both the abolitionist and the Democrat is our enemy—the one, because we have slaves, the other, because we are disunionists. Nor does their enmity differ in degree; they both hate us most intensely. The Chicago platform is, that "peace may be restored on the basis of the Federal Union of the States"—that is, reconstruction of the Union as it was, with slavery protected by the nominal laws, but warred upon by a real sentiment, aggravated and embittered by the war. The reconstructed Union of the Chicago platform would be the certain destruction—first, of slavery, and next of slaveholders. With Lincoln and the Baltimore platform, we of the confederate States know where we are—outside of the pale of mercy, devoted to ruin and destruction, with no hope save in the justice and protection of God, and the courage and manliness of our soldiers. With swords and muskets and cannon we fight Lincoln, and the past affords no reason of apprehension of the future. But in the reconstructed Union of the Chicago platform we would be deprived of our weapons without being reconciled to our foes.

The disruption of old political associations is always a hazardous experiment. The great majority of minds in a wealthy and prosperous community are averse to change and revolution, preferring to endure great evils rather than resort to sanguinary measures for redress. No men ever felt the weight of this truth more forcibly than those who inaugurated the movement for secession. The whole danger and risk of the experiment consisted in that conservative aversion to change and convulsion which possesses the popular masses. On this rock the secession cause might have split, if it had not been safely piloted past it by the pains of Abraham Lincoln. The cause was saved in 1862 by the conscription; and Lincoln—not the Examiner newspaper—may be said to have been the author of the conscription; because, except for the ferocious policy which he pursued, it could never have been enforced. He has rendered resistance an absolute duty and necessity, and brought that duty and necessity home to every man's door, insomuch, that no man in the South having any self-respect or regard for the opinions of his neighbors, dares to disobey the call of his country to arms.

But for the incentives supplied by Mr. Lincoln, the South, by want of union and energy, might have failed to deserve the respect of mankind; might have been unable to levy great armies; and the forces in the field might have fought with little energy or resolution. The popular majority might have been disposed, at the first soft words from the enemy, to renounce the Southern cause, and return to the enjoyment of repose, prosperity, and dishonor. Mr. Lincoln has prevented such a contingency, and relieved the South of all these dangers by a course of policy which rendered reconciliation impossible. By driving us to extremity, he has combined every element of our strength, and insured our success. If the South could be conquered at all, there is but one mode by which it could be done. If the armies of the North were entirely withdrawn, and an invitation proposed for a convention of all the States, for the purpose of devising terms of conciliation, then our independence might be seriously endangered. Such would have been the policy of Pierce or Vallandigham; such, possibly, though not probably, might become the policy of McClellan. But Mr. Lincoln relieves us of this only possible danger by a policy which drives every man to arms, and renders reconstruction an opprobrium throughout the land.

While the South has much for which to thank Mr. Lincoln, the North has still more for which to curse him. His administration has cost the United States half a million of men, eleven States with ten millions of population, embracing many thousands of millions of wealth, and has entailed three thousand millions of public debt. He is the very genius of ruin and destruction to his country, and seems to have endeared himself in its affections by the very loss and woe he has inflicted upon it.

If the people of the United States choose to reëlect him, they thereby pronounce a decree establishing the independence of the South. We can bring larger armies into the field to fight Lincoln than any other Northern President, and his continuation in office will inspire every Southern breast with the resolve to win independence as the only alternative to extermination.

There is no question that between the two men General McClellan enjoys far more of the respect of the people of these States than Lincoln, and the Democratic party far more of our confidence than the Republican, and that if reconstruction were possible, it would be more probable under General McClellan and the Democracy than under Lincoln and the Republicans. The North-West inspires one, and New-England the other; but as long as

New-England imposes the dogmas of her civilization and the tenets of her fanaticism upon the mind and people of the North-West, there may be peace and separation, but there can never be Union and harmony. If the North-West desires the restoration of the Union, let its people shake off the bondage of New-England, and show to the world that a new era of toleration and fraternal kindness has risen in the place of fanatical Puritanism and selfish ostracism.

From the Richmond Examiner, October 17.

Some doubt remains as to the political complexion of Pennsylvania. The press of the United States has become so radically mendacious, that it is impossible to put trust in the first accounts even of an event so public and plain as the result of an election. Some days may yet elapse before certitude is attained. But we entertain strong hopes that the Republicans have done what they seemed at first to have done, and confess a deep desire that the present result may foreshadow the reëlection of Abraham Lincoln. For Abraham Lincoln is the South's best ally. This Confederacy had a million and a quarter men capable of bearing arms at the outset of the contest: a force sufficient to meet any invading power and defy the possibility of subjugation. The only danger lay in the difficulty of bringing this force into the field. Abraham Lincoln removed that difficulty by the character which he imparted to the war. He made Goths and Vandals of his troops, and proclaimed devastation, confiscation, and extermination as his purpose. It was thus that he invoked into the field those powerful Southern armies which have so successfully resisted his assaults. It is scarcely possible to conceive how a conflict could have been rendered more envenomed than the present one has become through that truculent policy of Mr. Lincoln. Yet this man found a means of intensifying its ferocity. He proclaimed insurrection to the slaves, and armed all the blacks which he could seduce into his service, against the whites who had been their masters. By this policy he effectually succeeded in calling out and combining every element of resistance in the South — a strong element of that resistance is yet to come, as will appear soon after the meeting of the confederate Congress. The enemy talk of the despotism which drags conscripts into the Southern armies, and forces old men and children into the ditches, but the despotism which coërces the South is seated at Washington, and not at Richmond. The Confederacy has proved that it had nerve and resolution to achieve an independent destiny; but it is indebted to Lincoln for forcing these qualities into action.

THE DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM.

GENERAL McCLELLAN'S LETTER OF ACCEPTANCE.

ORANGE, NEW JERSEY,
September 8, 1864.

GENTLEMEN: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter informing me of my nomination by the Democratic National Convention, recently assembled at Chicago, as their candidate for the next election for President of the United States.

It is unnecessary for me to say to you that this nomination comes to me unsought. I am happy to know that when the nomination was made the record of my public life was kept in view.

The effect of long and varied service in the army during war and peace, has been to strengthen and make indelible in my mind and heart the love and reverence for the Union, Constitution, laws, and flag of our country, impressed upon me in early youth.

These feelings have thus far guided the course of my life, and must continue to do so to its end.

The existence of more than one government over the region which once owned our flag is incompatible with the peace, the power, and the happiness of the people.

The preservation of our Union was the sole avowed object for which the war was commenced. It should have been conducted for that object only, and in accordance with those principles which I took occasion to declare when in active service.

Thus conducted, the work of reconciliation would have been easy, and we might have reaped the benefits of our many victories on land and sea.

The Union was originally formed by the exercise of a spirit of conciliation and compromise. To restore and preserve it, the same spirit must prevail in our councils, and in the hearts of the people.

The reëstablishment of the Union in all its integrity is, and must continue to be, the indispensable condition in any settlement. So soon as it is clear, or even probable, that our present adversaries are ready for peace, upon the basis of the Union, we should exhaust all the resources of statesmanship practised by civilized nations, and taught by the traditions of the American people, consistent with the honor and interests of the country, to secure such peace, reëstablish the Union, and guarantee for the future the constitutional rights of every State. The Union is the one condition of peace — we ask no more.

Let me add what, I doubt not was, although unexpressed, the sentiment of the Convention, as it is of the people they represent, that when any one State is willing to return to the Union, it should be received at once, with a full guarantee of all its constitutional rights.

If a frank, earnest, and persistent effort to obtain those objects should fail, the responsibility for ulterior consequences will fall upon those who remain in arms against the Union. But the Union must be preserved at all hazards.

I could not look in the face my gallant comrades of the army and navy, who have survived so many bloody battles, and tell them that their labors and the sacrifice of so many of our slain and wounded brethren had been in vain; that we had abandoned that Union for which we have so often periled our lives.

A vast majority of our people, whether in the army and navy or at home, would, as I would, hail with unbounded joy the permanent restoration of peace, on the basis of the Union under the Constitution, without the effusion of another drop of blood. But no peace can be permanent without Union.

As to the other subjects presented in the resolutions of the Convention, I need only say that I should seek, in the Constitution of the United States and the laws framed in accordance therewith, the rule of my duty, and the limitations of executive power; endeavor to restore economy in public expenditure, reëstablish the supremacy of law, and, by the assertion of a more vigorous nationality, resume our commanding position among the nations of the earth.

The condition of our finances, the depreciation of the paper money, and the burdens thereby imposed on labor and capital, show the necessity of a return to a sound financial system; while the rights of citizens, and the rights of States, and the binding authority of law over Pr dent, army, and people, are subjects of less vital importance in war than in pea

Believing that the views here expres are those of the Convention and the peo you represent, I accept the nomination.

I realize the weight of the responsibil to be borne should the people ratify y choice.

Conscious of my own weakness, I only seek fervently the guidance of Ruler of the universe, and, relying His all-powerful aid, do my best to store union and peace to a suffering peo and to establish and guard their libert and rights,

I am, gentlemen,
very respectfully,
your obedient servant,

GEO. B. McCLELLA

Hon. HORATIO SEYMOUR, and others, Committee.

MAC, MY DARLING.

AIR: "Oh my Nora Creina, Dear."

Mac, my darling, proud I am
To hear that you've been nominated;
Last we met at Antietam,
Where you the rebel might abated.
In the seven days' fight I stood Beside you on the hills and meadows,
And while our brave boys poured their blood,
We knew your heart was throbbing with us!
Oh, my captain, dear and true,
The coward tongues that would ignore you
Are base as false—thank Heaven they're few!
Your soldiers trust you and adore you.

REPUBLICAN LOYALTY.

From the Tribune.

All hail the flaunting lie!
The stars grow pale and dim,
The stripes are bloody scars,
A lie the vaunting hymn.
It shields a pirate's deck,
It binds a man in chains,

be may crack his jolly jokes, O'er bloody fields of stricken battle, hile yet the ebbing life-tide smokes
From men that die like butchered cattle;
le, ere yet the guns grow cold,
To pimps and pets may crack his stories;
our name is of the grander mould,
And linked with all our brightest glories!
Oh, my general, dear and true,
The lying tongues that would defame you,
Are base as false—thank Heaven they're few!
For as our chosen chief we claim you.

hey say—these dogs of currish heart,
Who never heard a bullet whistle—ou'd let the Union drift apart
Like down-flakes from a shaking thistle;
hey say, oh captain—but the words Stick in our throats—we can't adjust 'em—ut lift to Heaven our dinted swords,
And answer only this: "We trust him!"
Yes, oh friend of rights and laws,
Despite the sneers of fool or craven,
Where hearts beat highest for the cause,
You have your home, your shrine and haven!

Vith patient toil and pitying breast
You sought your soldiers' blood to treasure, for ever tried the cruel test,
How much we could endure to measure.
hey feared you, for they saw our love;
To win success they would not let you—ut while the white stars shine above,
The boys you led will ne'er forget you!
Yes, oh captain! loved and true,
Desert you—we would perish rather;
Thank Heaven the hearts are not a few
That call you brother, friend, and father!

IN THE FIELD, September 5.

It yokes the captive's neck,
And wipes the bloody stains.

Tear down the flaunting lie!—
Half-mast the starry flag!
Insult no sunny sky
With hate's polluted rag!
Destroy it ye who can!
Deep sink it in the waves!
It bears a fellow-man
To groan with fellow-slaves.

Furl the boasted lie!
Till freedom lives again,
To rule once more in truth,
Among untrammelled men.
Roll up the starry sheen,
Conceal its bloody stains;
For in its folds are seen
The stamp of rustling chains!
